A gift, it wasn't. This was as hard-earned a victory as there could be, with Matt Garza giving the Rays seven-plus innings of one-run, two-hit ball and 118 high-energy pitches, and rookie left-hander David Price filling a glaring void at closer by striking out three of five batters for the save.

Tampa Bay used four relievers to suppress the Red Sox in the eighth, and when second baseman Akinori Iwamura fielded Jed Lowrie's wicked-hop grounder and stepped on second for the final out to end Game 7 of the American League Championship Series, the Rays dog-piled each other on the mound.

Doormats for a decade, last-place finishers in the AL East for nine of their previous 10 years of existence, losers of 96 games last season and 101 in 2006, the Rays withstood the hard-charging Red Sox, who were looking to erase their third 3-1 ALCS deficit in five years, to earn a World Series berth opposite the Philadelphia Phillies.

Tampa Bay had averaged 97 losses a year in its decade as the Devil Rays before dropping the "Devil" from the team name and then winning 97 games and the East division title this season. But the Rays showed the heart and resiliency of champions in the ALCS. They bounced back from an epic Game 5 collapse, when they blew a 7-0, seventh-inning lead, and a 4-2 Game 6 loss to win a tense, taut Game 7 against the defending World Series champions.

And what the 104th World Series will get, when the Phillies and Rays play Game 1 on Wednesday night in Tropicana Field, is more cowbell.

"That was amazing, incredible," said first baseman Carlos Pena, whose pregame team meeting helped calm the Rays. "What Garza did, what Price did, I don't have words to describe what I'm feeling right now. This is beautiful, a perfect story."

Garza gave up a one-out home run to Dustin Pedroia in the first and didn't allow another hit until Jason Bay's one-out single put two on in the seventh.

By then, the Rays had a 2-1 lead, thanks to Evan Longoria's run-scoring double in the fourth and Rocco Baldelli's RBI single in the fifth to score Willy Aybar, who had doubled.

Up stepped the left-handed-hitting Mark Kotsay, and to the mound came Manager Joe Maddon. Garza's pitch count was at 108.

"He looked at me and said, 'How do you feel?'" Garza said. "I said, 'Great, you ain't taking me out of this game.' He just looked at me and I said, 'This is my game, and I'm going to finish it off.'"

How did Maddon respond? "He said, 'Well, you look good. I'll see you later,'" Garza said.

Garza, who struck out nine, including David Ortiz with a 95-mph fastball to end the sixth, rewarded Maddon's faith, getting Kotsay to fly to right and striking out Jason Varitek to end the inning.

Aybar's homer off Red Sox starter Jon Lester gave Tampa Bay a 3-1 lead in the seventh, and Garza, whose two victories earned him ALCS most valuable player honors, was pulled after Alex Cora reached on Jason Bartlett's error to open the eighth.

Dan Wheeler gave up a single to Coco Crisp and got Pedroia to fly out, Howell won another showdown with Ortiz, getting the slugger to ground into a fielder's choice, and Chad Bradford walked Kevin Youkilis to load the bases.

In came Price, the former Vanderbilt star and first overall pick in the 2007 draft, who had pitched in all of seven big league games, five regular season, two playoff.

"I loved the decision, baptism by fire," Longoria said. "His stuff is as good as anyone's in that bullpen."

With a crowd of 40,473 on its feet and roaring with every pitch, Price struck out J.D. Drew, who couldn't check his swing on a 97-mph fastball.

After walking Bay to open the ninth, Price struck out Kotsay looking at a 95-mph fastball and Varitek swinging at a slider. Lowrie then grounded out to end the game.

"That's a memory that will last a lifetime," Price said in a champagne-soaked clubhouse. "I didn't even hear the crowd. I was so focused on my teammates. . . . Look at these guys, running around here like 5-year-olds on Christmas.

UM returns home Friday

with a 1-0 loss to Hartford.

HOME SWEET HOME

After a month-long stretch of road games in which UMass had to travel over 1,100 miles, earning plenty of frequent flyer miles as UMass coach Sam Koch joked.

The Minutemen will finally get the chance to return home this weekend as they host conference foes Richmond and George Washington.

The Minutemen were 9-1 on their home turf last year. So far their record at home is 1-1-1, but UMass must take advantage of staying home and not having to worry about being worn out before the game even starts.

Koch talked about some of the traveling difficulties the team dealt with before last weekend's road trip.

"Travel always takes a lot out of you," Koch said. "We get to the hotel at 5 p.m. and we leave at 6:30 in the morning – so that is a long day of travel before we even practice."

This time their opponents will have to deal with the stress of travel. George Washington is over 350 miles away from Amherst, while Richmond must trek nearly 500 miles to play the Minutemen.

Last year's run was built on the team protecting its home-field advantage; it must do the same this year if it wants to return to the A-10 Tournament.

CAREER DAY

Forward Mark DeSantis tied his career high scoring effort with two goals against St. Bonaventure on Friday. His last two-goal performance came against Dayton on Oct. 12, 2007.

The goals on Friday were DeSantis' first goals this season. DeSantis finished with four goals and six assists after 26 games last year. He is expected to at least match last year's goal total as he has been getting several chances, posting 23 shots this season – good enough for third on the team.

Senior forward Prince Olosu tries to maneuver the ball through three Siena players in the Minutemen's 1-0 win on Sept. 6. Olosu has scored three of the Minutemen's 11 goals this season, including a goal last weekend against St. Bonaventure.

Meyers in net against RPI

reversed. The Fighting Sioux outshot the Minutemen, 42-16, but with the help of junior goalie Dan Meyers UMass won, 3-2.

Meyers is expected to start in today's game since sophomore Paul Dainton is still injured. Also missing from the lineup will be senior Scott Crowder, freshman Matt Irwin and freshman David Boehm, who are all out indefinitely.

But returning for the Minutemen are sophomore forward Chase Langeraap and senior defenseman John Wessbecker.

Wessbecker has been out for almost 11 months and getting him back on the ice will be an advantage for UMass' defense. According to Cahoon the way the lineup is being put together there is a strong chance they will see ice time in tonight's game.

"We've still got some walking wounded," Cahoon said. "In the short-term, a few of those guys will start to come back to us. In the long term, they all look like they are going to be fine."

But the Minutemen have roster depth that should fill the void left by those injured and make them competitive enough regardless of who is in the lineup.

Since it is still the beginning of the season, UMass continues to work on all concepts of the game. The Minutemen have focused on forechecking, backchecking, center-ice schemes, regrouping schemes and special teams. They will continue to work on all of these throughout the season, but will change their emphasis depending of their performances week to week.

While working on strategies, Cahoon also makes sure their competitiveness is up, so they can execute their plays and they are capable with their stick work, shooting and passing.

"Now it's a question of us going out there and freeing ourselves, not ever creating a paralysis through analysis," Cahoon said. "They learn all this stuff, now they've got to go out there and do it because they are trained to do it and not be worried or thinking too much about doing it, but actually go out there and execute it."

Jardine out for SU's season

By John Clayton
Daily Orange

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — Scoop Jardine kept playing last year, even as Syracuse's season wound down and the pain in his left shin sharpened.

How could he stop? With the Orange basketball roster already pared down by injuries, Jardine's presence in the backcourt was essential.

Now, it looks like Jardine's toughness will cost him the entire 2008-09 season.

Both Jardine and SU head coach Jim Boeheim said Thursday the sophomore guard will redshirt this upcoming season to allow Jardine to fully rehabilitate a stress fracture in his left tibia.

Jardine suffered the injury early last season, but soldiered through the pain to finish out his freshman season.

"Our main focus is to get him completely healthy," Boeheim said at Syracuse's annual media day Thursday. "It's been six months since we played our last game, right now or close to that, and he's not healthy. We want to make sure he is healthy. So right now he is without question redshirting."

Jardine's absence makes the Syracuse backcourt a bit lighter. The Philadelphia native was expected to come off the bench this year, primarily as a backup to sophomore point guard Jonny Flynn.

For Jardine, his one – year sabbatical is a disappointing turn after a tumultuous first season at SU.

Jardine was suspended for a pair of games in late January for an alleged incident involving the theft of a Syracuse student's SU ID card. "I almost had my college career taken away from me by almost getting kicked out of school," Jardine said.

It was around that time Jardine said the ache in his shin intensified. But with Syracuse's lineup already whittled down to seven regulars – thanks to a pair of ACL injuries to sharpshooter Andy Rautins and Eric Devendorf, and the departure of disgruntled point guard Josh Wright – Jardine had no recourse but to play through the pain.

"After everything we'd been through," Jardine said, "We lost Eric, we lost Andy. I had to tough it out for my teammates and for myself."

Jardine's minutes increased as Big East play persisted. He averaged 5.5 points and 2.5 assists per game, and started seven Big East games. Syracuse finished the season 21 – 14, relegated to its second straight NIT.

Through it all, the soreness in his leg grew more acute. "It hurt, but I kind of got used to the injury and the soreness," Jardine said.

Finally, before the start of the NIT, Jardine told trainer Brad Pike about his ailment. X-rays revealed the stress fracture. Still, Jardine opted to play out the Orange's NIT run (SU lost in the quarterfinals at home to Massachusetts).

Six months later, Jardine's sore leg is still an issue. The sophomore said he is "about 70 percent." He could be healthy in time for part of the Orange's Big East slate. But Boeheim said he wouldn't consider wasting a year of Jardine's eligibility for a few games down the stretch.

"I think that will take two to three months to be 100 percent," Boeheim said. "In that scenario, we would not want to have to bring him in two months down the road and say, 'OK, let's start playing now.' So we would not do that."

That means for a second straight year, Syracuse has lost a member of its backcourt before the season has even started (Rautins severed his ACL playing for Team Canada last summer).

It also means Jardine will have to wait a full year to pen another chapter in his Syracuse career after last year's up-and-down ride.

"Everything I went through last year was a learning experience," Jardine said. "I got to see who was really there for me and who wasn't. Made some tough decisions, but I have to live with them and move on.

"I got a year to work on my game and get healthy, and actually come back better than I played."

Syracuse's Scoop Jardine will not play this season due to overworking an injury from the 2007-08 season that resulted in a stress fracture.

UMass travels to Rensselaer

Depth on roster helps team

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With many players injured and two returning, the Massachusetts hockey team looks to the depths of its roster for its last non-conference game before Hockey East play begins on Friday.

Tonight's game will be the first time Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute (RPI) and UMass (1-1-0) meet since 2002 when the Minutemen beat the Engineers, 4-3, at the Mullins Center.

With no wins this season, RPI (0-3-0) is expected to come out strong against the Minutemen.

"[The Engineers have] struggled a little bit but they are going to be very excited," said UMass coach Don Cahoon. "It's early enough in the season and they want to get this thing tilted in the right direction. So they are going to work real hard."

The Engineers bring fast forwards, a strong goaltender and puck-handling defensemen. They try to outnumber their opponents in rushes by bringing an extra skater into the play – typically one of their defenders.

The backbone of the team is goaltender Mathias Lange. Although RPI has yet to win this season, Lange has shown his strength in net. On Oct. 17, Lange limited New Hampshire to one goal as UNH outshot the Engineers, 40-17. Tonight's matchup will be a good learning experience for the Minutemen – they play New Hampshire on Friday to open Hockey East play.

"[RPI is] the type of team that hangs in there and hangs on regardless of what the shot differential is," Cahoon said. "And we've learned first hand that the shot differential doesn't determine games. We've had it work for us and against us."

At the Ice Breaker Invitational (Oct. 10-11) UMass encountered a team with a strong goaltender, Michigan State's Jeff Lerg. In the matchup, the Minutemen outshot the Spartans, 37-16, but lost, 3-1, because Lerg held his team in the game. The next night, the Minutemen faced North Dakota and the roles were Sophomore forward, Mike Lecomte, laces off against North Dakota in the Minutemen's 3-2 win at the Ice Breaker Invitational on Oct. 11. Lecomte has four shots this season, but last year he tallied seven goals and six assists for the Minutemen in his freshmen campaign.

Villanova's wide receiver Phil Atkinson caught an 84-yard touchdown reception against Rhode Island on Saturday. The Wildcats are 3-0-0 in the Colonial Athletic Association.

Villanova continues to improve in CAA

Maine's offense strong in weekend win over Hofstra

BY JARED GARDNER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Led by the arm and legs of junior quarterback Mike Brusko, Maine (4-3-0, 2-2-0 Colonial Athletic Association) came out on top of an offensive showdown with Hofstra, 41-40, in double overtime.

After accumulating 95 yards of offense in the first half, the home crowd in Orono, Maine, was treated to 336 total yards of Black Bear offense in the second half and two overtimes.

Maine jumped out to a 13-0 lead in the first two minutes before Hofstra (3-4-0, 1-2-0 CAA) scored 20 unanswered points to hold a 20-13 advantage going into halftime.

The Black Bears' offensive attack began in the third quarter with a 14-yard run from Brusko, followed by a 71-yard run from tailback Jared Turcotte.

In the second overtime, a failed extra-point attempt by Pride kicker Roger Williams opened the floodgates for Brusko and the Maine offense. Brusko connected on a 25-yard touchdown pass to Turcotte to tie the game. Kicker Brian Harvey gave the Black Bears a win by nailing the extra point.

The redshirt freshman Turcotte, who earned CAA rookie of the week honors, finished with 120 yards on 13 carries. Brusko compiled 155 passing yards and 113 rushing yards to go along with three touchdowns (one rushing).

Hofstra was led by backup quarterback Steve Probst, who took over in the second quarter for injured starter Cory Christopher. Probst completed 14 of 20 passes for 135 yards and three touchdowns. Pride wide receiver, Otis Lewis, piled up 77 yards on nine catches and was on the receiving end of two of Probst's touchdowns.

Maine will look to win its third consecutive contest next week at home against Northeastern, while Hofstra heads home to battle Delaware.

NO. 7 VILLANOVA'S OFFENSE CONTINUES TO SHINE

Late in the first quarter, trailing 7-0 to unranked Rhode Island, Villanova looked like it might be the victim of a big upset. That was quickly erased on an 84-yard touchdown reception from wide receiver Phil Atkinson. It would be the first of six unanswered touchdowns by the Wildcat offense.

Atkinson, a senior from Media, Pa., hauled in two touchdown grabs and had another on the ground to lead the Wildcats (5-1-0, 3-0-0 CAA) to a win. Tailback Aaron Ball tallied 95 yards on only 10 carries with a touchdown. The Wildcats put up over 500 yards of total offense, while the Rams (2-6-0, 0-4-0 CAA) garnered 220.

The Wildcats, whose only loss is at the hands of Football Bowl Subdivision powerhouse and Fiesta Bowl champion, West Virginia, should climb in next week's rank-

Double OT Minutemen

Defensive strength leads, offense begins to improve

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the Massachusetts men's soccer team, most of its games followed a familiar pattern.

The offense can't score while the defense insures the opponent can't score. One game last weekend followed that pattern; the other had a different script.

The Minutemen (3-6-3, 1-1-1 Atlantic 10), found the back of the net four times against St. Bonaventure in their 4-1 victory, last Friday, after going nearly a month between scores. Sophomore midfielder Ben Arikian broke the four-game scoring drought when his attempted cross was mishandled by the Bonnies' defense and bounced into the net.

Once the first goal was scored, the floodgates opened as Mark DeSantis added two more goals in the second half, with reserve forward Prince Ofosu chipping in a goal and an assist.

Two days later, the Maroon and White battled Duquesne to a 0-0 double-overtime tie, in a defensive struggle which is becoming familiar for UMass. Despite a combined 34 shots and 13 corner kicks, neither side managed to capitalize on their chances, leading to the Minutemen's third tie and second 0-0 tie of the season. The first came against Vermont on Sept. 28.

BECAUSE 100 MINUTES ISN'T ENOUGH

When their game last Sunday against Duquesne went into double overtime, the Minutemen had officially played more than an hour of overtime this season. It marked the fifth time this season that UMass has played into double overtime, as the Minutemen have not ended a game in the first overtime period.

The Minutemen are 1-1-3 in the five games that have been sent into OT. Three of those games went into overtime with both teams tied 0-0. Two of the three ended with no goals, along

Weekend off helps heal UM

Luckey leads Minutewomen from back, injuries plague team once again

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the Massachusetts women's soccer team, not playing this weekend was almost as good as a win. More than halfway into the Atlantic 10 schedule, UMass had its first and only weekend off.

The rest allowed the Minutewomen (6-5-3, 3-3-1 A-10) to heal some of their injured players and hope for some help from certain teams to keep them in contention for the playoffs.

This weekend's results could not have been any better for UMass as it dropped one spot in the standings, despite losing to Rhode Island, 1-0, on Thursday.

Saint Louis beat Richmond and George Washington, who are also in contention for the postseason. The wins pushed the Billikens into fourth place while keeping the Spiders and Colonials a point behind the Minutewomen.

La Salle, UMass' opponent this Friday, also gained ground this weekend as it tied Temple, 1-1, on Friday, and beat St. Joseph's, 2-1, on Sunday. The Explorers (eight points) are currently two points behind the Minutewomen (10 points).

UMass must tie or win to keep La Salle behind in the standings, although its position for the A-10 tournament will again be threatened if it doesn't win in Philadelphia.

LUCKEY EASING PRESSURE ON OFFENSE

For almost two years, goalkeeper Lauren Luckey sat on the sidelines as Kristin Walker protected the net for the Minutewomen, until a knee injury on Oct. 19 kept Walker out for most of the season.

Two days later, Luckey made her debut, but recorded a 1.36 goals-against average (GAA) as she was adjusting to the position. This season, however, has been a completely different story.

The junior is in the top three in nearly every statistical category in the A-10. She is tied for third in shutouts (five) with Richmond's Andrea Young.

Much of the pressure has been on Luckey this season, as the offense has been suffering injuries all season. However, she now boasts the league's top save percentage (.846).

Luckey is second in GAA (0.76). In fact, she is one of five players in the entire conference to allow less than one goal per game.

With four games left in the regular season, Luckey has a better GAA and has recorded more shutouts. If the Minutewomen aren't completely healed for their final road trip to La Salle and Fordham, the pressure will again be on Luckey.

Away from Rudd Field, the goalkeeper's GAA drops slightly (1.14), but is still among the best in the A-10. However, UMass has yet to amass much success on the road, maintaining a 1-5-1 record.

The last time the Minutewomen won an away game was Sept. 17 in a 2-1 win at Albany. But with eight days off before UMass' next match, that rest should give forwards Vanessa Patry and Vanessa Lima time to heal.

Patry is nursing a twisted ankle after she landed on it awkwardly in the final 30 seconds of Wednesday's practice. She still played 55 minutes in Thursday's game against URI, but UMass coach Jim Rudy said she was 65 to 70 percent healed after the loss to the Rams.

Lima has a high hamstring injury that has bothered her for almost a month. The recovery has made significant progress as she scored her second goal, and first game-winner, of the season in a 1-0 win against Dayton on Oct. 12.

Once the injuries heal, the Minutewomen expect to get back some of the offense that they have been missing with Patry and Lima hurt and take some of the pressure off of Luckey.

The Isenberg School of Management's full-time MBA program is ranked first out of 269 business schools as the "Greatest Opportunity for Women," according to the recently published Princeton Review's Best 269.

Among the attributes that put Isenberg School on the list was its supportive environment for women. The program has a high percentage of female students, and almost half of the faculty are female. There are also many programs outside the academic realm, such as the Graduate Women in Business Association, a program geared toward networking opportunities and career development.

The Association provides its members with a series of guest speakers, career fairs, opportunities to meet and network with UMass alumni to create a group for women students, professors and local business women to help aid scholars during and after schooling.

Female students feel supported both in and out of the classroom with similar programs, according to freshman Isenberg student Danielle Muise.

"An obvious program to point out would be the Women in Business club. As a freshman, I am just becoming familiar with it, but I have already begun to experience the opportunities it opens for women to network with other women in business," Muise said.

"Just a few weeks ago they went to a convention put on by Harvard where they got to attend workshops led by successful women like Stacey Snider, the CEO of DreamWorks and Bobbi Brown, the founder of Bobbi Brown Cosmetics. These women are great role models because they are proof that there are opportunities for women to become successful in business," she said.

The program was rated in several other categories, including students' own assessment of it and study material that reflects proportionately both men and women in the field of business.

Another key quality in Isenberg's top ranking is the successful and helpful role models found in the female faculty and alumni alike, according to Eric Berkowitz, dean of Professional Programs.

Among them is Anna Nagurney, the John F. Smith Memorial Professor of Operations Management and Director of the Virtual Center for Supernetworks. She holds many awards and is one of the five professors in the Isenberg School who holds an endowed faculty position.

Current business students are excited about the prestigious award.

"SOM's ranking makes me not only feel extremely proud to be a member of my school but it also provides me hope for my future," she said. "Growing up, we are taught about the disadvantages that women have faced in the histories of all societies and that it is our responsibility to continue our journey forward reaching equality because we are not entirely there yet. Hearing this cements the belief I already had that our school is entirely willing to support women on this matter."

Clinic feeds body, soul

BY LISA DEBENEDICTIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NORTHAMPTON — Walden Behavioral Care, the first clinic focused on the treatment of eating disorders in the five-college area, held an open house for its new facility yesterday.

The clinic, located at 109 Main St. Northampton, is a new branch of the Walden Behavioral Care of Waltham, Mass.

The company's decision to open the clinic in Northampton was largely based upon the realization that there was a lack of treatment options in the area, said Jennifer Smith, Director of Outpatient Programs at the Northampton location.

"We were getting a lot of patients from western Massachusetts, but when it came time to follow up on them, there were no programs out there for them," Smith said.

Northampton's proximity to many colleges, including the University of Massachusetts, also contributed to the decision. According to the company's Web site, college students, especially women, are at a great risk for developing eating disorders, such as Anorexia, Bulimia, Binge-eating Disorder and EDNOS (Eating Disorder Not Otherwise Specified).

Over 15 percent of women ages 17 to 24 have eating disorders. Forty percent of female college students have eating disorders, and 91 percent of female college students have attempted to control their weight through dieting, according to the site.

"There is a lot of pressure in college, and that along with the pressure to be fit, being self conscious because of its social aspects and other mental health factors," said Smith. "Freshman year especially is very stressful. It is a big adjustment for a lot of folks."

The new 2,600 square foot Walden clinic treats patients as young as 13 years old, offering partial hospitalization, intensive outpatient care and a specialized adolescent intensive outpatient program. The center is designed specifically to maintain privacy and support for each of its patients, what is referred to by Smith as a "continuum of care."

"If you come in the door, we can put you in the appropriate level of care, and also transition you into SEEKONK — Fallen American soldier and University of Massachusetts student, Lance Corporal Eric P. Valdepenas, will be honored by his hometown when the Seekonk Post Office is renamed after him.

"We thought about a way to remember Eric in Seekonk, because that was his hometown, we grew up there," said Valdepenas' sister Nora Lough. "The outreach there was unbelievable after he died, and [Seekonk] is really important to us."

Shortly after Valdepenas was killed in action in Iraq, his family received a call from Congressman James McGovern (D-MA) expressing sympathy and support. The next time McGovern held a public meeting in Seekonk, Mr. and Mrs. Valdepenas approached

Holub taps new V.C.

BY SADIE TROMBETTA
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Chancellor's office announced organizational changes within the school Tuesday, including the reinstitution of the Vice Chancellor for Research and Engagement, with a search process beginning immediately.

Public health professor Paul Kostecki will fill the position on an interim basis, Holub said.

The position was restored in an attempt to focus on research and making UMass one of the premier research universities in the country, according to a campus-wide e-mail sent by Chancellor Robert Holub.

"In examining the top public research institutions in the country, I found very few that did not have a research office at the level of vice chancellor or vice president," said Holub. "If we are going to be among these top institutions, I believe it is wise to emulate their emphasis on research... by establishing a vice chancellor for Research and Engagement."

The Vice Chancellor of Research and Engagement will act as the chief research officer on campus, and will oversee the policies and processes concerning research. He or she will also be accountable for representing the University's interests to the government, both state and federal, along with industry and international relationships.

The position involves close work with faculty and staff, and trying to engage students in research across campus, said Holub.

The school will search for candidates who have a record of distinguished interest in research, demonstrate the ability to work with professors, staff, students, administration, and the public, and who are strong and enthusiastic about the campus's mission to become a top research institution. The criterion is the same as it was in the 2000 campaign to fill the same position.

Kostecki was named vice provost for research in 2003. He is involved in research of regulatory issues and technical developments in the assessment and remediation of hydrocarbon contaminated soils. Kostecki also researches the evaluation of fish as toxicological models and ecological risk assessment.

According to the e-mail, making the campus a top notch research institution will affect all aspects of student life. It will give students more opportunity to get involved in every field with hands on experience. It will also attract some of the best faculty across the country.

These changes will help "reach our goal of putting UMass Amherst into the top echelon of public institutions of higher education," the email said.

Increased turnout at 'Ride to Provide'

BY CHRIS SHORES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

At this year's Ride to Provide, a local family-friendly bike ride fundraiser, turnout increased an estimated 50 percent, said Rabbi Saul Perlmutter, executive director at UMass Hillel House.

For the second consecutive year, the Hillel House hosted the event, held on Sunday, October 19, in Amherst and surrounding towns.

"There were riders of all ages," said Perlmutter. "There were students, teenagers, families and older folk. It was really a cross-section of the whole community. It was great."

Riders who participated in the event had the option to bike in one of three routes: a 9, 18 or 36-mile loop. Last year's course had two loops, but the large turnout and feedback prompted the additional path.

Newly appointed Chancellor Robert Holub was on hand for his first Ride to Provide. Accompanying him at the finish line was State Senator Stan Rosenberg and State Representative Ellen Story.

Final figures for the fundraiser were not yet available at the time of publication. Yet, Perlmutter said he believes the total fundraising efforts increased from a year ago. The fundraiser brought in over $37,000 last year, helping the association send groups on alternative spring breaks and making environmentally friendly changes to the Hillel House building.

This year's funds will be divided to support environmentally friendly projects and community service programs.

Such programs include "Challah for a Dallah," where students bake challah, a traditional Jewish egg bread, and sell it for a dollar. The money is sent to help people in Darfur.

In the last three years, fundraising raised from the event helped send students to New Orleans for Alternative Spring Breaks in an effort to rebuild after Hurricane Katrina.

Shari Farberman, a junior, gave a speech at the Ride to Provide about her two trips to New Orleans.

She described how all the aftermath of Katrina she felt detached and "didn't think it would ever have a direct effect on [her] life."

But after being approached by a Hillel staff member, Farberman made the trip down and saw first-hand the extent of the tragic event. Along with her peers, she began the work of first rebuilding houses, and then turning these houses into homes people could be comfortable in.

"The donations you make today go to so much more than just sending a bunch of college kids like me to New Orleans for a week," said Farberman.

"Your donations are restoring lives for countless people and bringing life back to a vibrant city that seemed to have gotten lost along the way. Thank you for changing my life and the lives of so many people you may never meet, but who are forever changed by your contributions," she said.

Hillel also sent students to Uruguay last year to build a home from scratch, and plan to repeat the effort this year.

Students will also be sent to Nicargua and Israel, something

UMPD Crime Log, Oct. 13 – 19

Tuesday

Dylan J. Macarthy, 19, of 4 Chestnut Ave. Burlington, Mass., was arrested in John Quincy Adams dormitory at 9:03 a.m. and charged with possession of a Class D drug and possession to distribute a Class D drug.

According to UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald, a warrant was served and the subsequent arrest was a result of information provided to the Detective Bureau by a confidential informant.

In the room officers allegedly uncovered "A scale, marijuana, cash and zip-lock baggies," said Archbald.

Wednesday

Earle Garret Sievert, 21, of 12 Harrison Ave. Salem, Mass., was arrested on North Pleasant Street at 12:26 a.m. after a traffic stop and charged with marked lanes violation, speeding and OUI liquor.

Thursday

Jared Schneiderman, 20, of 35-38 Utopia Parkway Flushing, N.Y., was arrested in Patterson dormitory at 8:01 p.m. and charged with being in possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

Justin Sleeper, 25, of 170 Longfellow Road. Worcester, Mass., Jordan Burke, 19, of 21 Delaware Ave. Danvers, Mass. and Brian Leo Bartolucci, 20, of 103 Blueberry Pond Drive Brewster, Mass., were arrested in the Southwest Mall at 9:30 p.m. and all three were charged with failure to disperse during a riot.

"This was in response to a call we received to assist the Amherst Police Department and the State Police during the [Red Sox] baseball game that night," said Archbald. "The crowd of 250-350 total was primarily celebratory, and we gave the crowd about 35 minutes to celebrate, but it became somewhat of a problem when people began to body surf."

There were also noise complaints from the dorms, and "bottles and such" were thrown from the towers which caused the officers to act.

Friday

Evan Averill, 19, of 198 Cranberry Road Attleboro, Nicholas A. Holden, 19, of 18 Joy Terrace Methuen, Nicole E. Bellisle, 20, of 2 Morse St. Foxboro, Kate Anne Beksha, 19, of 40 Moore Ave. Franklin and Alyssa M. Rousseau, 19, of 5 Highland Circle Foxboro, were arrested as a result of a traffic stop on University Drive at 6:48 p.m.

All five Massachusetts residents were charged with being in possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

Robert Schaetzl, 18, of 12 Pudding Brooke Drive Pembroke, Mass., was arrested in Lot 33 at 8:23 p.m. and charged with being in possession of liquor while under the age of 21 and misuse of a false license/liquor ID card.

Saturday

Adam J. Alicea, 24, of 297 Ashland Ave. 15 Southbridge, Mass., Katie E. Russ, 20, of 7 Bittersweet Road. Gloucester, Mass. and Christine Marie Jarvis, 20, of 42 White Ave. East Longmeadow, Mass., were arrested at Alumni Stadium at 11:00 a.m. after a disturbance.

"We had an incident with a guy when he was standing where the marching band was marching," said Archbald. "He was interfering with the band by pouring beer on a couple of band members and throwing his shoulder into them, to slow them down."

According to the deputy chief, the man in question was Alicea and was ultimately charged with disorderly conduct. Russ was charged with being in possession of liquor while under the age of 21 and Jarvis is charged with being in possession of liquor while under the age of 21 and forge/misuse of a RMV document.

Victor T. Scena, 30, of 20 Homeward Lane Walpole, Mass., was arrested after being involved in a property damage accident on Massachusetts Avenue at 4:42 p.m. and charged with marked lanes violation and OUI liquor.

Sunday

Justin Thurston Montgomery, 25, of 7380 Stirling Road Hollywood, FL was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on North Pleasant Street at 2:09 a.m. and charged with failure to stop/yield, marked lanes violation and OUI liquor.

Ryan M. Lemmo, 19, of 33 Davis Ave. Attleboro, Mass., was arrested in Lot 33 at 2:15 a.m. and charged with B&E vehicle/boat in nighttime for felony.

Benjamin G. Manyara, 27, of 10 Exeter St. Arlington, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop in Lot 42, south of Boyden Gym, at 2:41 a.m. and charged with speeding in violation special regulation and OUI liquor.

James M. Downing, 19, of 93 Bradstreet Ave. Lowell, Mass., James Hickey, 18, of 32 Vinton Terrace Rockland, Mass., Ryan Patrick McCarthy, 18, of 269 East Short Lake Owassa Road Newton, NJ, Timothy Stewart Whalley, 18, of 60 Gibbs Ave. Wareham, Mass., Anthony Gardener, 21, of 171 Fearing St. Amherst, Mass. and Abbie M. Gagen, 18, of 8 Daniel Drive North Easton, Mass. were arrested in the Southwest Mall at 9:30 p.m. and face charges. Whalley, Gardner and Gagen are charged with disorderly conduct.

Downing and McCarthy are charged with disorderly conduct and resisting a police officer making a lawful arrest. Hickey is charged with disorderly conduct and being in possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

Goin' tough for recent grads

By Megan Twohey
(MCT)

CHICAGO — Kelly Stevens is suffering from buyer's remorse.

The 29-year-old from Fargo, N.D., took out more than $60,000 in loans to pay for a bachelor's degree in fashion marketing from the Illinois Institute of Art. She was convinced it would allow her to open her own store or work for a major fashion company – basically, to make more money.

But nearly a year after graduating, she is waiting tables at a comedy club. Every week, she gets rejected from half a dozen marketing jobs. She can no longer make payments on some of her loans. She can barely scrape by.

"I can't open my own store in this economy," Stevens said. "Marketing jobs are among those that have been hardest hit. Sometimes it feels like I should never have gotten that degree."

Money is only one of the reasons to go to college, of course. But with college costs skyrocketing and the economy worsening, the question of whether higher education is a worthy financial investment is no longer a no-brainer.

For decades, the earnings gap between college graduates and high school graduates grew and grew. Get a bachelor's degree, and you were almost guaranteed to be a lot better off.

But the gap in income has started to shrink in recent years. U.S. Census data show that in 2007 people with a bachelor's degree earned 90 percent more than high school graduates, down from a 96 percent gap seven years earlier.

Meanwhile, more students are taking on debt. The debt levels are growing. And some graduates are unable to land jobs that allow them to pay back their loans.

Most experts insist that going to college is generally worth it. College graduates still earn substantially more than high school graduates on average: $59,365 annually compared with $33,609.

But they caution that some college choices are no longer a wise investment. Students destined for low-paying careers, they say, simply cannot manage certain debt levels. Loans can surpass $100,000 depending on the school and the borrower.

"If you're going to be a nursery school teacher your whole life, you should not be taking out a lot of loans," said Sandy Baum, senior policy analyst for the College Board and an economics professor at Skidmore College. "That's the problem. It's an investment people make without knowing how they will pay it off."

People in business jobs can manage $46,000, according to calculations the Chicago Tribune made with a formula created by Baum. So for Stevens, paying back nearly $65,000 in loans was almost certain to be a struggle. Now that she is stuck in a low-paying service job, it's become impossible.

Meanwhile, about one-third of college students drop out – dashing any return on their investment.

Does attending an elite college make a difference? The answer is unclear. While some researchers have found that graduates of top schools earn more on average than those from less prestigious institutions, others have found no difference.

Debbie Quinn, director of guidance at West Aurora High School, said she doesn't dissuade students from going to college because of the cost. But she encourages them to think about their career path and potential earnings.

Recognizing that the cost of college could steer students away from important but low-paying professions, Congress passed legislation last year that will gradually cut interest rates on certain government loans, allow borrowers to make smaller loan payments if they are earning less, and forgive the loans of students who serve in public-service careers for 10 years.

Private colleges are increasing the assistance they offer, so fewer students are required to take out loans and those who do will take on less of a burden, said Ron Ehrenberg, director of Cornell University's Higher Education Research Institute.

"The concern was that with high loan burdens, we were influencing the professional outcomes of students," Ehrenberg said.

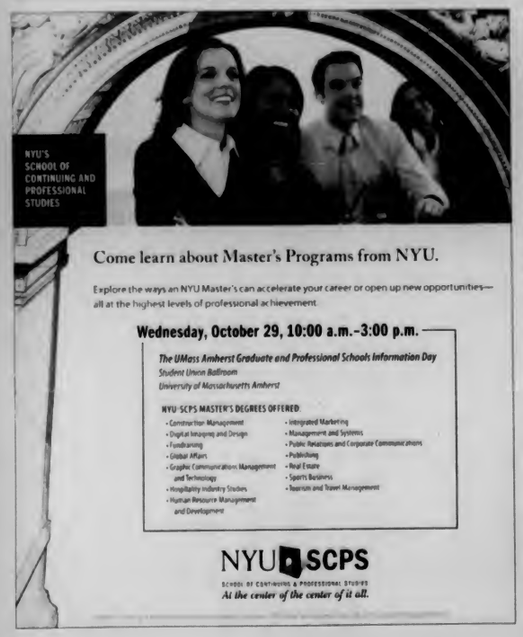
Experts point out that the college experience is not just about financial rewards. There is also that business about learning a few things. Students are able to explore their interests. They often become inspired by subjects they never knew existed and are able to view the world through a broader lens.

"There's value added when it comes to critical thinking and moral reasoning," said Ernest Pascarella, a University of Iowa professor who has studied the effects of college.

The education also extends outside the classroom, through exposure to classmates from different backgrounds and participation in extracurricular activities.

Priscilla Adeniji, 22, a finance major at Chicago State University, says her choices at college appear to be paying off.

Scholarships have covered almost the entire cost of her education, making this the first year she's had to take out a loan, for $5,000. She graduates in December, and the Big Four consulting firms already are dangling jobs with salaries starting at $55,000.



Adeniji said she also gained a lot from her classes and participation in a sorority and other activities.

"Career-wise, college has been very important for me," she said. "But it's also about knowledge. If I wasn't in school, I wouldn't be able to understand what's going on with the economy and with other things that affect my life."

Valdepenas will have his hometown Seekonk Post Office renamed after him this spring in a ceremony. Congressman James McGovern came up with the idea and his bill was passed by the president on Oct. 13.

"It was really the work of Jim McGovern and the Congressman's office," said Lough. "They were so supportive and sensitive in how they went about it. He really wanted to do this for my family."

McGovern, touched by their situation, asked Mr. and Mrs. Valdepenas to write a biography of their son. Shortly after it was submitted, McGovern came up with the idea to pass a bill to name the post office in Valdepenas' memory.

The bill was unanimously passed by Congress, then passed through the Senate and was signed by President Bush on Oct. 13. The dedication ceremony is being planned for early spring.

"It's an important and exciting time for us, because in a world full of sadness and grief, it's a permanent reminder that Eric will be remembered," said Lough. "I think that's one of the most important things you can do to support a family that's lost a loved one in the service."

Valdepenas was a member of the 1st Battalion, 25th Marine Regiment reserve unit based in Fort Devens, Mass.

He was reported KIA on Sept. 4, 2006, along with two other soldiers, when their vehicle hit a hidden, improvised explosion device in the Al-Anbar province of Fallujah, Iraq.

Valdepenas has since been honored at home and at UMass in many ways.

At Bishop Hendricken High School in Warwick, R.I., his alma mater, a lacrosse scholarship has been set up in his name to acknowledge players displaying qualities of an "unsung hero."

Another scholarship in his name is given by the UMass School of Business. The program helps students who are struggling financially.

Valdepenas was also selected to be memorialized by the non-profit relief group Project Compassion, who paints pictures of fallen soldiers for grieving relatives.

Lough describes the pictures as "timeless pieces of art that show how much appreciation they have for [the soldiers'] sacrifice."

Valdepenas has also been honored by the U.S. military. Honors awarded to him include the Global War on Terrorism Service Medal, the National Defense Service Medal, a Combat Action Ribbon, a Sea Service Deployment Ribbon, the Armed Forces Reserve Medal, the Iraq Campaign Medal and a Purple Heart.

During his studies at UMass from 2003 to 2004, Valdepenas was a pre-major in mechanical engineering. In 2004 he left school to join the Marines reserves, and was called to duty in September 2005.

Lough said her brother planned to return to UMass for the Spring 2007 semester, after his tour's scheduled conclusion late in 2006.

"The showing of support, community-wise, has been really great," said Lough. "Not only our political leaders, but also everyday people we have known growing up have been just amazing. I think without their support, encouragement and sympathy it would be a lot more difficult than what it is now."

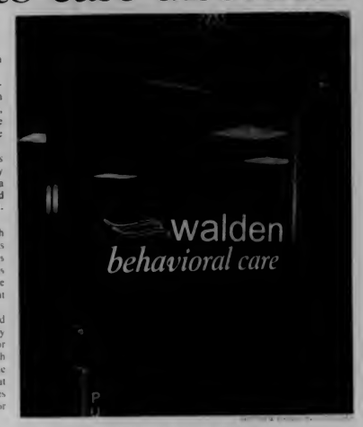
a different level of care," Smith added.



Unique to Walden's specialized care plan is what is known as their Whole Health Approach, which focuses not only on a single system, but treating the "whole person, body and mind."

"It is taking account all factors in a person's life: involving family to the largest extent possible, yoga and expressive arts, cognitive and behavioral therapy ... personalized needs," Smith said.

Walden's new location, which has already made connections with each of the five college's health services, including UMass Health Services, is seen by some UMass students as an excellent contribution to the area.

"I think it is a great idea," said UMass sophomore and hospitality and tourism management major Hannah Jackson. "Especially with so many young women at college out here, it is nice to know that there is now a place that provides that kind of specialized care for people who many need it."

Perlmutter said he had never dreamed imaginable.

"If we hadn't had a successful Ride to Provide, we wouldn't be doing this," he said. "This is what makes these trips possible."

The event also used a symbolic example to display the importance of community to Hillel. The course's three loops were timed so they would meet simultaneously at a sukkah rest stop. A sukkah is a three-sided structure that serves as a traditional dwelling for the Sukkot, a jewish holiday season.

At a sukkah, individuals take two symbols of the Sukkot festival, a lulav and an etrog. Holding one in each hand, a prayer is said as part of a short ritual. Rabbis who rode in the event were on hand to initiate the ritual and everyone was given the opportunity to participate.

"It's a way to link the practice of Judaism with a community fun healthy bike ride," said Courtney Pupkin, development director of UMass Hillel.

Pupkin explained that the Ride to Provide is intentionally scheduled to take place during the Sukkot. The significance of the sukkah is that it is traditionally a temporary hut for Jewish people during the Sukkot holiday. Jewish people are encouraged to be extra hospitable during this period of time.

The funds raised by the Ride to Provide go to accomplishing these things, Perlmutter said.

"We live in a temporary shelter for the week, but there are some people who have been living against their wills in temporary shelters for years," he said. "We try to connect the ideals with Sukkot with what we're supporting in the ride."

Perlmutter said that the Ride to Provide will return next year, perhaps with the addition of an even longer route.

No choice in matters of life

Brad DeFlumeri

Look hard enough around campus and you will find a liberal pro-choice enthusiast who is quick to deny men an opinion on the matter of abortion.

The pro-abortion crowd often argues that a man's perspective on the matter is simply irrelevant because men are not physically invested in the pregnancy or the abortion. At this moment, these folks should look away, because I am a man and I am strongly pro-life.

Abortion is not a fundamental right of privacy hidden in the "emanations" and "penumbras" of the Constitution, as pro-abortion Supreme Court Justices have found. Rather, abortion is murder, and its most ardent supporters, while purporting to protect the range of choices afforded to a pregnant woman, consistently reveal a flagrant contempt for the sacred rights of a defenseless human being growing inside of her.

Baby-butcher groups, led by organizations such as the National Abortion Rights Action League (NARAL) and Planned Parenthood, have never been more politically active or financially formidable. NARAL has saturated the Internet with anti-McCain ads and is supporting liberal candidates in elections across the country. Planned Parenthood went door-to-door in New Hampshire this past weekend screaming bloody murder about the threat to a women's right to choose that a McCain presidency would pose.

Thankfully, one of John McCain's goals as president would be to eliminate a women's right to choose … to kill her baby. He has articulated a refreshing willingness to overturn Roe V. Wade and return the question of abortion to the states, where the judicial decree that wrongly legalized abortion in 1973 would give way to the will of elected legislatures. In the process, he has helped to reassure pro-life conservatives that the top of the GOP ticket is equally as serious about this issue as the bottom, where Mrs. Palin's own personal choice to have a baby with Down syndrome represents an inspiring model for the pro-life cause.

Demonstrating the leadership on this issue that his opponent lacks, Mr. McCain has called on faith-based and community organizations to tend to mothers in need while working to build the social consensus necessary to end abortion. Last week, McCain, for the first time in front of a national television audience, derided Mr. Obama's opposition to the Born-Alive Infants Protection Act as an Illinois State Senator. This bill would protect the right to legal protections – namely, not being discarded – of a baby born despite an attempt to abort. This is a right that Obama did not acknowledge as a state senator.

Like the other abortion fanatics in his party, he apparently insists the mother's right to choose trumps any chance at survival for her baby, even if the abortion is unsuccessful.

His explanation of his vote, like other rationalizations he has made about his views on abortion and on taxes, was half-hearted and unconvincing, recklessly denying the issue the seriousness with which a presidential candidate must treat it. Even on the issue of when life begins – a point which many embryology experts conclusively agree is at conception, where a baby will have the totality of its lifelong genetic makeup – Mr. Obama, in August, characteristically evaded rendering a decision, claiming the question was "above his pay grade."

Indeed it is.

"At its core, abortion is a human tragedy. To effect meaningful change, we must engage the debate at a human level," John McCain has said recently.

On this issue as on so many others, Barack Obama, far from speaking to Americans on a human level, has been a calm and confident political chameleon, able to dupe just enough anxiety-filled Americans into support with mellifluous oratory and rosy promises of renaissance, without pointing to any historical precedent or personal experience. The public revelation of Mr. Obama's vote in the Illinois legislature – something Mr. McCain ought to have been talking about for months – now has the chance to mobilize enough swing-state pro-lifers to make this election more interesting than the Obama flag-waving mainstream media suggests it will be.

With a dizzying stream of gloom emerging from the nightly news, Americans may have forgotten the demoralizing American weakness and economic stagflation of the Jimmy Carter years to which Mr. Obama is threatening to return us. However, my surmise is that enough pro-life voters are listening and aware of Mr. Obama's eagerness to protect the callous brutality of abortion-on-demand, a tragic stain on our country hopefully only one John Paul Stevens heartbeat away from being outlawed.

Last March, in Pennsylvania, Mr. Obama said he wouldn't want one of his daughters "punished with a baby," if impregnated as a teenager. His campaign was quick to explain this statement away, but the point was made, and his frightening insensitivity on this issue was made evident.

With seemingly so much against us, conservatives can only hope that this election turns on the issue of life. For pro-life voters this year the choice could not be any more profoundly clear. Mr. McCain represents the best hope of so many to end abortion's twisted tyranny on our culture.

Champions of the dignity of human life cannot afford the malicious impact of an Obama presidency.

For students, moving beyond fun and games

Parisa Saranj

No matter how long I have lived in the United States, how good my English has become or how much American slang I use in my conversations, I am still a foreigner. And I love to observe cultures.

There is a new lesson in each behavior I witness. I have flashbacks to my days of living at home. And I love to watch wonders I can never imagine in my own life due to certain traditions and even religious roles I am bonded to. Yet, it is a fine line between observing and judging, and that is what I avoid as best as I can, first as a human being and second as a writer.

I am constantly comparing my definition of being young and what a person at this age should do with my fellow classmates and peers. Though there is an immense gap which seems impossible to be bridged and a slight similarity, I enjoy digging into cultural and social causes of such differences.

Last Saturday, I was taking a bus late at night after a gathering with some dear friends and celebrating the sacred Hindu tradition of Karwa Chauth – an optional fasting of women for the sake of long life and prosperity of the beloved.

The bus was crowded and the scenes of drunkards were not few. I was mesmerized by the tale of the Hindu function and its purpose which is supposes to strengthen the relations between men and women. With the environment so loud and crowded, I was distracted and eventually started to remember my own freshman years of working almost three jobs to support my immigrant life.

I felt so old and smiled at the enjoyment of the faces. But soon, I wondered how many of these guys are going to appear on Facebook with a drunken picture, or how many are going to do something really crazy which will be costly and even regretful.

One must ask when these drunkard weekends or time consuming games exceed the level of fun and amusement.

There also has been the recent restart of the famous Human vs. Zombies tag game, which I have been observing very closely this time. I joked with many friends whether they have nothing better to do.

Like the beauty of diverse America, I heard many mixed opinions on the game. Some shrugged in laughter and noted that loosening up and having fun are important parts of life especially in precious years of college.

Some warned me that playing a healthy game is much better than doing drugs, crimes or even being totally useless. Others, who appeared more aged and experienced, sounded serious and somewhat angry. They argue that the future of United States is on the hands of the young college generation. Playing tag on campus, for them, is not as worthy as community service, volunteering or distinguished internships.

I too agree with many in this matter that some mischievous, fun tag games and a carefree, entertaining weekend are indeed needed once in a while. But this too leads to a fine line. When are we going to stop, or do we even need to bring to a close to such college lifestyle?

As worried as some might be, there are shining rays of hopes for our dear UMass. The University campaign against alcohol abuse is winning national attention and the so called Zoo-mass is losing its reputation as a failure/party school such as a 26 percent drop in binge drinking and 38 percent drop in frequentl heavy drinking.

This brings me to a quote by Henry Wechsler, a specialist on collegiate drinking at the Harvard School of Public Health and the author of "Dying to Drink: Confronting Binge Drinking on College Campuses," who claims that at large universities, students react to what their friends and their immediate peer group do, not what the entire school does.

I sit back and observe, add more knowledge to my pile of cultural experiences of the West and wonder whether I had a better youth or these people I am seeing. However, the more I see the depth of differences from language to religion and environment between societies, the more I realize that it is not about who is wrong and who is right. Rather, it is about who is using the best of opportunities and time.

Unless these fun times are abused, there should be no fear. Also, I do not claim a harsh criticism on the kids I saw on the bus, or the humans turning into zombies. I do not suggest they adopt my version of fun, nor will I try out their version.

The only thing that makes me ponder is the growing popularity of HvZ games. As a witness, I ask myself what is the urgent desire to drink up the weekend? Does it mean that our generation is ignored, bored or marginalized? Does it mean that the intelligence among our generation is decaying? Or is it just a temporary passage of the young's lives?

From the nightly news, inspiration for us all

Matt Kushi

Every once in a while, we encounter a special person that changes our outlook on life or inspires us to be a better human. One of those people came to light in the public eye this past week when her emotionally moving story was highlighted on ABC's World News with Charles Gibson.

No, she is not a millionaire or some great humanitarian. She isn't even in college yet. Rather, Kristin Pass is 18 years old and a Homecoming Queen in her senior year of high school. What makes her story so touching is not even so much that she won the distinction of Homecoming Queen, a title that a lot of high school girls dream of winning. It is that she won the distinction of being Homecoming Queen despite the fact that she has Down syndrome.

"Down syndrome affects one in every 733 babies born each year," according to the National Down Syndrome Society. This "occurs when a person has three, not two, copies of the 21st chromosome," according to ABC News.

This story is not just about a girl with Down syndrome overcoming adversity and winning one of the most prestigious titles in high school. It is not just about a community that stood behind this girl as friends should. This is an example of human decency and human compassion at its pinnacle.

In a year that has brought out some of America's long and shameful prejudices, such as racism and sexism, this story is a shining light to those who seek to make this a better world. This has been a year that I have found myself defending the rights of people with disabilities by writing articles and getting into an online argument, about the use of the word 'retard' in the movie "Tropic Thunder." What this story shows me is that this world does have hope to vanquish the prejudices that exist among us.

This story touched my heart in a way that I wish would happen more often. Too often we read about stories with a negative tone to it. What I want to see is more uplifting stories of human decency like this one. Excuse me if I seem overly sentimental about this seemingly small story but as the younger brother to a man who has severe disabilities, this story means more to me than I can explain in words.

Excuse me if I seem overly sentimental … this story means more to me than I can explain in words.

While watching Charles Gibson break this story on the news, so many emotions were pulling at me. Seeing the face of Kristin Pass, a girl who many would shun just because of the disability that she has, radiate with happiness due to the fact that her peers had honored her with so great an honor, left me with a sense of happiness for her. The fact that her school voted this honor to her is amazing enough. What makes it even more amazing is the fact that it wasn't planned. Kristin Pass won her crown without any help. There was no special arrangement to give it to her because of her disability. She won it because she is a decent human being.

What Kristin's little sister, Kendall Pass, had to say about her sister and about people with disabilities in general is what I wish for you to take from this story. In this clip, which can be found on the ABC News website, Kendall Pass talks about how much of an inspiration her sister is to her and that people with disabilities are no different than you and me. All they need is to be given the chance by their fellow peers.

As much as we can draw inspiration from Kristin Pass as a person who does not let life's adversities knock her down, we can also draw inspiration from her school. Instead of shunning Pass because of her disability, they welcomed her with the warmth of friends.

While this may seem like a small act, I have personally seen many cases where a whole student body or school system drives a person that has disabilities from their school. It always ends up pretty sad for the kid with disabilities, who not only does not get an education but also has nearly no friends. It makes me so happy to read about a girl who is not noticed because of her disabilities but because who she is as a person and the fact that she is surrounded by caring friends that really do appreciate her.

It is said that when Kristin Pass was named Homecoming Queen, there was not a dry eye in the place. I believe it, as I was struggling to hold my emotions as I read about what this girl had overcome, the strong show of support for her by her community, and the great character that her friends have for treating her like a good friend.

This story is amazing and I know that I have drawn on inspiration from Kristin Pass and the community of Aledo, Texas. I hope that you have too.

Mirah well received

Singer's delicate performance enchants Northampton crowd

By Emma Reed
Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON – Though it lacked a full house, The Iron Horse Music Hall was perfectly spaced for genuine Mirah fans to enjoy a mellow night of cooing vocals and back-porch finger picking.

Yesterday evening, opening band No Kids performed to the beat of their own drum – literally. The band's focal points were on their two electric keyboards and unique, child-like drum beats.

Lead singer Justin Kellam's wispy vocals propelled the set, while the intricate couplings of the keyboards provided a solid backbone for each song.

No Kids gave the crowd something to dance to. Their performance was well received, but anticipation hovered as the crowd eagerly waited for Mirah to take the stage.

As she glided onto the stage, Mirah's shoes immediately came off, creating an atmosphere of comfort and intimacy that the crowd eagerly embraced.

"Thank you for listening. It makes me more comfortable," Mirah admitted midway through her intimate set at the venue.

Spewing amusing anecdotes and making nervous mistakes, Mirah awkwardly stood on stage as if she were a child performing at a talent show, but with flair and a captive, loving audience.

Performing as if she was engaged in an intimate conversation, the singer stole the attention of the room with her angelic voice and accompanying acoustic guitar.

The generally quiet crowd was pratically bewitched throughout the night. Mirah's voice lulled fans into a dreamlike trance while her subtle yet empowering finger picking demanded attention.

During fan favorites "Cold, Cold Water," "Jerusalem" and "The Sun," the crowd left the work up to Mirah. Merely humming and swaying to the music, there was not much crowd involvement with the exception of an offering of stadium-style praise at the end of each song.

What truly got the crowd going was the array of stories and jokes Mirah told.

"I was all upset about touring and how hard it was, so I called my mom. The first thing she said to me was, 'Think of Barack.'"

Fans belly-laughed and cheered as Mirah modestly moved on to her next song and then to her forthcoming joke.

While speaking to the crowd, Mirah had an air of confidence and cwmfort, but while singing it was as if she was a teenager reading her diary aloud. Mirah kept her eyes on her guitar in a rather nervous manner when they weren't completely closed.

Her apprehension was endearing, and fans responded warmly to her earnest nature. Listening silently and adoringly, fans watched as Mirah sang and strummed her personal confessions.

Unlike the more bombastic verses of her studio recordings with Phil Elvrum [of The Microphones] and the Black Cat Orchestra, Mirah's lyrics were more subdued.

Accompanied the simple strumming of her guitar, she sang such tender-hearted lyrics as, "When the oxygen comes, don't forget to breath," and "Love might just be an economy, but I don't believe in property."

Despite the change of scenery and sound, fan's opinions did not sway.

"Apples in the Trees," the last song of the night, was awarded with great applause. Fans sang and danced along as Mirah prepared to finish her set.

But, whoops, hollers and venue reputation ("I heard that all the other artists come back out when they play here!") brought the artist back on stage for two more songs.

The heavy orchestration of "The Garden" was replaced with synchronized clapping and stomping from the crowd, making it the most upbeat song of the night.

As soon as the house lights came out of hiding, fans streamed out of the small venue and into the streets.

"That was my first time seeing her. It was so great!" one fan exclaimed.

"Wow, she has a voice like an angel. And just with one acoustic guitar, that's pretty cool!" another fan yelled over the chattering and laughing.

Despite a few strumming mishaps and forgotten lyrics, Mirah performed each song with bold honesty and pure talent.

Refreshingly sincere and simple, each song was like a cocoon to crawl up in – warm and tender.

Mirah performed for a small crowd at Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall yesterday evening. The singer's soft, acoustic stylings were well received.

For announcer, hockey is where the heart is

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Staff

It's Friday afternoon at the Mullins Center Ice Rink. By the site of a former snack bar stands Donnie Moorhouse, a freelance music columnist and hockey announcer for the University of Massachusetts.

"I guess the snack bar's gone," he says, before heading towards a table that overlooks the rink.

The place is mostly empty, save for a few skaters on the ice. Moorhouse slips into a chair and, although occasionally wringing his hands together, he emanates a relaxed air as he speaks.

Moorhouse, 43, has freelanced for The Springfield Republican since 1993. For the past six years, he provided play-by-play announcing for the UMass Minutemen hockey team. He's also made stories for founded non-profit organizations and covered many concerts.

Before becoming a columnist, Moorhouse was a songwriter. He describes his band, Breakdown, as a roots-rock Americana band in the style of John Mellencamp.

Breakdown gained success, signing with Cypress Records in 1990. But when the label bottomed out, so did the band. It was then that Moorhouse turned to writing.

Chris Hemel, a former music columnist for The Republican, was familiar with Moorhouse's work. It was Hemel who first urged him to write for the paper.

"He said, 'this is what you should be doing,'" Moorhouse said.

After sending a few sample columns to Hemel, he began contributing frequently.

Moorhouse, who majored in English at American International College, has "never been a stickler for form, or for AP form." Although he purchased a copy of the Associated Press Stylebook and Libel Manual years ago, "I don't think I've seen it since," he says.

To Moorhouse, it's more important for a writer to be engaged. He can recall attending concerts early on in his career, watching as critics huddled together in small packs to talk about a band's latest tour or album. It was too literal for Moorhouse, who preferred to enter with a fresh perspective.

"I tried not to listen to the band's album or do research beforehand," he said.

"Google wasn't around. If you did need to find something, people would use the – well, it's called the rock n' roll bible," said Moorhouse, "the Billboard '94 or something like that." When the bible failed, he would access information through CompuServe.

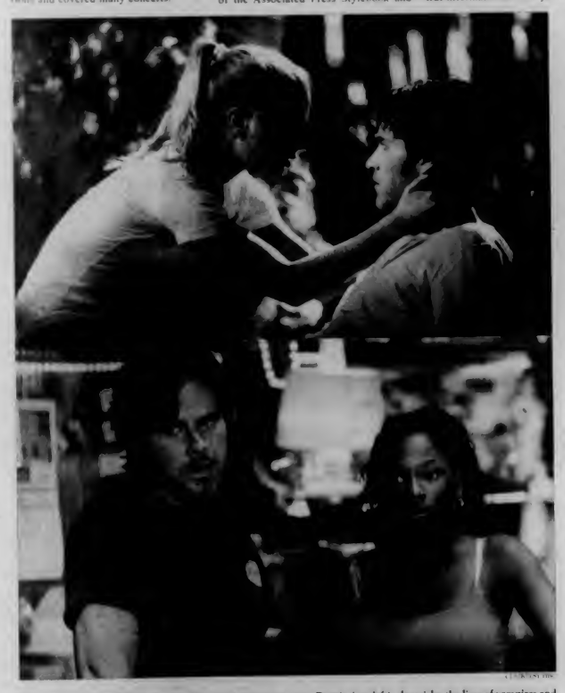
"Now I can get information here," he says, motioning to the black cell phone that lies on the table in front of him. But information can only take an article so far. The idea, Moorhouse says, is to bring the concert experience alive in print.

To detail his point, he recalls a Phish concert he once covered for The Republican. Immediately, Moorhouse was struck by the show's similarity to "Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory." In his article, he likened the show to the experience of entering Wonka's factory for the first time.

And this would be the Gene Wilder version, which, he adds with a smile, plays on loop with "Chitty Chitty Bang Bang" in his house.

Moorhouse lives with his wife and three sons, aged seven to 14. He also has a daughter who works at Disneyworld as Mickey Mouse. She loves it, Moorhouse said, because she gets to dance.

Although covering concerts keeps him busy, often requiring that he journeys to local and out of state venues, Moorhouse has managed to branch out to other areas of interest.



At 36, Moorhouse began doing radio work for WRNX, 100.9 FM. "I decided that for my retirement, I'd like to do a weekly column and a radio show," he said with a laugh.

In 2006, Highland Shore Media produced "Cathedral Pines," a spiritual thriller which was written by Moorhouse.

"It took two hours and was 80 pages long," said Moorhouse of his initial script for the film. But to be made, Moorhouse discovered that the script needed to be at least 90 pages long. He returned to the drawing board, using a computer software program to complete the script.

"True Blood," a new HBO television drama series starring Anna Paquin (top left), chronicles the lives of vampires and their interactions with humans.

New drama series stands chance of survival on HBO

By Haley Navarro
Collegian Correspondent

One of HBO's newest series in this fall's primetime line-up is "True Blood."

The show is about a human named Sookie Stackhouse who falls in love with a vampire named Bill Compton.

The whole premise of the show, which is set in Bon Temps, a fake town in Louisiana, revolves around vampires who have been living secretly among humans for centuries upon centuries, until the Japanese created synthetic blood, called true blood.

This counterfeit blood supplies the vampires with all of the nutrients they need without having to kill a human.

Now that the vampires are part of the mainland, they want the same rights as humans and to be accepted by society.

The lead role of Sookie is played by Anna Paquin, which is her first mainstream role since the "X-men" trilogy.

Stephen Moyer, who plays Bill Compton, is an English actor with an impressive resume. He has only been on U.S. television a handful of times and had done the majority of his acting in England.

"True Blood" is based on "The Southern Vampire Mysteries," a series originally penned by Charlaine Harris. It consists of 8 books, which means that if "True Blood" stays on the air, there will be a lot of material to work with.

As a matter of fact, "True Blood" was renewed for a second season after the first episode premiered on September 7.

The beauty of being on HBO is the leisure of using profanity and nudity. This way, the producers and directors of the show can portray "True Blood" in a way that they couldn't on the cable networks.

Tara, who is Sookie's best friend, has the mouth of a trucker, which serves as comic relief in situations that aren't supposed to be funny, including her mother's exorcism.

Sookie's brother Jason is quite promiscuous and the show chronicles all of the girls he has relations with.

Among this fictional setting of vampires and humans living in close quarters, the level of racism takes a new toll.

Though some of the show's characters are receptive to vampires, other characters believe that the vampires shouldn't have rights or "are not holy."

The new sexual craze becomes sleeping with vampires and allowing them to drink a woman's blood, which happens rather frequently on the show. The women who perform these erotic acts with vampires are known as "fanghangers."

Within the main plot of Sookie and Bill's romance lies another subplot of a series of murders that occur in Bon Temps.

The one connection between the murders is that all of the women killed had associated with vampires.

The sheriff and the police detective of the town are convinced that Jason Stackhouse committed the murders because he was associated with all of the deceased women.

It was originally thought to be a vampire who was committing the crimes, but after the detective and sheriff interviewed Bill, it was revealed that if a vampire had killed the girls, he would've drained their bodies of their blood.

However, when the bodies were found, their blood was still in their bodies. From this, they could conclude that the killer was a local, possibly a character on the show.

Another interesting aspect brought up in the show is the introduction of a new drug "V." the vampire's blood. Since the vampires "came out," people have started ingesting, snorting and injecting their blood. "V" apparently gives the user comparable feelings to LSD, and Jason appears to be addicted to this drug.

"True Blood" seems to get more and more exciting as new episodes premiere. Each episode always ends with a cliffhanger or a sneak peek into future episodes. Since it is on HBO, they are a full hour with no commercials.

Although only seven episodes have premiered, it seems like the audience will be begging for more. "True Blood" airs every Sunday night at 10 p.m. on HBO.

Latest "Cure" record leaves fans in reverie

The Cure will release "4:13 Dream," their 13th studio album, on October 27. The album's diverse appeal makes it one of their best to date.

By Emma Reed
Collegian Correspondent

Full of failed loves, morbid overtones and world endings, "4:13 Dream" (Suretone/Geffen) is unabashedly The Cure.

In pure Robert Smith style, the album redefines who he is as a writer in the midst of exploring new ways to be depressed.

As the front man, Smith gives a serious twist to The Cure's whimsical clairvoyance with the band's newest installment.

After twelve studio albums to date, Smith has abandoned his usual lovesick howlings of a man apart. He lets loose with grainy, howling vocals and a wailing, unbridled double guitar, creating an almost pop-like sound.

After the sad release of 2000's "Bloodflowers," it was clear that Smith and his fellow mates needed to reinvent their sound, or just remember their roots.

Luckily, four years later, the release of their 2004 album "The Cure" was met with resounding praise, and it is safe to say that "4:13 Dream" will be no different.

Smith has resorted back to his jaw-dropping ramblings of obsession and love that made him the goth-pop God of this generation.

"4:13 Dream," originally scheduled for release in the summer of 2007, was delayed due to the band's constant and obsessive revisions.

To ease the pain, the album has been preceded by the release of singles on the thirteenth day of each of the past four months, hence the name "4:13 Dream." The singles released included "The Only One," "Freakshow," "Sleep When I'm Dead" and "The Perfect Boy."

One of the most musically diverse Cure albums to date, "4:13 Dream" gives fans a taste of what Smith has been trying to accomplish all these years. As the only original member left in The Cure, Smith has seized the opportunity to create an album that emodies him completely.

Possibly the best executed song on the album is "Underneath the Stars," in which Smith takes his musical talent to another level with ascending and descending guitar riffs, subtly brilliant snares, and dreamlike synthetic effects.

The execution of the album's ent throughout the entire album, without much thought of varying the lyrical content. Smith holds strong to his title of "the messiah of melancholy" with his disheartening lyrics, such as "Don't ask me what I was before, if I was anything at all, there's nothing you can know about me now."

Nevertheless, synthesized keyboards and upbeat guitar riffs keep fans from post-Cure suicidal thoughts.

Musical experimentation and prowess saves Smith on this album. Without the stellar musical engulfment felt throughout the entire album, the album would flop lyrically.

"4:13 Dream" brings fans back to the "Friday I'm In Love" days with "Freakshow" and "The Only One," which pop and rock with effervescence.

But, as to be expected with any Cure album, "4:13 Dream" does have instances of disillusionment as Smith's vocals in both "The Scream" and "Sleep When I'm Dead" are dark and desperate.

The album quickly transforms with "The Hungry Ghost," which sounds almost like a 90's U2 ballad.

Finishing off the album with vexatious whining and self-fixated lyrics is the intensely electric "It's Over."

Smith takes past, present and future heartbreaks, and adds excitingly diverse musical interludes and morosely eccentric lyrics to create "4:13 Dream," one of the bands best albums to date.

Hockey for Moorhouse

sons. When a woman surfaces, fearing that the boys may be haunting her, the father is forced to reevaluate his religious faith.

Peter Scolari, former star of the sitcom "Bosom Buddies," joined the cast of "Cathedral Pines" as Father Mike McGary. Moorhouse took the part of the bereaved father, while his sons played the roles of the three boys.

Moorhouse recounts a scene that occurred in between takes while filming "Pines." "We were shooting in the woods at night, and my youngest, who was four, shut filming down. He just announces, 'Okay, I'm done.' Everyone's like, what? But as a dad, I'm saying 'guys, we're done.'"

By his own count, Moorhouse has acted in "four to five films," including "Collinsville," an independent horror film released in 2003. Moorhouse returned for the 2006 sequel, "Collinsville II." He was cast as a different character.

But film, he insists, is not his first passion. Neither is music or radio. As passions rank, hockey tops his list.

"From the ice to the smell of exhaust Zamboni, there's nothing like it," he said. He describes hockey as "aggressive and graceful," and recalls his earliest encounters with the sport in childhood.

"My mom brought me to see the Springfield Falcons when I was a kid. My dad was an usher at the rink."

Moorhouse first learned to skate at age 8. Throughout his high school and undergraduate years, he played as a goalie on school teams. He stayed on at AIC for three years, serving as an assistant hockey coach and helping bring the team to a championship in 1989.

"We won the ECAC [Eastern College Athletic Conference]. After that, it felt like it was time to move on," he said.

In 2007, Moorhouse also founded a non-profit organization, The Hockey Project. "The non-profit takes at-risk kids and puts them on the ice," said Moorhouse.

While Moorhouse maintains that his eldest son found his way to hockey on his own, he feels that "hockey is hereditary." Within his family, Friday nights spent at Minutemen games are commonplace, and not just because Moorhouse announces for the games.

"It's how we write our social calendar," he said. "We have Thanksgiving where the tournament is."

Teen succeeding in modeling industry despite disability

By Debra D. Bass
St. Louis Post-Dispatch

ST. LOUIS — Ruthie Burst has all the qualities that aspiring supermodels yearn for: classical beauty, a lean figure, height, poise, long blond hair, beguiling blue eyes and a distinctive runway strut.

She's heard a chorus of "you should be a model," comments since she was a toddler, but she didn't pursue modeling in earnest until about six months ago.

Burst, who lives in Ladue, Mo., and is a student at Mary Institute and St. Louis Country Day School, was born with only one arm and wears a prosthetic one. She says that she never considered that an obstacle to a successful modeling career.

In the St. Louis area, Burst is represented by West Model and Talent Management.

"I always wanted to be a model," Burst said. "I kinda didn't think about [my arm]. It really depends on whether they like you or they don't."

Although she has a disability that might make others self-conscious in the megawatt glare of a fashion shoot, the 16-year-old seems blissfully unfettered by self-doubt. In addition to modeling, the 5'10" teen also plays field hockey and tennis and rode horses for years.

"My first impression of Ruthie was that she was spectacular and beautiful ... a slam-dunk as a model," said Attilio D'Agostino, a founder of Alive Magazine and Saint Louis Fashion Week. He selected Burst from a pool of more than 600 models who answered the casting call for last year's show. It wasn't until after she'd left the room that someone mentioned Burst's prosthetic arm. D'Agostino hadn't noticed. The team selecting the models quickly concluded that it simply wasn't an issue. Her stats and images were sent to all the designers, and she was selected to walk in a number of shows.

This year, Burst was selected to walk the runways on three of the five nights of events. She skipped Tuesday night's opening show to answer a national casting call for a project in Chicago. But she was back in town for Wednesday night's presentation of a line of colorful, flirty dresses by Los Angeles-based designer Meghan Noland.

"I didn't know there was going to be a model in my show with a prosthetic arm until a few minutes ago," Noland said Wednesday. But even if someone had told her beforehand, it wouldn't have been an issue, she said. "Models are supposed to make clothes look beautiful, and if she can do that job, she's fine."

Noland said she wants her clothes to make women feel beautiful and sexy in their own skin, so she strives to use models that aren't cookie-cutter versions of the gamines in glossy magazines.

It's a refreshing concept in an industry that for all its protestations to the contrary remains brutally critical of women who have a few extra pounds of body fat or a hip-to-waist ratio that's less than ideal. In fact, most professional models can't achieve the ideal without airbrushing.

"We didn't hire her as a statement or 'in spite of,' or anything like that," D'Agostino said. "We cast her because she was a great model and she deserved to be featured."

Having said that, D'Agostino added that it's probably a good thing for those on the fashion scene to see and take note of Burst. What makes her so watchable isn't that she conforms to an idealized notion of beauty, but rather her incredible poise and grace. Perhaps people will look at her and be less quick to criticize themselves for not being blond enough, tall enough or thin enough to be beautiful, he said.

Burst's mother, also named Ruth, said she wasn't worried that her daughter wouldn't be accepted into the fashion industry with a prosthesis. For her, it's normal. In fact, mother and daughter seem bored with the topic. Ruthie was an award-winning equestrienne who competed nationally as a child, so her mother is accustomed to seeing her daughter in the spotlight — and the curiosity that follows.

"I'm just proud of her and support her in every journey. That's my job," said Ruth, who has three older children, Ross, 17; Kenneth, 20 and Jonathan Jr., 22.

Ruthie takes the double-takes in stride. Most people don't notice, at first, she said. When they do, "they are surprised and think it's really cool that I model with a prosthesis. I just want to model."

Ruthie Burst, 16, who has a prosthetic arm, confidently strolls down the runway during a fashion show at Neiman Marcus in St. Louis, Missouri.

Minutemen score six in rout

Wessbecker skated quickly behind the net, slid the pass to Davis, who slipped a shot by the surprised Lange.

A little over two minutes later the Mass Attack would register their second goal.

At the 18:38 mark James Marcou skated past the blueline, slipping by defenders. Marcou's nifty stick handling was eventually broken up by the last Engineer defenseman (Kennedy), almost acting as a drop pass. Looming from Marcou's rear, charged UMass' Doug Kublin.

Kublin wound up and slapped a shot past Lange, high glove-side. Marcou, who turned around, already preparing to go back on the defensive saw his other teammates lift their hands in celebration; he followed suit.

Chris Davis, Casey Wellman and Topher Bevis would all add goals in the third period; Bevis' goal coming on a power play.

UMass returns to action Friday against No. 4 New Hampshire in Durham.

Game Notes

UMass had 12 different players with at least one point. ... Davis and Cory Quirk lead the Minutemen in shots with five. ... Watson left the game late in the third with an injury to his head, but Cahoon assured he said he would be fine. ... Mike Bergin, a defenseman for RPI also hurt his shoulder on a check by UMass forward Alex Berry.

Wessbecker, Langeraap return to lineup

it felt a little different, but I think I pulled my weight. Our line [including freshman Casey Wellman and senior Davis] did great. I had a lot of speed to work with, we looked good.

"I thought I had a great game except for the penalty I took. Other than that [my] speed was up, head was up, it felt like I never left," he added.

In the game, Wessbecker demonstrated his defensive skill that led to goaltender Dan Meyers's first career shutout. He played a key role on UMass' penalty kills throughout Tuesday's game making successful clears, contributing on clean breakouts and holding the puck at the blue line in the offensive zone. Because Wessbecker plays very defensively he allows other players on his team to get involved more offensively and create more scoring chances.

"We said last year one of our struggles in the second half of the season was a result of overextending other defensemen into John's role," Cahoon said. "John is a terrific defensive defenseman."

Wessbecker reminded the Minutemen of what they missed so much at the end of last season. After the Cornell game the Minutemen's record was 8-13-1 without their vital defenseman in 2007-08.

"He was taken out of the lineup and it forced us to insert other people into those roles and add minutes to their already long minute games," Cahoon said. "So it's really important that we have him back."

Wessbecker hasn't played in the Minutemen's last 24 games, nearly 11 months of being absent from the lineup.

"I spent a lot of time watching games. It was a great feeling to get out there with the boys and contribute as best I can. It's just a great feeling, a great win for the boys," Wessbecker said.

With Wessbecker and Langeraap back in the lineup they should help the Minutemen succeed as they struggle with other injuries, especially when Hockey East play begins on Friday with New Hampshire.

Captains to help lead newcomers

Cook, a three-time high school all-American diver, proved to be a great addition to the team with his performance on Saturday. Cook finished first in the three meter and in the one meter.

Returning as a junior this season is Justin Brooks. At the 2008 A-10 Championships, Brooks became the first UMass swimmer to win the 1650 freestyle championship since 1985. In his A-10 victory, he also set the 1650 freestyle UMass record. Brooks will be the heart of the distance races for the Minutemen.

After struggling at last year's A-10 Championships, Jackie Porter, Christa Narus, Cecilia Jenkins and Karen Upperco will lead the way as captains of the women's swimming and diving team.

Karen Upperco, noted as one of the best divers in UMass history, will star for the diving team, which has a long history of doing well. Last year, Upperco not only clinched first in the A-10 Diving Championships, but also set a conference record of 520.60 points in doing so. Leading the three meter dive will be sophomore Anne Fogarty. As a freshman, Fogarty also set a conference record of 568.15 points as she won the three meter event in the 2008 A-10 Championships.

Leading the women's team in the fly stroke this season will be senior Christa Narus. Narus holds two school records, the 100 and 200 fly.

"She's one of the best flyers in the conference," UMass women's swimming coach Bob Newcomb said. "She will definitely lead. She's had an impressive fall and has been swimming very well."

Senior Taryn Prout will look to lead the distance races for the women's team. Prout led Massachusetts' 1000 and 1650 freestyle swims last year.

"Prout has been the backbone of our distance lane for three years," Newcomb said. "And she will definitely continue to be the leader of that."

Both teams are geared for this season and the new players are fitting in and competing well. The Minuteman roster graduated some of their best last year, but have now found promise in the freshmen.

Vitale more than excited for Series

By Dick Jerardi
(Philadelphia Daily News)

Dick Vitale has been a Tampa Bay Rays season ticketholder since they started playing baseball in front of all those empty seats at Tropicana Field and losing all those games.

"I had my season tickets for 11 years and I couldn't even give them away and my section is great," Vitale said Monday, the day after the Rays somehow got themselves into the World Series against the Phillies. "I'll be right next to Charlie Manuel, the first row next to the Phillies' dugout. Now, my phone is constantly ringing with people wanting tickets. I couldn't give them away for 10 years."

Vitale, being Vitale, he has a basketball analogy.

"You know what I relate it to," said Vitale, who has been doing college basketball analysis on ESPN since 1979. "It's very similar to me, the little guy David and Goliath, a la 1983 with Jimmy V (Valvano and his North Carolina State team). He shocked the nation and won the national championship when nobody thought that he would get in the tournament. They had to beat Carolina with (Michael) Jordan and beat (Ralph) Sampson and Virginia just to get into the NCAA Tournament. It was unbelievable.

"This is a club in a division with the Yankees and the Red Sox. They win the division (Derek) Jeter and (Alex) Rodriguez make more than the entire payroll of the Rays.

"What makes it exciting for me is that I really know the manager and the players really well."

And why wouldn't he? For years, he was the only one there.

Vitale's home is about 40 minutes from St. Petersburg, where the Rays play. He kept making the trip because he had a love for baseball, something he got as a kid growing up in North Jersey.

"From the time I was a little kid, I've had a passion for baseball," Vitale said. "I'm not proud to say I would cut school and go to Yankee Stadium and hang out for hours where the players would walk in."

Vitale will be rooting for the Rays, but admits to being a bit torn. Jamie Moyer, son-in-law of ESPN colleague Digger Phelps, arranged for tickets to a Phillies-Pirates game at Citizens Bank Park this summer.

"The Phillies were so good to me and my grandkids and my family," said Vitale, who threw out the ceremonial first ball before Game 2 of the ALCS. "We got on the field. Ryan Howard gave both my grandsons, who are 5 years of age, bats and balls. Jimmy Rollins played catch with them on the field. They pitched to (Shane) Victorino. And now I have to sit next to their dugout wearing a Rays shirt."

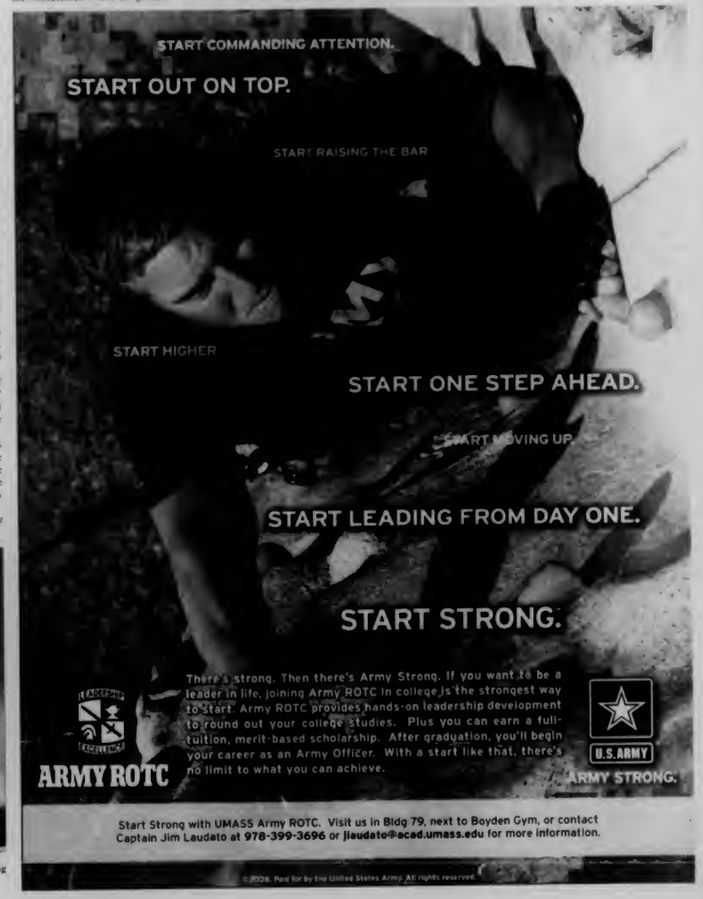
Vitale stayed at the Ritz-Carlton when he was in town. Happened to run into Robin Roberts in the lobby.

"You know he played basketball at Michigan State," Vitale said.

The two men sat around and told stories about Roberts' basketball and baseball days.

Vitale will not be rooting against Moyer.

"When he pitches Game 3 I'm hoping he puts up seven zeros, they go to the pen and we beat them in the eighth or ninth," Vitale said.



Howard, Vitale said, will be the MVP.

"It's unbelievable to think a World Series is going to be here." Vitale said. "I've been here when they announced 10,000 and there was like 7,000 there. It would break your heart."

Vitale does want to thank Brad Lidge for something ... the perfect season. But like All-Star Game.

"I want to thank him for giving the homefield advantage to the Rays," Vitale said, referring to the Phillies closer's ML-best 48 saves. "The homefield is the difference, so thank Mr. Lidge for giving us the homefield."

And Dick Vitale, Rays fan, will be there for the Series games, how ever many that are. He won't be alone this time.

Dukes remain No. 1 in poll

Top 10 sees little change, UMass, Liberty slip in poll

BY STEVE LEVINE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Sports Network's Football Championship Subdivision College Football Poll was released on Monday, with James Madison atop the rankings for the fourth consecutive week.

Although enjoying a bye week, the Dukes received 102 of the possible 107 first-place votes.

No. 2 Appalachian State received three first-place votes and remained in the second spot after fighting off Georgia Southern, 37-36, in a Southern Conference road win.

After a convincing 44-7 victory at Rhode Island, Villanova remained at No. 7, setting the stage for a Top 10 matchup against James Madison Saturday at home.

The teams that experienced the greatest position changes include Western Illinois, Tennessee State, Massachusetts, Liberty and Hampton.

Top 25 FCS

Western Illinois enjoyed a three-position rise from No. 15 to No. 12, reaching its highest position in the rankings since 2003. The ascent in the poll was prompted by a 56-0 victory over Indiana State, the largest margin of victory against a conference team in school history. The shutout was the second of the season for the Leathernecks.

Tennessee State also climbed three positions, from No. 22 to No. 19. The Tigers defeated Austin Peay, 37-34, last weekend, while defeating Tennessee-Martin, 30-27, the week before in overtime.

The worst descent in the rankings was endured by the Minutemen, which fell seven spots, from No. 10 to No. 17. UMass saw its 15-game home win streak end as well. The Minutemen suffered a 30-15 homecoming loss to Richmond, who remained entrenched at No. 9 after its victory.

Although Liberty lost for just the first time this season, its presence in the The Top 25 is still intact. The Flames dropped six spots, from 14 to 20, after falling to Lafayette. The Flames had the nation's longest FCS winning streak end at 11 straight with the loss. With the victory, Lafayette propelled into the rankings at No. 24.

Hampton rose three spots in the rankings and remain undefeated in the Mid-Eastern Atlantic Conference. The Pirates will remain at No. 22 until their next game against South Carolina State.

The Southern Illinois Salukis rose in the rankings two spots, from 16 to 14, after shutting out Youngstown State, 33-0. The Saluki defense dominated, scoring eight points, registering four sacks and two interceptions, while also blocking a field goal.

Other non-ranked teams that now enjoy a position in the polls include William & Mary and Harvard. All three teams are ranked due to losses by North Dakota State, South Dakota State and The Citadel.

William & Mary stands at No. 23 in the midst of its two-game winning streak. The Tribe defeated New Hampshire and Delaware on the road their previous two games and will play host to Rhode Island on Saturday. William & Mary are one of six teams in the CAA in the Top 25.

Harvard is coming off consecutive victories against Lafayette, Cornell and LeHigh. Combined with previously ranked teams' losses, the three-game winning streak has put Harvard at No. 25 in the poll.

Notes

Position numbers 12-15 are occupied by Western Illinois, Central Arkansas, Southern Illinois, and Northern Arizona…an Eastern school was nowhere to be found… Appalachian State quarterback Armanti Edwards became the first player in nine years to earn Southern Conference Player of the Week recognition three consecutive times; he accounted for 333 yards of total offense and all five touchdowns in Sunday's victory at Georgia Southern … No. 3 Elon University has a current seven-game winning streak, its longest since the end of its 1981 campaign.

Richmond punt returner Derek Hatcher is brought down by UMass linebacker Andrew Resende-Gomes during last weekend's homecoming game. Despite the 30-15 win, the Spiders stayed at No. 9 in the polls.

Charlotte virtually unbeatable in '08

BY JAY ASSER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Last season the Charlotte women's soccer team was virtually unbeatable in the Atlantic 10.

This season they are, so far.

The 49ers (11-3-1, 7-0 Atlantic 10) have reeled off eight consecutive victories, seven of which have been against conference foes. They are now 16-1-1 in the last two years against conference opponents.

After being chosen to repeat as conference champions in the A-10 preseason poll, Charlotte has lived up to expectations thus far by rolling over opponents decisively. The 49ers have outscored conference opponents 38-4, recording shutouts in all but two of the seven A-10 games.

A–10 Soccer

Powering the 49ers offense this season has been junior midfielder Hailey Beam, the A-10's current leader in goals (13), assists (11) and points (37). After adding two goals, including the game-winner against Richmond (9-6-1, 3-5 A-10) on Friday, and two assists on Sunday in Charlotte's 3-0 victory at George Washington (7-9, 3-5 A-10), Beam was named the A-10 Co-Player of the Week for the second straight week and the third time this season.

Beam and the 49ers look to improve their perfect conference record this weekend when they host Dayton (11-4-1, 5-1-1 A-10) and Xavier (1-12-2, 0-5-2 A-10) in their final regular-season home games.

NOT FAR BEHIND

Though much of the attention in the A-10 conference has been placed on Charlotte, Dayton and Fordham have remained right on the heels of the 49ers.

Playing in a combined eight overtime games, six of which lasted into double overtime, the Flyers and Rams (8-4-2, 5-1-1 A-10) have battled to be in a second-place tie in the conference.

The Flyers were led by Lauren MacCormick last week, who scored her first goal of the season in a 4-0 victory over St. Bonaventure on Friday and scored twice, including the game-winner on Sunday, defeating Duquesne, 4-1.

For her contribution in back-to-back conference wins, MacCormick was named the A-10 Women's Soccer Co-Player of the Week and to the Atlantic 10 Fall Sports Honor Roll.

The Rams finished off a three-game road trip last week in Pennsylvania, coming out with a 2-0-1 record against conference opponents La Salle (6-7-3, 2-3-2 A-10), Saint Joseph's (7-5-3, 2-2-3 A-10) and Temple (3-8-4, 0-4-3 A-10).

Fordham wraps up their final regular-season home games this week when they host Rhode Island (6-9-1, 2-5-0 A-10) and Massachusetts (6-5-3, 3-3-1 A-10) in the Bronx.

SEARCHING FOR FIRST A–10 WIN

Temple and Xavier are two teams who are not only in search of their first conference victories, but teams in search of offense.

The Owls and Musketeers (1-12-2, 0-5-2 A-10) have combined to be shutout in a total of 17 games this season. While the Owls have shown no signs of coming out of their offensive funk, the Musketeers' offense is starting to come alive after scoring three goals in their last two games, resulting in a 3-1 loss to Duquesne and a 2-2 tie to St. Bonaventure.

Both Temple and Xavier look to salvage its seasons in its four matchups with St. Bonaventure (8-7-1, 3-4-1 A-10), Duquesne, Richmond and George Washington left on the Owls schedule and St. Louis (8-3-4, 4-2-1 A-10), Charlotte, La Salle and Fordham remaining for the Musketeers.

RICHMOND FREE FALLING

After getting off to its best start in school history, Richmond has lost its hold on the best overall record in the A-10.

The Spiders' home streak, once standing at an impressive 7-0, was broken last week when they lost back-to-back home matchups against Charlotte and Saint Louis.

Overall, Richmond has lost its last four games and much of that can be attributed to the defense. Previously on the season, the Spiders had let up three goals in one game only once. In the last four however, the defense has given up three goals on two occasions.

The Spiders look to end their losing streak at home when they host George Washington on Friday.

Upperco expected to lead

conference championship squad. Connecticut high school diving standout Michael Dunn joins Hixon's ranks, while Ryan Brooks hopes to join his elder brother in earning the title of A-10 Champion.

"Across the board the kids have been doing what I expect and what I want them to do," Yarworth said, noting that South Carolina transfer and walk-on Evan Goodman has looked solid.

Maintaining an impressive diving program that boasts A-10 diving champions Karen Upperco and Anne Fogarty, the Minutewomen have brought in some newcomers.

The newer Minutewomen will take cues from experienced captains Cecelia Jenkins, Christa Narus, Jackie Porter and Upperco. Even with designated leaders, the two-time New England Coach of the Year appears to focus more on a team concept.

"I look for every one of my seniors to be a leader in this program. They've invested three years here," Newcomb said. "I think it's important for them to stand up and make sure that they let everyone know this is how we race, this is how we finish the season, this is how we cheer, and this is how we do things."

Newcomb praised the early performance of Narus, who recently was named UMass-Dinn Bros. Co-Athlete of the Week for an outstanding performance at the BU dual meet, where she won three events.

"[Narus] had a real good end to last season, especially in the 200 fly which I think is her specialty," he said.

In the backstroke and middle distance freestyle, Newcomb highlights Boopa Walsh.

"Boopa exploded last year and really came into her own," he notes, recounting how Walsh dropped over two seconds from her 100 backstroke at last year's A-10s.

The Minutewomen's preseason time-leader in the breaststroke has been sophomore Jess Starosielec. Newcomb cites Starosielec's aggressiveness in workouts and Porter's end-of-the year tendency to dominate as key event factors.

Junior Kat Chilikis has been stellar in early preparations, leading a sprint-freestyle squad that Newcomb hopes will step up in the wake of graduated standout Allison Volpe.

"We need somebody to step up and anchor our relays—that's a big thing and I know Kat's got that in her eye."

Distance freestyle will feature two freshmen this year, but is anchored by senior Taryn Prout, who ranks in the Top 10 all-time for four different UMass records.

With six-time defending champion Richmond dominating the conference, Newcomb retains confidence.

"Can you control who's swimming at Richmond and how fast they are and what they're doing? No, you have no control over that whatsoever," he said. "But you can control what you're doing in your workout, the weight room, on the bikes, [with] your diet, studying and everything else that goes into it."

UMass continues its early dual meet schedule versus Army this Saturday at John Rodgers Pool in Amherst.

Engineering a blowout

Offense explodes, Myers shuts down RPI

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

TROY, N.Y. — If anything, Dan Meyers had to prove that his stellar performance over North Dakota wasn't a fluke.

He did just that Tuesday night, stopping all 25 shots in his first-career shutout in the Massachusetts hockey team's 6-0 win over Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute.

Despite his great game in the net, Meyers was quick to pass the credit away from himself.

"The puck looked big tonight," Meyers said. "[The defense does] a great job letting me see the puck and to put a big cushion up there for me makes the game a lot of fun for me."

In three games this season, Meyers has only allowed five goals, constantly getting better the more playing time he receives.

"Any goalie can go out there and have a good game," Meyers said. "The big thing for me is consistency and that's my main goal: to play the best I can."

In front of Meyers the Minutemen (2-1) made few mistakes. Led by Brett Watson and Martin Nolet, the penalty-killing unit allowed only one shot on three UMass penalties.

Despite the score, the Minutemen had to earn their goals.

After RPI (0-4) failed to score in a three-minute offensive outburst where the Minutemen failed to clear the puck late in the second, the UMass defense was rewarded.

Following a line change Michael Lecomte lifted a pass to forward Will Ortiz who was streaking down the left side looking for immediate offensive pressure. The puck danced above Engineers' defenseman John Kennedy's stick landing on Ortiz's.

Ortiz glided toward RPI goaltender Mathias Lange's right side with Danny Hobbs coming in to aide Ortiz. Ortiz patiently waited until the right moment when Hobbs was parallel to him. Hobbs one-timed the pass past Lange at the 16:14 mark in the second period.

"Danny (Meyers) was the real difference maker," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "During that shift he made two or three great saves ... and it really might have been the difference in the game. If they had gotten one it would've changed the complexion of the game.

The Minutemen opened the scoring 16 minutes, 15 seconds into the first quarter when Chris Davis skated down Lange's right side, beating two defensemen. The puck deflected back into the left corner where John Wessbecker secured the puck. Wessbecker noticed

Returns from injuries spark Minutemen

TROY, N.Y. — In their first game back for the Massachusetts hockey team, John Wessbecker and Chase Langeraap played a key role earning assists in UMass' 6-0 win over Rensselaer Tuesday night.

Wessbecker suffered an injury on Nov. 30, 2007 in UMass' scoreless tie against Cornell. A couple of months later, on Feb. 8, Langeraap was injured in the Minutemen's 4-1 loss against Boston College.

Wessbecker and Langeraap both tallied assists on Chris Davis's goals. Wessbecker and Langeraap had assists on Davis's game-winning goal 16 minutes, 15 seconds into the first period. Langeraap's second assist came 6:35 into the third period on Davis's second goal of the game.

Not only did both players earn points in their first game back, but they both were plus-3 for the night. Wessbecker and Langeraap also earned time in the penalty box. Langeraap in the first period for roughing (19:42) and Wessbecker for tripping, 11:09 into the second period.

"To have those guys back is going to be a big asset to our program and they gave us a good effort in their first game in a lot of months," UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

Langeraap missed the last 10 games for the Minutemen in the 2007-08 season — their record was 4-6-0 without him.

"I was thinking before the game it felt like I never actually left, felt like it happened yesterday," Langeraap said. "Once I got on the ice

Men's and women's teams stocked with talent in '08-'09

BY HOLLY J. GALVIN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Toting a self-described blue collar recruiting pitch, the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team returns as two-time defending Atlantic 10 Champions. Adding six new faces to a roster stacked with depth, the Minutemen appear hungry for a three-peat.

Even after losing a multitude of seniors to graduation, nine-time A-10 Coach of the Year Russ Yarworth remains unfazed.

"You never replace kids," he said. "But you never like to say 'rebuild,' you say 'reload.'"

Captains Nate Bromage and Brad Sloan lead a hard-working and committed returning corps that has seen two A-10 Championships in the past three years.

"They know what it's like to lose, and they know what it's like to win," Yarworth pointed out. "And guess which one they prefer?"

During the team's preseason and current peak training period, Yarworth seemed pleased with the rookie-veteran mix thus far, noting that there hasn't been a lot of grumbling during training.

"It's not easy when you've got to spend four hours a day with your face in the water with some idiot on deck screaming at you," he laughs, candidly describing the intensity of double-session training.

The Minutemen's A-10 Championship defense often begins at 6:30 a.m. and peaks at over 20 hours of both mandatory and voluntary workout time. Swimmers are currently logging 64,000 yards per week in addition to lifting, biking and dryland conditioning exercises.

Women's swimming coach Bob Newcomb will look to veterans like Karen Tipperco to lead a young but talented UMass squad.

UMass men's swimming coach Russ Yarworth lost some seniors to graduation last season, but recruited some top talent for this year.

Women's coach and 25-year veteran Bob Newcomb was also quick to commend his team's intense commitment to results.

"Swimmers are nuts, they really are," he said, noting his team will complete eight or nine workouts a week through January before tapering training yardage but maintaining intensity.

"Swimming is a tough mental sport," Newcomb said. "When you're staring at the bottom of the pool for four hours a day, it's really hard to try to keep motivated, so I think it's important that they want to show up to practice."

When two-time Minutemen captain R.J. Rappe competitively exited John Rodgers Pool for good last spring, a key cog was left unoccupied in the wake of the conference's top diver. Diving coach Mandy Hixon's local training program served as a quick pipeline to soothe Rappe's departure: enter Jason Cook.

The four-time high school state champion has transitioned smoothly thus far, winning two events at last Saturday's Boston University meet. The Amherst Regional High School graduate has been diving with Hixon since age 11.

Oftentimes, of course, the recruiting connection is not as smooth. But Yarworth, a 29-year veteran, is well-versed in the business of high caliber Division I recruiting. Competing against elite schools like Boston University, who have upwards of nine full scholarships to offer, some might struggle. In selling a UMass program that currently has less than two full scholarships of its own, Yarworth succeeds by stressing uniqueness.

"My recruiting pitch is, if you want all the bells and whistles then this isn't the place for you. If you want to be a good old fashioned blue collar swimmer with a commitment to team attitude and training, then I really think UMass can be the place for you, especially with what we have to offer in this area," Yarworth explains. "The kids are treated really well by the athletic department."

This philosophy has reeled in a lot of talented rookies to meld with returners from last year's

New rosters to be put to test early

BY KYLE PREDKI
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts swimming and diving teams kicked off their seasons this weekend with a chance to test the new rosters.

The women's team has seven new members, while the men's squad has three. With a relatively young roster, the Minutemen have kept their game plan of creating an all-around team instead of dominating in a single category.

Leading this year's men's swimming and diving team will be senior captains Nate Bromage and Brad Sloan.

They are already displaying their leadership abilities by helping out and competing in different distances than they are accustomed. Sloan trains more with the distance group and Bromage sticks with the sprinters. Bromage also plays a key role on the relay teams.

In sprint freestyle, Juan Moliere looks to keep his spot at the top. Molíere, a junior from Puerto Rico, finished off last season as the Atlantic 10 50 Freestyle Champion. In his performance against Boston University this past weekend, he proved that he could be even stronger this year.

The distance freestyle looks like a promising spot for freshman Joey Shordon. In Shordon's first collegiate meet on Saturday, he placed first in both of his events, the 500 and 1000 freestyle. His times were also comparable to last year's A-10 top times.

Another freshman to keep an eye out for is Jason Cook.

Some students congregated at the Southwest mall after UMass played Appalachian State in 2006. Riots at that time prompted police to increase security around the area.

New round of arrests at Southwest mall

The Southwest area mall has long been a place where students can go to hang out, play sports with their friends and it also serves as a convenient common area for students to gather after their favorite sports teams win an exciting game.

In recent campus history, however, the area has also been the site of rioting and altercations with police. Two more events this week added to that history of destructive and rowdy behavior.

On Sunday, the University of Massachusetts Police Department received a call at 9:30 p.m. to respond to the Mall area and provide assistance to another police agency after the Boston Red Sox lost Game 7 of the American League Championship Series and a small crowd gathered.

Five men and one woman were subsequently arrested for charges ranging from disorderly conduct and resisting a police officer making a lawful arrest to a minor being in possession of alcohol.

Another event occurred after the Red Sox fought their way back from a 7-0 deficit to beat the Tampa Bay Rays in Game 5 of the series. A large group of students assembled in the Mall to celebrate.

"The crowd of 250-350 was primarily celebratory," said UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archibald. "They obviously want the students to celebrate reasonably."

After about 35 minutes of some crowd surfing and fireworks being set off, the mood changed pretty quickly. Officers from the UMPD, Amherst Police Department and the Mass. State Police moved ahead arresting the three men and charging them with failure to disperse.

"Typically when students get bored with celebratory chanting and it goes from pushing and shoving and punching and things start coming out of the bushes, then we have to go in," Archibald said.

The mall has been the scene of earlier riots, with one occurring in October of 2004 after the Red Sox beat the Saint Louis Cardinals to win the World Series. Twenty-two people were arrested and charged with disorderly conduct along with failure to disperse. One 20-year-old was shot in the arm in the early morning hours of Oct. 31, 2004 after a fight reportedly broke out between two groups of people.

"I believe you could have gotten more than one person to testify about seeing a gun and shooting people with pepperballs," Major Peter Lord Jr. said in 2004.

The Southwest area saw December 2006 riots in response to a UMass football game against Appalachian State. After the UMass football team's 2006 season opener, approximately 5,000 students rushed Garner Field and threatened southwest residents. Seventy students were arrested in the riots and a lawsuit resulted in $1.7 million in October 2007.

Major biochem find

Researchers tag folding proteins

BY MATT ROBARE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Two University of Massachusetts biochemists have developed a technique to study protein structure which could lead to advances in studying Parkinson's, Huntington's and Alzheimer's diseases.

The research, written by Professor Lila Gierasch and post-doctoral fellow Beena Krishnan made the cover of the journal Chemistry & Biology and was funded by a $2.5 million Pioneer Grant from the National Institute of Health.

The new process involves attaching fluorescent dyes to proteins in a specific fashion that allows them to study a protein's structure in cells.

The dye, called FlAsH, is linked to the protein as it is manufactured out of amino acids in microscopic "factories" called ribosomes. When the protein is folded correctly, the dye lights up, allowing the scientists to see it in the seemingly chaotic jumble that exists within the cell.

"[The research] isn't a grand slam home run," Gierasch said. "[But] it's a solid base hit, and provides a key method for future studies."

The technique has immediate practical applications because many diseases such as Parkinson's, Huntington's and Alzheimer's – are caused when proteins are misfolded in cells.

Previously, biochemists couldn't study protein folding outside of a test tube. Using these new methods, however, it is possible that medical researchers may be able to develop drugs that combat those diseases.

Gierasch has been fascinated by protein folding her entire career, but only recently has her focus moved from the basic chemistry (which can be studied in test tubes) to proteins in living cells. She realized that the first step in studying protein folding in cells was to find methods to distinguish the things they were interested in from the rest of the cell.

While fluorescent marking has been used for years in DNA sequencing research as well as in other areas of cellular research, Gierasch and Krishnan are using the old technique in a new way.

With this application they replace parts of the protein with specific motifs that bind the FlAsH dye and when the protein folds correctly, it lights up. They made three attempts, two of which failed to achieve the desired result, but provide interesting lessons of their own.

Practically everything in the human body is made from protein. In the cell, the instructions for making specific proteins are contained in genes. To make a protein, the DNA strand containing the instructions is transcribed into mRNA in the nucleus and then exported into the main body of the cell.

There the mRNA is surrounded by a ribosomal "factory" where the instructions are read and the required amino acids are gathered and assembled in the correct order to make a given protein. The proteins that are assembled come out of the ribosomes like rods and must be folded into useful shapes.

The next step in their research, Gierasch said, is to try to identify when the proteins first start to form their unique shapes. She has also started receiving requests from other research teams to use the technique.

BY DANIELLE KAHN

The Student Alliance for Israel at the University of Massachusetts is hosting Ambassador Dore Gold to speak at Bartlett Hall about the Arab-Israeli peace process next Tuesday, Oct. 28.

Ambassador Gold will specifically address the situation with Iran and how it will affect this process, as well as the involvement with the United States. The lecture is entitled "Facing Tomorrow: Steps Forward for Israel and the next U.S. Administration."

Ambassador Gold is the 11th permanent ambassador to the United Nations. He previously served as Foreign Policy advisor to the former Prime Minister of Israel, Benjamin Netanyahu. He also served as an advisor for Ariel Sharon and attended the Aqaba Summit with President George W. Bush.

Because Gold has previously had experience with the American government and its Middle Eastern relations, he understands some of the challenges that will be presented in the future.

"Ambassador Gold will be focusing on the role of Iran in the Middle East from an American point of view and how it will effect the upcoming election," said SAFI President Michael Feder.

There are also issues close to home that will be affected

SGA tables vote to override veto

BY MICHAEL FOX
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Last week Student Government Association President Malcolm Chu vetoed the appointment of Sean McNair to the position of elections chancellor at the Oct. 15 senate meeting.

At last night's meeting, a motion to overrule Chu's veto was further tabled to next week, the Oct. 29th meeting, which is one day before the deadline to appoint an elections chancellor.

McNair was appointed at the Oct. 8 Senate Meeting by Central Area Governor Dave Robertson and received unanimous support.

Six senators abstained. One who abstained, Senator Ben Thompson of Orchard Hill, said, "I appreciated some of Sean's ideas, and I found them great. However at the time, I don't find myself ready to make a decision or not."

At the meeting, McNair proceeded to detail plans for examining the possibility of working with the Office of Information Technology to institute online voting for future SGA elections. He also touched on his intentions to increase voter turnout.

McNair was previously nominated to be elections chancellor in November 2006, but faced fierce debate in '06 due to his criticisms of "Take Back UMass," a movement dedicated towards student empowerment – with members who were involved in last year's student strike, which the current administration supported.

However, President Chu announced his veto at the Oct. 15 meeting, stating that he wasn't aware of McNair's past nomination and that he vetoed, "Among concerns from the Undergraduate Speaker

UM Republicans, Democrats to debate current issues tonight

BY CHRIS RUSSELL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A discussion of national and local political issues will be held tonight between the University of Massachusetts Republican and Democrat student organizations at 7 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge.

Questions will focus on issues impacting the presidential election as well as state ballot questions, in addition to the effect both will have on the University.

"The debate will be centered on the issues and what needs to be the response to the issues," said Will McGuinness, News Editor of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, which is sponsoring the debate. McGuinness will also serve as one of the debate's moderators.

The economy will be one of the top issues at the debate. The current economic situation has forced state budget cuts, leaving less money for the University. Chancellor Robert Holub recently announced that he will be forced to cut $12 million from the budget this fiscal year and said he expects more cuts next year.

The discussion will focus on how an individual's approach to the economy can change from the ground up to lessen the impact of this recession and what actions the University must take to remain a competitive academic institution.

Time will also be spent discussing how each presidential candidate would make financial aid accessible as the current economic troubles threaten the availability of student loans.

Another main issue will be the Iraq war. The discussion will address different plans for the current situation in Iraq, as well as policies that will best serve the country in repairing ties with foreign countries and fighting terrorism.

Issues regarding Question 1 on the state ballot, which proposes to eliminate the state income tax, will also be argued. Discussion will focus on how the elimination of the income tax would alter key services provided to citizens by the state, such as funding for higher education, and whether it is a reasonable [illegible]

Bush calls economic summit

By Dan Eggen
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — President Bush will host a summit on the global economic crisis in Washington on Nov. 15, kicking off landmark negotiations among world leaders on financial reforms less than two weeks after American voters go to the polls to choose a new president.

The timing and focus of the meeting highlight the severity of the economic crisis that will face Republican John McCain or Democrat Barack Obama after the Nov. 4 election, and illustrates how rapidly the president-elect will need to engage on the issue.

Bush has agreed to host the meeting as the start of a series of ambitious summits aimed at overhauling the regulatory framework for global finance first put in place more than six decades ago at a similar summit at Bretton Woods, N.H. The gathering will include leaders of the so-called Group of 20, an organization of major industrialized and developing nations, as well as central bankers and international finance officials.

In announcing the summit's schedule Wednesday, White House press secretary Dana Perino said the administration "will seek the input of the president-elect." But she added that the administration thinks that the severity of the global crisis requires nations to move ahead before a new president is sworn in on Jan. 20.

"We think it's important not to wait to have this meeting," Perino said. "The time will be just about right to have it then, because a lot of the emergency measures that these countries have put forward are hopefully starting to have an impact" on credit markets.

Perino said a specific venue has not yet been selected. The summit will be preceded by a White House dinner on Nov. 14, she said.

Both campaigns praised the decision to hold the summit but offered few details regarding the candidates' views on the key issues on the agenda.

Obama declined to say whether he would attend the meeting if elected, telling reporters in Richmond, Va., that "we still have one president at a time."

"I don't want to make commitments at this point in terms of our participation, my participation in something, before I've even won the election," he said.

Obama, who last month called for a G-20 meeting on the crisis, cautioned that the issues facing world economies are not going to be resolved in a single summit. "I've got some ideas and my economic team has some ideas in terms of the direction that we should move," he added. "But I don't want to get too far ahead of myself on the details of that."

Brian Rogers, a spokesman for the McCain campaign, said the Arizona senator is "pleased to see world leaders drawing together in this time of global economic crisis."

"This summit offers an opportunity to share information, examine ideas and compare plans for responses to the financial stresses," Rogers said. "It is an important opportunity to take urgent steps to recovery and prevention of similar crises in the future."

The summit was also welcomed by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., who called it a "positive, constructive step." Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., had urged Bush in a letter last month to meet with international leaders to discuss the financial crisis.

In a joint statement issued Saturday, Bush, French President Nicolas Sarkozy and European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso had announced agreement on a series of summits to address the current crisis and to discuss possible far-reaching reforms. The agenda is likely to include increasing market transparency, revising the rules that govern global investment flows, and improving oversight of big banks, ratings agencies and hedge funds.

But Sarkozy, British Prime Minister Gordon Brown and others have signaled a desire to go much further in regulating markets than Bush seems inclined to do. Brown said Wednesday that he wants greater cross-border oversight of banks and other financial firms, while Sarkozy called for much stricter government supervision of financial markets.

President Bush speaks with world leaders at the most recent G8 conference. The G8 and 12 other countries will be meeting this November to discuss the current world-wide economic crisis.

Deaths on the rise from from prescription drugs

By Thomas H. Maugh II
Los Angeles Times

The number of deaths and serious injuries associated with prescription drug use rose to record levels in the first quarter of 2008, with 4,825 deaths and nearly 21,000 injuries, a watchdog group said Wednesday.

Those numbers represent a nearly threefold increase in deaths from the previous quarter and a 38 percent increase in injuries from last year's quarterly average, according to the Horsham, Pa.-based Institute for Safe Medication Practices.

The most dangerous drugs were the anti-smoking drug varenicline, which was linked to 1,001 injuries and 50 deaths in the quarter, and the blood thinner heparin, which was associated with 779 injuries and 102 deaths.

The data came from voluntary reports of adverse effects to the Food and Drug Administration, which made the data public after stripping it of information identifying victims. Because the reporting is voluntary, researchers have estimated previously that fewer than 10 percent of adverse events made it into the system.

The heparin cases were associated with contamination in lots of the drug imported from China. The FDA has reported 238 deaths linked to heparin since January, but the number dwindled once the problem was recognized and addressed.

Varenicline remains an ongoing problem, however, according to institute officials. Since the drug – sold in the United States under the brand name Chantix by Pfizer Inc. – was approved in 2006, it has been linked to 3,325 serious injuries and 112 deaths.

Some reports were linked to people attempting suicide or causing other injuries to themselves after using the drug. Others were linked to blackouts or loss of consciousness, perhaps tied to sudden disturbances in heart rhythm.

Earlier reports by the institute pointed out these lapses in attention and led to the Federal Aviation Administration banning the use of Chantix by airline pilots and traffic controllers. The Department of Transportation has limited its use by truck drivers, and the Department of Defense has prohibited its use by aircraft and missile crews.

One possible explanation for the link might have been the success of the drug and the large number of people using it, the report said. But investigation showed that, during the quarter, varenicline accounted for more reports of serious injury than the 10 best-selling prescription drugs combined.

The institute called for a stronger risk warning on the Chantix label.

A Pfizer statement released Wednesday speculated that the large number of reports might be linked to adverse publicity associated with the drug. It noted also that nicotine withdrawal can cause changes in behavior, such as irritability and depressed mood.

"Based on (the) totality of data, we stand by the efficacy and safety profile of Chantix when used as directed," the company statement said. "Chantix labeling accurately reflects its efficacy and safety event reports and clinical trial data."

Figures released Tuesday by the company showed U.S. Chantix sales of $96 million in the current quarter, down 49 percent from the same period last year.

Many of the reports were linked to powerful painkillers or narcotics, such as oxycodone, fentanyl, morphine, methadone and hydrocodone, which have a high potential for abuse.

Acetaminophen and ibuprofen appeared among the top 10 drugs causing both injuries and deaths. Overdosing of the drugs or prolonged use at high levels can cause gastrointestinal damage and, perhaps, heart attacks. They are also used often in suicide attempts because they are readily accessible.

Sea temperatures causing glacial melt

By Mitchell Goulding
Washington Square News (NYU)

NEW YORK — It is getting colder in New York, but hotter underwater.

According to a recent study by NYU researchers, it's not just warming air temperature that causes glaciers to melt.

The Center for Atmosphere Ocean Science, a part of the Courant Institute of Mathematical Science at NYU, discovered that rising oceanic temperatures have been melting glaciers from below land surfaces.

David Holland, the director of the center and lead author of the study, found that rising ocean temperatures are more important than first thought.

Scientists originally believed that warming air temperatures were causing surface snow on the inland Greenland glacier to melt. However, Holland's team found that it was actually subsurface water temperatures that were rising and causing the ice sheet to break apart.

Using data from other studies that relied on NASA's Airborne Topographic Mapper, the researchers noticed a rapid rate of glacial thinning, which coincided with rising subsurface water temperature.

"Modest changes in atmospheric circulation can drive warm ocean water towards and under the edges of the ice sheets, and when this happens, the ice sheets fall apart, and the rate of rise of sea level increases," Holland said. "This is not so much a warming of the global ocean as it is a simple redirection of warm waters towards the ice sheets."

However, Holland noted that it would be the application of the information gained from the Greenland region that would be most important. Holland found that if these results translated to Antarctica, which holds 10 times the volume of ice compared to Greenland, the impact would be much worse.

"Antarctica holds the potential for producing a rapid change in global sea level in this century and beyond – a situation that, if it happened, society is ill-prepared to deal with," he said.

Jeremy Friedman, project administrator of the NYU Sustainability Task Force, said that students could have a tangible impact on fighting the effects of global warming.

"The fire in NYU students has been driving the entire initiative," Friedman said. "From participating in sustainability task force to doing research, student activists act like watchdogs keeping the university honest. Our goal is conservation of efficiency. Better than changing the light bulb is not using it at all."

Although the research warns that a continuation of glacial melting could become a dire situation, Holland admitted that researchers in the field have no way of gauging how long it would take or to what degree sea levels will change.

'Buy and hold' not paying off anymore

By Walter Hamilton and Ronald D. White
Los Angeles Times

NEW YORK — For two decades, Danny Lockwood believed that investing in the stock market was essential for a comfortable retirement.

Like millions of Americans, the 41-year-old Southern California resident steadfastly poured money into mutual funds that invest in stocks. For him, a sharp decline in the value of his portfolio meant only an opportunity to add to it at lower prices.

But after two bone-rattling bear markets in the past eight years, Lockwood is abandoning his blind faith in stocks. Fearing that the "buy and hold" advice that's been drummed into investors might not pay off, the music-video producer has been unloading some of his stock-fund holdings.

"I've realized I can't count on the market," he said. "I'm not sure I'm going to again let a significant portion of my assets ride on the stock market."

He isn't alone.

After a yearlong slide that has pushed major stock indexes down as much as 40 percent from their record highs, many people are rethinking their once rock-solid allegiance to stocks, disregarding the advice of experts to stay put.

Although such a reaction is normal in a bear market, the latest collapse appears to be taking a deeper psychological toll than that inflicted by any other market turmoil in the past 25 years – including 1987's Black Monday stock crash and the punishing bear market that followed the late-1990s Internet bubble.

"What's going on now is dramatically different than in 2000 and in 1987," said Terrance Odean, a University of California, Berkeley finance professor who studies the behavior of small investors. "What's different is that people have seen the possibility that markets could fail them and that they could do everything they were supposed to do – everything they were told to do – and still not have what they need in retirement."

Investors have yanked a net $176 billion from stock mutual funds this year, more than half of it since Sept. 1, according to TrimTabs Investment Research. The exodus might intensify as more third-quarter brokerage and 401(k) statements show up in mailboxes.

"It reminds me so much of people's reaction after an earthquake," said Michal Strahilevitz, a business professor at Golden Gate University in San Francisco who studies investor behavior. "You're going about your daily business, and suddenly things that were never frightening are now frightening, and bad things that seemed impossible are now possible."

Some people are taking it to extremes.

Bonnie Reyes, president of a Michigan group that sponsors investment clubs, said a neighbor recently confided that she might withdraw all her money from the stock market and keep much of it at home. She was shopping online for a vault.

Even now, the majority of investment advisers would strongly urge people not to give up on stocks, especially when most of the damage to their portfolios arguably has been inflicted already.

Most individual investors are sticking with that advice.

by U.S. relations with Iran and other Middle Eastern countries, such as fluctuating gas prices.

"We're just hoping for people to hear different opinions from both sides, even if they disagree with them," Feder said. "We want it to be an eye-opening experience."

"It's important for students here to learn about the different issues in the Middle East, especially Israel," said junior political science major Molly Hartshorn.

"The election is in a few short weeks, and we, as students need to be as informed as possible when making our decision in the voting booths," she added.

The lecture will be held Tuesday, October 28, in Bartlett Hall Room 65 from 7:00 to 8:30 p.m.

Study finds tap as pure as bottled

By Kyle Bove
The Daily Reveille (LSU)

BATON ROUGE, La. — Like the age-old questions of boxers or briefs, Republican or Democrat and shaken or stirred, bottled water or tap seems to come up a lot these days.

But students would probably have a hard time distinguishing between the two as a study released last week by the Environmental Working Group suggested bottled water is no purer than tap water.

The study, which tested 10 major brands of bottled water in the U.S., found traces of 38 pollutants commonly found in tap water, including disinfection byproducts, fertilizer residue and pain medication.

Though the 10 brands met federal health standards for drinking water, two of the brands violated limits in California under the Safe Drinking Water and Toxic Enforcement Act of 1986.

Wal-Mart's Sam's Choice and Giant's Acadia bottled water brands contained illegal amounts of disinfection byproducts such as trihalomethanes.

These byproducts are linked to cancer and reproductive problems when they react with pollution in the water, according to the study.

The Environmental Working Group, an environmental activist organization in Washington, D.C. and California, is filing suit under the Safe Drinking Water and Toxic Enforcement Act to make Wal-Mart print a warning on its bottles, stating, "WARNING: This product contains a chemical known to the State of California to cause cancer."

Hays Owen, senior vice president and chief administrative officer for the Baton Rouge Water Company, said there are misconceptions about bottled water.

"The public is not educated enough about the rigorous processes and treatment the tap water systems go through," Owen said.

Owen said water that comes out of the tap in Baton Rouge fell as rain water nearly 2,000 years ago in Vicksburg, Miss. The water has gone through a natural filtration process and is now part of the Southern Hills aquifer system, he said.

The Baton Rouge Water Company has 65 ground wells that pump water from the system. From there, the water is treated with chlorine and sent to homes across the city.

The Baton Rouge Water Company tests and uses hundreds of samples throughout the system.

According to the 2007 Annual Water Quality Report, no violations of federal water standards occurred.

"The minimum price we charge our residences for water is $8.15 a month," Owen said. "For that, you get 2,244 gallons of water a month. Tap water is the greatest value there is."

Baton Rouge ranked No. 2 in 2007 in best water quality in the metropolitan areas in the U.S. by Men's Health magazine. Denver was No. 1.

"Baton Rouge tap water is excellent," said Ralph Portier, environmental sciences professor at LSU.

Portier said because most bottled water companies use aquifers for a portion of their water supply, people are often just buying the convenience of a bottle.

Chu urges new consideration

of the Senate, the Chief Justice, the Attorney General and numerous senators, about the preparedness of the Senate to question and follow the process of making an informed and thorough appointment of the Chancellor of Elections."

He continued to explain, "While this is a matter that, in a perfect world, Senators would have been prepared for, as the SGA President and according to my responsibility to 'take care that all the provisions of this Constitution, the General By-laws of the SGA and Acts of the SGA are faithfully executed,' I believe it is of upmost importance to ensure that this process (appointing a chancellor of elections) be given adequate consideration."

Chu explained further that he made his veto in consideration of the new senators and the importance of such an appointment and the necessity of following process.

The motion surrounding McNair was further tabled by Senator D'Alessandra Acosta, from Southwest North.

In response to the veto, McNair said, "I don't take the veto too personally. Don't get me wrong though; I'm upset that time which could have been used to build the Elections Commission is being wasted."

He continued to criticize President Chu's course of action, saying, "The real important thing here is that the president continues to put the same scrutiny on every appointment made this year. I think it would be a huge lapse in judgment to let any appointment, whether it be made by a governor or by President Chu to his cabinet, slide by without the kind of review that he has just made a precedent."

Several senators, including Scott Dresser, expressed concern.

"I am very concerned about this motion," Dresser said. "Mostly due to the fact that McNair received unanimous approval after an open question and answer session. What President Chu has just done is overrule the unanimous vote of the senate. Additionally, acting on the wishes of six senators against 26 does not express the will of the senate."

The senate will vote whether or not to override Chu's veto at next week's senate meeting.

Mach 15 travel one step closer

By Doug Eisleman
The Daily Princetonian

PRINCETON, N.J. — Hypersonic air travel for the masses may be on its way to becoming a reality, with the help of airflow-modeling work from a research team led by Princeton Mechanical and Aerospace Engineering professor Pino Martin. Martin's work could be used in the development of new aircraft jet engines that could reach Mach 15 – 15 times the speed of sound.

Though NASA has built small, high-speed aircraft called scramjets that can travel at speeds up to Mach 10, this engine technology is not ready for commercial aviation. More work must be done to make the engines more reliable, safe and efficient, and hypersonic engine airflow models, such as the ones developed by Martin, may be the key.

At such extreme speeds, it is nearly impossible to model airflow in a traditional wind tunnel, so computer models become essential for preliminary work, explained MAE professor and department chair Alexander Smits, who is a member of Martin's team.

"These simulations will lead to a better understanding of the physics involved, which will allow us to develop better laws and models," Martin said in a statement from the engineering school. "This new understanding may lead to novel design concepts that enable hypersonic travel as well as safe and affordable access to space."

Martin's team has succeeded in creating a model that is able to recognize shockwaves. Typically, this is a major challenge in modeling airflow, but it is critical for reaching a high level of computational precision. These shockwaves are extremely small, powerful and abrupt disturbances in the airflow, Smits explained.

"If these [shockwave] interactions are very strong, the airflow can separate, and the engine can un-start, which is a sudden loss of thrust. This happens even in hypersonic aircraft such as the SR-71 Blackbird," Smits said. In fact, un-start can cause engine failure, rapid decrease in speed and loss of control in an aircraft.

"We need to understand what happens in the engines, and we need to make sure that these interactions are controlled and don't lead to the most serious levels of un-start," Smits said.

Martin's computational models may aid in the development of improvements in hypersonic engine fuel efficiency, which has been a key deficiency to date, Smits noted.

New world record set on 7,000 mile flight

By David Brown
The Washington Post

The bar-tailed godwit, a plump shore bird with a recurved bill, has blown the record for nonstop, muscle-powered flight right out of the sky.

A study being published Wednesday reports that godwits can fly up to 7,242 miles without stopping in their annual fall migration from Alaska to New Zealand. The previous record, set by eastern curlews, was a 4,000-mile trip from eastern Australia to China.

The birds flew for five to nine days without rest, a few landing on South Pacific islands before resuming their trips, which were monitored by satellite in 2006 and 2007.

As a feat of sustained exercise unrelieved by sleeping, eating or drinking, the godwit's migration appears to be without precedent in the annals of vertebrate physiology.

"The human species doesn't work at these levels. So you just have to sit back in awe of it all," said Robert E. Gill Jr., a biologist with the U.S. Geological Survey, who headed the study.

The birds were expending energy at 8-to-10 times the rate they do at rest. The previous record for a boost in energy output is seven times the "basal metabolic rate." Peak output in human beings, achieved by Tour de France bicyclists, is a 6-fold increase.

"What this suggests to me is that we haven't yet mined the depths, we really don't know what the extremes are," said Kimberly Hammond, a physiological ecologist at the University of California at Riverside not involved in the research.

As astounding as the feat is the fact that it represents a highly evolved solution to a problem, not a fluke or one-time occurrence.

The nonstop, over-water route is free of predators and substantially shorter than a hop-scotching route down the eastern coast of Asia, which is the alternative. Landing and eating – literally, refueling – would expose the birds to disease and parasites at a time when they are probably somewhat immunosuppressed. It also would add weeks to the trip and itself take energy.

Godwits take flight from the beach as a researcher looks on. The birds recently set a record after flying five to nine days without rest.

So, all in all, flying nonstop across most of the north-south span of the Pacific Ocean is the safest thing to do.

The death rate during the migration is unknown but presumably low, as the population of bar-tailed godwits, estimated at 100,000, has been stable and long-lasting.

"This system would not have perpetuated itself if mortality were a big problem," said Gill, whose study is being published Wednesday in Proceedings B, a journal of The Royal Society, in England.

Gill and his colleagues outfitted 23 bar-tailed godwits with satellite transmitters that periodically sent a signal detected by a satellite.

Female godwits are substantially larger than males. A one-ounce, battery-powered device was surgically implanted in them, with the antennas exiting their bodies just beneath the tail. The smaller males got a solar-powered device weighing less than half an ounce strapped to their backs.

Nine of the transmitters functioned well enough on the southward flight to provide evidence of sustained, nonstop flight.

One female flew directly from the Yukon-Kuskokwim Delta of Alaska to New Zealand in eight days. Other birds either landed short of their destination in the Solomon Islands and Papua New Guinea, or the signal was lost near those places. Four were later identified in New Zealand by leg bands.

The birds weigh no more than 1.5 pounds when they leave. Half of that is fat, which they burn off completely during the flight. Some of the males may have lost their transmitters in flight as their bodies shrank.

The starting and stopping places are not chosen by chance. The Kuskokwim Delta is rich in food supply, which the birds must consume in prodigious quantities before leaving. The wintering site in New Zealand is largely free of predators. When the birds arrive in early October, they molt almost immediately.

The birds leave from late August to late September, departing only with favorable tail winds. How much of their journey is wind-aided is something the researchers hope to determine by overlaying the birds' routes with day-by-day meteorological data.

Survey questions relationship of Christians and environment

By Summer Ingram
The Lariat (Baylor U.)

WACO, Texas — Keeping with the ever-growing trend of environmental awareness, Dr. Paul Martens, professor of religion at Baylor University, is launching a study about how Christians are connecting with the environment. Martens received a grant from the University Research Committee and is now commencing his research.

"The topic [of the environment] seems unrelated to my field of study, but it isn't," he said. "We are focusing on organizations who claim to be Christians and then denominations of Christianity. We will analyze data from both of these ends and see what organized Christianity is actually doing; how they are engaging and articulating in their environments."

After "exhausting all possibilities" of finding these organizations by phone and internet, Martens compiled a fairly rigorous survey to send out to the groups. The survey includes questions about what environmental projects the organizations are doing, how many people are involved and if they have a mission statement or base their actions on any underlying theology.

"We are trying to discern whether it is primarily Christians individually doing these environmental projects, or if there are organizational efforts actually functioning," Martens said. "We want to get an accurate picture of what's going on, and no one's done this in recent years. In many ways, if we know where we are, we can know where we need to be."

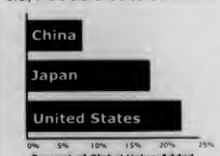
Martens teaches an environmental ethics class every semester, and the idea for the project began to form after talking with a graduate student looking to do research on the relationship between the environment and theology, he said.

"One reason I came to Baylor was to do some type of work with the doctrinal creation and environmental ethics," said Brandon Trick, doctoral student of religion. "Dr. Martens and I got to talking about the state of that within the church, and in our discussions we came to realize that there are a lot of groups, churches, religious organizations doing a lot of different environmental things for a lot of different reasons."

With their research, Martens and Trick may to discern what some of those reasons are.

"We are looking to see if there is good, solid theology behind these organizations' actions that can sustain them, or if it's more slipshod reasoning such as 'Oh, we do it because we're supposed to,'" Trick said. "In a dream world, we would love to see lots of churches, organizations and denominations having this issue at the forefront and really thinking about what our Christian response to the environment should be and why we should be doing it."

The perceived lack of concern for the environment in the Christian world is often something Christians have been criticized for in the past.



"It is a sweeping kind of criticism that is unfair to Christian universities especially," said Dr. Susan Bratton, chairman of the environmental science department.

"I do know of some environmental organizations that have had problems reaching out to faith-based communities, so I think it's really important to establish this connection between the theological world and the environmental one. The answers this research finds will be really important."

Overzealous spending

As the economy experiences its worst downturn in at least a generation, many people are feeling the implications financially. Whether it's declining retirement savings locked-up in stocks, the dearth of available entry-level jobs or the near non-existence of available credit, bear markets have far-reaching consequences.

But people are feeling the economic crisis beyond their wallets and the situation is widely affecting government budgets, including that of Massachusetts. The ever fiscally-cautious Mass. Government is currently bracing for an estimated $1.4 billion budget gap, driven by an anticipated $1.1 billion revenue shortfall.

Governor Deval Patrick recently announced plans, according to the Boston Globe, to immediately cut $755 million in services.

That figure includes a $12 million cut of the University of Massachusetts' budget.

Now, unfortunately, the taxpayers of this state – and the students of this University – are left to deal with the consequences.

Frankly, a budget that is dependent on the economy not declining is not really a budget – it's simply a wager on the future, as in 'How much money can I spend and get away with it?'

Remember this is the same government that passed a $1 billion life sciences bill over the summer. Of course that money wasn't all tacked on to the fiscal 2009 budget, but the fact that these politicians would so readily earmark these future funds only underscores their naivety.

But then again, Patrick's budget wasn't balanced from the beginning. The original included $400 million of state reserve funds.

It's probably a pretty good indication that problems are on the horizon when your budget is unbalanced and requires a best case-scenario economy to avoid disaster.

And a budget that can readily have $1.4 billion hacked off begs to reevaluated. If you can easily eliminate that much money, then why were those programs being funded in the first place?

The government's lack of fiscal restraint reflects that of America as a whole. We have become a debt-ridden society in which people think they have the inalienable right to purchase things they can't really afford.

It's time the state set a reasonable example for budgeting and spending, instead of this constant reliance on increasing long-term debt in order to make ends meet in the short term. At this rate, there will come a time when the state's bonds won't be a legitimate investment.

As much of a lame-duck four years Mitt Romney spent on Beacon Hill, it's hard to remember him screwing up the budget this badly. In fact, he guided the state out of a relatively serious fiscal crisis midway through his only term.

The fact is that Deval and the legislature shouldn't have been expected to anticipate the current economic crisis.

But they should have realized that the economy was taking a substantial downturn and should have adjusted their spending accordingly.

It wouldn't be surprising if the taxpayers support Question 1 on Nov. 4 to send a message to the Patrick administration. Cutting $1.4 billion would be nothing compared to the estimated $10 billion needed to trim if the state income tax is eliminated.

Politically, the timing could not have been any more unfortunate being so close to Nov. 4. But unlike feeling it in the wallet as most taxpayers, these politicians will also feel it where it hurts the most: through the vote.

Wean off oil

John Glaser

Imagine a world where the foreign policy of the most eminent superpower was not at all determined or influenced by the energy needs of its citizenry. Where blood and treasure were not wasted in vain in otherwise needless wars.

Imagine a circumstance not as twisted as one where our extremist enemies received funding for education, training and resources by our own dependence on the natural resources beneath their feet. And where the power of brutal authoritarians ruling over those lands were not sustained in large part by the immediacy of that dependence.

Imagine an America which led the international community in the reversal of what is perhaps the most damaging environmental disease yet bestowed upon Earth.

The world's troubling addictive reliance on oil as the engine to comfortable modern existence is an issue so all encompassing, so applicable in some way to nearly every political persuasion and ideological penchant, that it should be one in which affirmative progress is radically more forthcoming than it has so far proven to be.

Unfortunately, the bipartisan governing elite, along with the corresponding accepted opinion on how best to facilitate such progress, are ill equipped in paving the way for the supremacy of alternative renewable energy sources.

The need for what journalist Tom Friedman has called a Green Revolution – an unleashing of innovation and improvement in alternative energy – has become a national security issue as well as an environmental issue. The topic validates it as a concern pertinent to either side of the isle.

In a sense, our reliance on government solutions is hindering our progress in the fight to overcome reliance on oil.

A successful revolution of this sort would not only alter establishment policies significantly and change the world for the better, it would renew the much needed competitive economic edge America has had for most of its existence.

The inability of the Washington establishment to deliver workable constitutional legislation, however, is a reality overlooked by both the media and the electorate.

The pathetically transparent federal subsidization of corn-based ethanol – an energy source which several studies have shown dramatically accelerates global warming – is a ploy by the farm lobby as well as politicians looking for votes and eco-brownie points. Yet the public still faithfully looks to Congress for the answers to a sustainable future.

Calls by politicians to put forth gas tax holidays or to implement domestic oil drilling campaigns – an alleged tour de force towards self-sufficiency – are backwards-looking machinations barely cognizant of the problems we face. Yet voters and the media are still flush with reverence at the notion of omniscient politicians saving our world.

Impressionable voters, young and old, predictably fall for the stated plans of candidates for president, forgetting the failed or unfulfilled promises of a mere four years ago. In 2004, both the Republican and the Democratic Party platforms declared explicitly their commitment to research and investment in alternative energy sources.

Some of this legislation has been successful in both houses and has avoided veto, but few if any have produced desirable results. This is because arbitrary planning by ignorant representatives does not generate success and has not predicted the best areas on which to focus. It is all too reminiscent of Jimmy Carter's failed $19 billion investment in synthetic fuels in the 1970s energy crisis.

In a sense, our reliance on government solutions is hindering our progress in the fight to overcome reliance on oil. In order to realize a post-oil world we must learn to depend on a variety of potential solutions not bogged down by bureaucracy, as opposed to the solutions thus far exclusively relegated to government.

John Doerr, arguably the world's most prominent venture capitalist, told the New York Times recently that the fast developing private investment into the market towards green technologies are "signs that the multitrillion-dollar energy market [will] inevitably, and imminently, undergo a wholesale eco-transformation."

Doerr is a partner in the venture capital firm Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers, who raised hundreds of millions of dollars in the summer to invest into green technologies and, according to the New York Times, "financed 40 different green-tech companies and [by the beginning of the fall] raised a total of about $1 billion."

Doer's firm promised to revolutionize the market in areas like solar power, biofuels, electric cars – all which may be marketable by 2009, et cetera.

This is where our energy and environmental salvation harbors the most potential; in the hands of free individuals risking their own time and money on the areas they evaluate as most promising.

Some say greed is what keeps oil tycoons in power, but greed is exactly what will torque us out of the hole we've dug ourselves into. The partners at Kleiner, and hundreds of other firms just like it, are looking to make a profit. But they just might save the world while they're at it.

The greatest achievement of our time will be a sustainable, efficient alternative to oil and natural gas. History will have no room for Barack Obama or John McCain, as the capitalist Rockefeller of the green revolution will consume the pages of textbooks and autobiographies and his children's children's children will be trillionaires. And so be it.

Not so taboo issues addressed

Race and gender have been big issues during this presidential campaign, right? Right alongside health-care and the war – with education and the economy in between sits race and its good friend gender.

Solmaaz Yazdiha

Inevitably, the subject has been beaten and abused, overused and worn to its bare threads – we get it, guys, Obama's black and Palin's a woman. God Bless America.

But what if I tell you race is as risqué a topic as McCain's sex life? It's something that claims to be out there while it stays in the dark. It's a taboo to the "I." What everyone thinks they've been talking about, but really talking around, is race.

Sure, we think we've put the race card out on the table enough so everyone's aware that racism will be a factor, but let's just assume for this argument that it is. Why are people saying Obama's win is in the bag?

Invisible racism is everywhere. It's a new age kind of racist deal, full of politically correct Cathy's who are up to date with reality TV and adore their token, black friend.

What many are saying is it is a serious possibility that the large lead Obama has on McCain will come to a rude racist awakening come Election Day.

Will Sally Martin, an upstanding school-teacher and mother of two who says that she is voting for Obama, enter the booth and vote McCain? Will people say one thing and do another?

The danger is this, if popular belief is that Obama has it in the bag, many of his voters might not feel the need to vote. After all, why worry about a done deal?

On the other end, McCain supporters, fighting back against the "Ha-raccus," may rock the vote. Both of these dangerous factors together could cause a vote imbalance if the forecast of invisible racism proves true.

Race and gender are, as everyone has mentioned, an issue in this campaign. Sadly, they seem to be the most influential one. The number of people who claim they won't vote for McCain because of his choice in running mate is quite astounding.

Is this negative opinion of Sarah Palin one based on experience or gender? Both can be argued. But is it the truth? Though people claim that they aren't voting on personality, that's all anyone can seem to talk about.

It will be clear once this whole election is over whether America knows what it needs, or is still stuck in the past.

Judging public embraces between a candidate and his wife, then a candidate and his running mate, and gasp, between a candidate and his running mate's daughter's baby's father.

All the while, people are whispering not to mention that Palin is being a bad mother by running during her teenage daughter's pregnancy, because mentioning it would mean that you were sexist.

Mentioning it would mean that you were neglecting to point out Obama's, a man's, fatherly duty. But for sake of argument let's say that I would say the same thing if Obama's daughter was pregnant with his grandchild.

I'd argue that being pregnant is different than helping your pregnant child. I'm sure that will have some hockey moms hollerin', but I claim a stance of devil's advocate. As someone whose never been impregnated and/or had a child as the latter is dependent on the former, I really have no idea what either is like.

And even age factors in with all three musketeers, Obama, McCain and Palin. Obama's too young and inexperienced while the other day I heard a woman on the bus say that McCain was dumb to pick Palin because next to her he looks like an "old bag." Many think McCain cares more about dentures than democracy.

So there you have it, all the isms. Racism, sexism, ageism, an ism convention if you will. Who brought cake?

It will be clear once this whole election is over whether America knows what it needs, or is still stuck in the past.

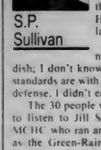
We say that we are a modern and diverse society that has come so far and bettered itself throughout history – we're now, we're right. As pauper of the party, the reality is we still live in a country where most gays can't marry, most women make less than the men in their field and a black man running for president may not win, even though, according to the numbers – he's supposed to.



It will be clear once this whole election is over whether America knows what it needs, or is still stuck in the past. Whether our claim of tolerance and unity is an honest one will be handled as a "we'll see" situation. Whatever is to come of our country, I hope it's guaranteed to be better than the past eight years.

A pressing question

S.P. Sullivan

It was a very Amherst evening.

About 30 people, many of them Green-Rainbow party members, Five College professors and Birkenstocked sustainability-enthusiasts, crammed into the Center Street home of Larry Ely, a board member of the Massachusetts Coalition for Healthy Communities (MCHC) last Sunday evening.

The event was a potluck dinner gone green. I didn't bring a dish; I don't know what the journalistic integrity standards are with participation in potlucks. In my defense, I didn't eat anything either.

The 30 people who did bring dishes were there to listen to Jill Stein M.D., the founder of the MCHC who ran an unsuccessful bid for governor as the Green-Rainbow candidate in 2002. Stein was there to promote passing Question 6, which is on the ballot in Amherst and about 25 other towns across the Commonwealth.

Question 6 rejects the adopted consensus most states have come to on global warming: a reduction of greenhouse gas emissions by 80 percent by 2050. The people swapping recipes and sustainability tips on Center Street Sunday night came to a consensus too: That's too little, too late.

"The idea that we have the luxury of waiting until 2050 is a fallacy," said Eli Beckerman, field coordinator for the Committee for Securing a Greener Future.

"We should shoot higher," said Gerald Peterson, a retired physics professor at the University of Massachusetts. "And that's what this does."

Stein's presentation, a clunky PowerPoint titled "A Sustainable Green Future," predicted fire and brimstone. Actually, it predicted quite the opposite: a whole lot of water.

"The ship is sinking," she said.

Nobody gasped. Most of them just nodded.

The ship Stein was speaking of was the Good Ship Life as We Know It, which has been chugging along on fossil fuels like the Titanic towards a melting iceberg. "No," says the captain. "We can take it."

Turns out we can't take it.

"We're facing economic losses so huge they are beyond the reach of a cost-benefit analysis," said Nathanael Fortune, a Smith College physics professor who took part in Stein's presentation.

He wasn't talking about the bailout.

Now would be a good time to buy land in central Mass. In just a few, short years you might have waterfront property.

Fortune was talking about the potential economic losses from large scale ecological disasters caused by global climate change. His and Stein's presentation outlined a "new urgency" – the rapid loss of ice shelves in Greenland and Antarctica. They said that water created on these ice shelves by warming caused by human beings has created melt water atop the shelves, which bores into the remaining ice like a "vertical river," down to the very bottom where it lubricates the space between the ice shelf and solid ground. Fortune offered up the analogy of "snow melting off a metal roof."

"Think of the sudden dumping to the ground that occurs," he said.

Stein and Fortune cited Robin E. Bell, director of the ADVANCE program at Columbia University's Earth Institute and an expert on the mechanisms of ice sheet collapse. Bell estimates that land-based ice sheets in Greenland and Antartica hold enough water to raise sea levels by over 200 feet.

Now would be a good time to buy land in central Mass. In just a few, short years you might have waterfront property.

But Stein offered the Chinese symbol for crisis, which is the go-to metaphor when you don't want to scare the crap out of your audience. It is said that it means both "danger" and "opportunity."

Really, it means: "Before you run for the hills, here's what I want you to do."

"This economy, the green economy, is already happening," Stein said. "Things are already bubbling."

She also said there isn't time to waste, and that given the state of our economy, a rapid push for sustainability comparable to a "war-time mobilization" could create enough jobs to get us over the hump.

"We don't have a choice. The more quickly we get there, the more prepared we'll be."

And that begins with not being satisfied with the lowest common denominator, the lowest fuel-economy standards and legislation that ultimately puts the problem off one more generation.

To my generation.

"This isn't going to end on Nov. 5," Stein said. "This problem isn't going away."

I don't know if Question 6 is the answer to all our problems. But I do know that virtually every issue weighing on voters' minds this election season – from the economy to the war in Iraq – has its roots in environmental policy and possible solutions in the lab of green engineers and scientists.

HvZ weaponry

Fake guns, violent imagery

Tina Ortiz

Brisk breezes and colorful foliage characterize October in New England. Unfortunately just as indicative are the signs that Humans vs. Zombies has yet again begun.

I am sure you've seen them: people in bandanas skulking about in the night, hiding in corners around the DCs just waiting to riddle unsuspecting people with their Nerf darts.

Needless to say, HvZ is lame, and if you don't think so, it is probably because you're lame yourself. However an article about how dumb the game is would be like writing about why the sky is blue; no reasonable person would be able to be convinced otherwise.

However, I fear when the layers of foolishness are pealed away, a frightening issue is revealed. In light of recent incidences of school violence across the nation, it's interesting that a game simulating shooting fellow students in public places is allowed on campus.

It's interesting that a game simulating shooting fellow students in public places is allowed on campus.

Outside of the fact that HvZ is a nuisance, I can't help but wonder if its presence on my campus is a dismal precursor to violent acts. I'm surprised that those who play aren't at all troubled by the image they project of themselves to the rest of the University of Massachusetts community.

I doubt the students of Columbine or Virginia Tech would allow "play violence" on school grounds. Forgive me for being blunt, but it's obvious those who play HvZ belong to a subculture frequently referred to as – for lack of a better word – nerds.

Now before you quickly stamp my forehead with "cookie-cutter casualty to pop culture," be aware, I found through conversations with many players that they often describe their social rejection as a point of pride.

Any form of social outcasting will incite violence, and despite how politically incorrect it may seem, guns of any kind in the hands of the rejected is an extremely unsettling image.

If violent video games which are played in the confines of a room can be correlated to violence in the real world, why would a game where you stalk people around campus with a "gun" be any different?

When I see people running around pretending to kill one another in a school setting, I can't help but think that in the future, after some tragedy, people will ask how a publicly funded institution allowed such a game.

This is not simply an issue of personal preference, I think the game is stupid, so I don't participate. However, I feel that its presence at UMass poses a potential threat to the safety of all that money I pay to attend.

Those who play with fire get burned, and by allowing a group of self-appointed geeks to pretend to shoot one another in school is asking for an unspeakable tragedy. No one should be allowed to use the campus as an arena for violent play because it simply isn't safe.

The rules of HvZ state that all dormitories are considered "safe zones" in which warfare between zombies and humans cannot take place. However this does not mean the game's presence does not penetrate dorm walls.

Although "kills" cannot be made, I've seen first hand that hallways are often used as shooting ranges where players can practice. If the game must exist, its presence and the Nerf guns should not be allowed indoors.

Anything can be used as a weapon if thrown hard enough or used violently, but the difference between a kitchen knife and a gun (real or fake) is quite clear.

Whereas a kitchen knife, used in its intended setting, is a non-lethal item, there are no instances in which a gun, used in its intended setting, is meant to do anything but be lethal, whether it's killing a "zombie" or murdering a fellow student.

I have the right to feel safe in my hallways and not see people toting fake guns while they attempt to compensate for some sense of authority they lack in reality.

HvZ does more harm than good. One characteristic that isn't shed from childhood to adulthood is the fact play fighting inevitably leads to real fighting.

Although I'm sure the charities supported by their food drive are thankful for the contributions, I can't imagine that they would be quick to defend a game that was in some way responsible for school violence.

The fact that it is so widely accepted by people is very disconcerting. How many more innocent students need to be murdered for the world to get the picture that school violence isn't a game?

Nerf darts are harmless

Eli Gottlieb

To everyone playing Humans vs. Zombies this semester, I have a small bit of advice: hide your guns or risk have them jacked by overzealous Resident Directors (RD) and Resident Assistants (RA). It happened to me the night before the game started.

I walked into my dorm from some stress-relieving target practice I'd been doing on trees, and found my cluster's RD telling me that I could either put my Nerf Magstrike somewhere safe and outdoors, or she could take it and throw it in the trash.

She said she gave me the former option because she really empathized with me and didn't want me to lose the value of the gun, but maintained that it was a weapon and therefore illegal within the dorms.

She even required that my gun have a permanent resting place outside since she didn't want me coming out two minutes later with a bag to smuggle it back inside.

Now as a matter of fact, I've looked up the relevant, Residence Life regulation. The prohibited items within the dorms are lethal weapons of any kind, and facsimiles of weapons.

But let's get back to my story. Being the smartass I am, I asked how a thing, with a purpose to play rather than to hurt people, counted as a weapon, and I proposed that under the RD's broad interpretation of the rules a bread knife would count as a weapon.

My RD replied that a bread knife is, in fact, a potential weapon because you can stab and kill a person with it. She also told me she has a bread knife in our dorm, but that bread knives are not illegal because their obvious and intended purpose is to cut bread rather than shoot foam darts at people. She finished by saying that if you shot someone in the eye with a Nerf gun they could really get hurt.

Now I hope I'm not the only one who sees the high-school-level stupidity here – the sheer contradiction to all common sense. An item that can actually kill someone is allowed in the dorms because its "intended purpose" is to cut bread rather than flesh.

An item that can only hurt someone if they stand still and allow you to shoot them in the eye at point-blank range is not allowed because its shape rather vaguely resembles that of a lethal weapon and because it could, theoretically, hurt someone.

Let me explain, for anyone who never played with Nerf guns in childhood, what my gun looks like. It is made of red plastic with black and yellow trim, and has a black, air bladder on the back end with a hand-pump on the front to fill the bladder.

When pumped up and subsequently fired it shoots small, yellow, foam darts tipped with a black, Velcro-like material designed to stick to fabrics at speeds too slow to kill a fly, though sufficient to stun a zombie.

It can only possibly hurt a human who wasn't trying to be hurt, and it doesn't look a damned thing like a real gun. So why does it qualify as a weapon or facsimile thereof again? Is because of its shape? Because people play make-believe that it's a real gun? Don't kid me.

The real reason Nerf guns are banned from residence halls is because University administrators come from devoutly and childishly leftist backgrounds and happen to personally dislike HvZ.

I haven't hurt anyone in two semesters of playing HvZ with Nerf guns.

I haven't hurt anyone in two semesters of playing HvZ with Nerf guns. The greatest injury ever incurred during the game was caused by sliding down the slope from the footpath outside of Worcester into the front yard of Mary Lyon in slippery weather, and since that player was a zombie, Nerf guns had absolutely nothing to do with it.

The continual treatment of HvZ players as criminals for enjoying ourselves in ways that other people don't approve of just seems utterly ludicrous. We don't abuse recreational drugs, and we've hurt nobody with our weapons so far.

Civilization is the tolerance of eccentricity to the point of insanity, yet the University continues to treat us as some sort of gang to eradicate rather than the insanely fun eccentrics we are.

So I'm going to keep playing with my "gun," and let me tell you: damn it feels good to be a gangsta. A real gangsta-type human plays his cards right. A real gangsta-type human knows that RAs don't want to look and don't want to see contraband.

And all I got to say to you overzealous, player-hating RDs is let us have our fake guns. Because when the zombie hordes come, how else can we survive? Damn it feels good to be a gangsta.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

7-CORRECTION

Dear Editor

(Re: "An inconvenient cup," Melissa Garber, Editorial, Oct. 16)

Hi Melissa. We read your column about "An inconvenient cup" and wanted to make sure you have the facts. As a former reporter and news editor, I know how important it is to get the details correct before publishing and that budding journalists want to be sure of the same. Not to take up much time, I want to point out a few errors in the column.

7-Election does not "force" a vote. The most popular hot beverage cup we offer come in a 20-oz size. So during our 7-Election campaign, we made two extra cups in this same size – one in red with the candidate's name on it, McCain and a blue one for Obama. Coffee drinkers still have a choice – red, blue or the regular, 7-Eleven-logo'ed 20-oz cup, or they can pick a regular 7-Eleven 12-, 16- or 24-oz cup that have no affiliations imprinted.

Regarding integrity of the system – we state that the 7-Election poll is unscientific and unofficial. Stores do not get to order more of one cup than the other. Each store [except in the higher coffee-consumption New York City area] was sent the same number of cases. Each case contains an equal number of red and blue cups.

If a store runs out of, let's say, red cups, they have been instructed to pull all blue cups until more red cups arrive. I don't see how the polls could be skewed by 7-Eleven employees or cup manufacturers. The red and blue cups have separate UPC codes that are scanned when purchased with the scanned information going to a central data system to be automatically tallied overnight and posted by 9 a.m. the following business day.

The grey-colored states on map in the 7-Election site are areas where there are no 7-Eleven stores.

The 7-Election poll includes only the Republican and Democratic presidential candidates – the same ones on the nationally televised debates. Third party voters can always choose the regular 7-eleven cup and even write their choice's name on it, if they want to make a statement.

Non-coffee drinkers aren't disenfranchised because the hot beverage cups can contain a variety of teas, cappuccino and hot chocolate, also available at 7-Eleven coffee aisles.

DEFINE 'WE'

(Re: "A new look at race," Editorial, Greg Collins, Oct. 14)

Dear Editor

"When both blacks and whites think of the term 'black culture' today, we automatically associate it with broken families, low-income communities and high unemployment rates."

Does anyone see anything wrong with this sentence? I certainly do. This quote is an excerpt from Greg Collin's article from the Oct. 14, Collegian Editorial/Opinion section entitled, "A new look at race."

In his editorial, Collins urges us to recognize that Blacks and African-Americans have achieved incredible feats, and they have not always been "powerless in our white-majority society."

Yes, Blacks and African-Americans have achieved amazing accomplishments despite the atrocities of slavery, the inequality of segregation and Jim Crow, and a lack of legal rights and protection from our government – and moreover, I applaud Mr. Collins for pointing out some of these accomplishments.

However, I have a problem with what Mr. Collins considers, "black culture." I am not entirely sure who the "we" in the above quotation refers to, but that "we" definitely does not include me.

In fact, I would challenge Mr. Collins to approach any of the professors in the African-American studies department, and ask what they "automatically associate," with "black culture." I think this view of "black culture," is the blatant repetition of a stereotype by an author (singular), not the viewpoint of any significant group as the pronoun "we," might suggest.

No, Blacks and African-Americans have not always been powerless in our society. I mean, slavery ended with the Emancipation Proclamation of 1863 right? Oh, and then there were the 13th, 14th and 15th amendments, but those only took another five years to pass – while former slaves were being denied the right to vote and used as tenant farmers in a system that very much resembled slavery.

Then came Jim Crow and segregation. Schools, churches, restaurants, bathrooms, and water fountains were all segregated – but that was really only another 80 years of oppression.

There were of course the lynching's during this time, but that only took 1,800 lives – reportedly. Finally, we hit the Civil Rights Movement in the 1960s, out of which came the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which supposedly ended the 300 years of inequality. However, if this was the end, no one would dare to hang a noose on the door of a black Columbia University professor's door in 2007. I guess racism isn't totally dead.

No, blacks and African-Americans have not always been powerless in our "white-majority society," they have just been enslaved, denied constitutional rights, segregated, relegated, and forced to live in fear. But we should just disregard this viewpoint as "deceptive," and "look at" race in a serious way."

Collins' closing line may be the most troubling. "But most importantly, only when we determine what has worked in the past for blacks can we decide how to best guarantee success for them, and for all Americans, in the future."

There seems to be another misuse of pronouns here. I am not sure who "we" refers to, but as a white person I am not going to make any decisions regarding the future of "them" as it refers to Blacks and African Americans. White people have gotten themselves in enough trouble determining the future of "them."

Ben Thompson
UMass Student

Dear Editor

Racism operates on so many levels. It is very difficult for a white man, who enjoys an unfairly advantaged place in American society, to truly understand the complexities of racism.

Some whites even choose to ignore or reject the notion that racism still exists. Often times white people who choose to ignore or reject the notion that racism still exists are those who believe the myth of an American meritocracy.

This ideology is founded on the idea that in America, individuals can go as far as their own merit takes them. The problem is that this ideology ignores prejudices and discrimination.

In a recent Daily Collegian article, "A new look at race," Greg Collins attempts to address what he considers "intolerant and insensitive" assumptions regarding race relations.

Yet, Mr. Collins article is very problematic on many levels. Lets address his argument that "concerns about race relations from 'Justice for Jason' leaders and Obama supporters bring to light one central assumption about the history of race in America: blacks, as former slaves brought to America against their will, have always been powerless in our White-majority society."

First of all this statement fails to make a connection between "Justice for Jason" leaders, Obama supporters and "central assumptions about the history of race in America." There are no references or source given to make this connection.

The 20th century examples Mr. Collins uses do not prove that the institution of racism no longer exists or is no longer relevant.

In fact, the individual incidences that are often highlighted are all instances where people of color are resisting negative societal messages, developing their own sense of power, and directly combating the racist power structure. The iconic symbols of the 1960s were directly attacking the white-supremacist power structure that prevents people of color from advancing.

Collins claim that the assumption that blacks have always been powerless in American history is simply misleading, intolerant, and insensitive to the millions of overlooked blacks who have sacrificed their lives to improve the well-being of their families and of future generations of blacks.

I do not recall anyone from the Justice for Jason committee claiming that blacks have always been powerless or anyone for that matter. What I do know is that blacks have limited power and access in American society.

In America there exists a history of cruelty toward black people including slavery, Jim Crow, lynching, brutality, and the Ku Klux Klan. How can people ignore this history or suggest that it should be discounted?

How can people suggest that we live in a truly equal society when those oppressive forces have transformed into inequitable school systems, where funds are distributed unevenly; when there is police brutality and a clearly racial motivated war on drugs, when there is racial profiling; when there is abject poverty that disproportionately affect people of color; and when there is unequal distribution of income and wealth?

NASA NEEDS FUNDS

Dear Editor:

(Re: NASA: Big Budget, Big Projects, Big Deal," Hannah Nelson, Editorial, Oct. 20)

Hannah Nelson misleads her readers when she strains to equate total U.S. military spending since 2001 to NASA's inflation-adjusted total over the last 50 years. She is unfair and inappropriate to insinuate that NASA has been a silent parasite and a wasteful blight on the federal budget.

The federal government spends most of your taxes like this: 21 percent for Social Security and other entitlements, 16 percent on foreign wars, 13 percent on homeland security, and nine percent for the interest payments on foreign debts.

Far down the list is NASA's 0.6 percent, $17.1 billion, or as Nelson puts it, an outrageous $57 per taxpayer every year.

By the same scale, every American spends roughly $2,500 per year to maintain our military presence in Iraq and Afghanistan. I am truthful that we (the least) to pay my share toward maintaining these bloody occupations, but I feel honored and patriotic to give my 17 bucks to NASA.

The benefits of taxpayer-funded science are not always immediately apparent, but NASA is relatively inexpensive. What should be evident is that the inconsistent rewards we glean from our meager science budget far outweigh the nonexistent returns on our enormous military expenditures.

Instead of questioning the necessity of such a minor, intangibly beneficial expense as NASA, this nation ought to question the need for its "war on terror," seven years in and with no end in sight. Investing in the future of American science should be a higher priority than waging endless wars of revenge (and of choice). Our skewed priorities are a national disgrace.

During the last decade we have fallen way behind Europe and Asia in science and mathematics. If we ever hope to regain our former prowess, questioning the necessity of NASA is a bad way to start.

Poet Kristin Bock will be reading from her first collection of poetry, "Cloisters," Friday night at Amherst Books.

Amherst Books hosts poet

New England native to read her newest work downtown

BY RIVKA BARRETT
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Kristin Bock is enjoying the success that accompanies her first published book of poetry.

She grew up in Woodbury, Connecticut, a tiny farm town. After earning a B.A. in English Literature from Southern Connecticut University, she came to the Pioneer Valley to study poetry at the University of Massachusetts. She learned from the likes of James Tate, Dara Wier and Agha Shahid Ali.

In 1999, she earned an M.F.A. in poetry from the University. She currently teaches at the Isenberg School of Management.

Bock wrote her first poem around the tender age of 12. As a high school student, she memorized entire Sylvia Plath poems.

"I adored her treatment of the image – how a single line could take me somewhere else in a moment, or freeze the space between moments," Bock said.

In graduate school, Bock read the works of James Wright, Rainer Maria Rilke, Emily Dickinson and Basho. With an interest in religion and theology, she also explored ancient spiritual texts such as the Dead Sea Scrolls.

She currently reads books on scientific subjects, such as astronomy.

"I try to reconcile science and religion somehow in my work, mainly because I long for them to coexist peacefully inside my own psyche," Bock said.

Bock attributes her love for poetry to her father, who was a still-life artist.

"His paintings facilitated my understanding of symbolism and metaphor and nurtured my love for powerful imagery [...] in short, art taught me the vocabu-

'Game Party' sequel misses mark

Most enjoyable when under the influence

BY JUSTIN GALSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Various scientific studies have shown that children's minds are factual sponges that can absorb far more than they can during any other stage in their life. The current generation of college-age students was taught simple things such as counting with the Count from "Sesame Street," and basic vocabulary with Pee-Wee Herman.

More recently, however, television shows like "Dora the Explorer" have presented children with more advanced subjects like Spanish, which past generations did not get exposure to until high school. Midway's latest video game for the Nintendo Wii, "Game Party 2," takes that exposure one step forward.

"Game Party 2" introduces children of all ages to integral skills that they need to hone while young in order to be as proficient as possible when they are old enough to know someone who can aid them in illegally getting their hands on alcohol.

They can practice beer pong and the newly popular bean bag toss. These skills are typically introduced during junior or senior year in high school, but thanks to Midway, your five-year-old niece can learn how to beat you at drinking games.

The game was created as a direct substitute to actual drinking games. The review copy of the game came with a letter to prospective reviewers. The letter is filled with blunt references to the combination of alcohol and this game.

A few things it states are:

"Many have noticed that playing 'Game Party 2' is even more fun when intoxicated."

"It's Wednesday night, there aren't any parties and your dorm room isn't big enough for a beer pong table... Luckily 'Game Party 2' for the Wii is now available."

"Gather your friends, your Wii and some, um, beverages and get the party started right."

"It's perfect for the 'don't-want-to-study-for-that-final blues.'"

They certainly aren't hiding who their audience is. The game is rated E for everybody. In their defense, they don't necessarily say "beer pong" but rather refer to it as "ping cup." So you can be rest assured knowing that your niece thinks there's water in those cups.

Midway knew what they were doing when they marketed the game towards alcoholic college students. The games get old quick, and the physics just don't make sense. The only

Long-serving mall santa left out in the cold

SEVIERVILLE, Tenn. — Santa just got the boot. And not just any Santa.

Michael Graham, of Sevierville, Tenn., has been Santa at Tysons Corner Center for so long that some who visited him when they were young have brought their own children to experience his magic: a real snowy beard, a twinkle in his eye, a way with children that conveyed the presence of a kind and timeless character. He drew family members from the Washington region and beyond who stood in long lines for hours and brought albums with pictures taken in his lap from Christmases past.

But after 18 years of planting children on his knee, Graham said Tuesday that the suburban Virginia mall is not inviting him back this year. Graham said he's not sure why, particularly because he had a contract until 2012. A spokeswoman for the company that manages the mall said Graham has done nothing wrong. It's just that the company wanted a different Santa signed on by the new photo operator who will run the event.

That leaves Graham, 51, without work this holiday season and with visions of foreclosure dancing in his head. Graham, who works as a carpenter in a small Tennessee town when he's not minding

No longer home on the range

BY SUSAN SALTER REYNOLDS
LOS ANGELES TIMES

SARATOGA, Wyo. — On Bridge Street, few shopkeepers know the name Annie Proulx. But they sure know the title of her most famous short story, "Brokeback Mountain."

"Yuck," says a wiry older woman in the Hat Creek Gift Shop, which sells cowboy tchotchkes. "Some people are just plain strange."

"I wish I'd never written it," Proulx says at her home five miles outside town, looking out enormous windows onto the river and the limestone cliffs that define her property.

Not because of the people in Saratoga, a town she doesn't think much of. Not even because the word "brokeback" has been misappropriated, as in, "Hey, you're not goin' brokeback on me, are you?"

It's all the manuscripts, screenplays and letters sent to her by men who rewrite or serialize her story, adding new characters, endings and even successive generations.

"These cover letters," she complains, "always begin with the sentence 'I'm not gay, but,' they think that just because they are men, they understand men better than I do."

The story, says Proulx, spine straight, hands slapping her knees for emphasis, "was about homophobia in a place."

So much of Proulx's hard, fine writing is about place it's a wonder more people don't try to find her. After winning the 1994 Pulitzer Prize for her novel "The Shipping News," set in Newfoundland, Proulx became a fixed star in the literary constellation, winning almost every prize a writer could win.

She has often criticized the literary establishment for knowing nothing about what goes on in America outside its cities. She hates and generally refuses interviews (especially in her home). But she has agreed to talk – although a polite e-mail from her publicist warns that she "takes a while to warm up to people." Her ferocity is literary legend, often cushioned by the phrase "doesn't suffer fools."

No one in Saratoga knows her name, not the woman who runs the gallery, the man who runs the print shop, the women at the Valley Women's Christian meeting or the men in Shively's Hardware store. But they know "Brokeback," and they know the piece of land she lives on.

It is a bit of heaven – 640 acres with a mile of riverfront on the lazy North Platte. To get here you ascend from Laramie through the Snowy Mountains and the Medicine Bow National Forest. Then you're in grasslands. The yellow aspen do that shimmering dance beside the deep green of the lodgepole pines.

The long road to Proulx's house passes cattle and round hay bales. Two iron ravens guard her gate. Sheets hang to dry in a perfect blue Wyoming sky. The house Proulx had built here in 2004 is large and modern. With all those windows, you can see visitors kicking up dust on the road miles away.

Proulx bought the land from the Nature Conservancy, but now she is ready to move on, at least for the winters. "I like to keep moving," she explains.

The road into the house, though beautiful, turns to mush for much of the year – weather prevents mail and visitors, and Proulx, 73, worries about emergencies. She lives alone, with no hired help, but has four grown children who want her to hold on to the property.

"As far as I know," she says, "they've never read a single one of my books. We've never spoken of them. It's not that we don't get along, it's just that we don't talk about my writing." She shoots a sideways look that says: "End of discussion."

This look – in combination with Proulx's short, steely gray-brown hair, bright eyes, focused attention, utter lack of makeup or jewelry, and monastically simple clothing (white cotton shirt, linen pants and brown Merrells) – is enough to make a person think twice before asking a personal question.

Proulx has a way of waiting politely while one stumbles, mutters and reveals personal tidbits

Originally from Vermont, "Brokeback Mountain" author Annie Proulx now calls Saratoga, Wyo. home.

Whether they're exploring the expanses of the universe or the depths of relationships, Snow Patrol is a band that has always been searching for their niche in the musical world.

The latest from Scotland's biggest export, "A Hundred Million Suns," is set for release on Oct. 28, but the countdown has long since begun. Their fifth album to date, "Suns" is a compromise between the band's early, independent sound and their newfound pop image.

No band today embodies popular success better than these Scottish storytellers, who lean with all their musical weight on their ability to craft beautiful melodies.

From their beginnings as an independent band in Glasgow, Snow Patrol has represented a sort of electronic-meets-alternative sound that lends itself well to the radio. Their latest release is no exception to this rule.

This album, however, also serves as a vessel for the experimentation of Gary Lightbody, the band's singer, songwriter and guitarist.

"A Hundred Million Suns" has a prominent celestial theme, referring often to the stars and space travel, a difficult topic to take on without sounding pretentious.

As if to acquaint the listener with the album's theme from the start, "If There's a Rocket Tie Me to It," begins with an ambient drifting that imitates the celestial theme brilliantly. It proceeds to swell with the hushed passion of Lightbody's vocals into a dramatic display of both the beauty and darkness of life on earth.

"This is a love record rather than a break up record, but wonderful as that may be, it's set in the context of a world that's as terrifying as it is beautiful," said Lightbody regarding the concept for the album.

The first single, "Take Back the City," is like nothing else the band has ever recorded, while managing to retain the defining features of a Snow Patrol song. The lyrics display their signature escapism and the electric guitar has a distinctive brand of distor-

Snow Patrol experiment with a number of new styles in their newest album "A Hundred Million Suns." The album is set for release on Oct. 28.

Proulx on literarture, Wyoming

Author Annie Proulx is best known for writing "Brokeback Mountain," a story she now wishes she'd never written. The story was turned into a full-length feature film in 2005 starring Heath Ledger and Jake Gyllenhaal.

entirely beside the point. And yet she is entirely gracious and hospitable, if a bit weary of where she lives and the people she lives among.

"I moved to Wyoming for the long sightlines and the walkability," she says, making coffee in a kitchen of steel surfaces and brightly colored cabinets with antler handles. "But I've had enough."

Glossy red tomatoes, which the author has grown from seeds she got in Italy, dry on a dish towel. "They're tart," she says slyly, as if delivering a metaphor, "so they make a great sauce."

This could be the recipe for Proulx's fiction. Her new book, "Fine Just the Way It Is," is the third in an astringent triptych of Wyoming story collections, joining "Close Range" (which includes "Brokeback Mountain") and "Bad Dirt."

The first of these books, Proulx explains, "was a backhand swipe at the mythology of the West – the old beliefs that aren't really true, like the idea that there are no homosexuals in Wyoming. Everyone here is playing some role: the brave pioneer woman, the cowboy."

Although she admired Ang Lee's film of "Brokeback Mountain," it irks her that so many men thought they understood her characters better than she did.

In her fiction, she has shown more interest in men than women because, she explains, men in rural communities tend to be the ones who get out and do things. But it's also true that at this point in her life most of her friends are men.

When asked about the interruptions to her career caused by three marriages and three divorces, she shrugs. "You can like 'em," she jokes about men, "but it doesn't mean you have to sample every single one."

What fascinates Proulx, going back to her days as a history student at the University of Vermont, are cultures in their death throes. She studied the French Annales School method, which involves looking carefully at documents, receipts, census reports, recipes – any record of daily life.

This is what Proulx does with her fiction, researching everyday lives in a place. She uses this – although not, she says, the actual characters – along with bits of dialogue picked up in bars and restaurants. Her life is a whirlwind of bits of paper, notes on envelopes, notebooks that cohere, tornado-style, into her tight, unsentimental stories.

For this, she needs time and isolation, so her anonymity in Saratoga is a good thing. But there is a larger problem. Writers, especially famous ones, do not make good neighbors in the warm and fuzzy sense. Locals don't always appreciate seeing themselves in fiction's wobbly mirror.

Proulx says she doesn't mind, that "writing is a solitary pursuit," that she likes to be alone. Still, it's interesting when a writer, identified for over a decade with a particular region, decides that the fit is not right, that it's time to move on.

"The downside of the writing life is that you are a constant observer of other people's lives. I was always the one at parties standing against the wall."

Proulx has another book coming out this fall, "Red Desert: History of a Place." It began as an introduction to a collection of photographs by Saratoga photographer Martin Stupich of the 6,000-square-mile desert less than an hour from town.

When Proulx went to the University of Wyoming library in Laramie to research her introduction, however, she found that not one book had been written on the desert.

Between encroaching development and extraction industries (especially natural gas), the desert flora, fauna and geology have been imperiled for decades and are now, with hundreds of roads, wells and refineries getting the go-ahead each month, on their last legs.

The book, Proulx insists, is more a commemoration than a plea to save the desert. She gathered scientists and historians to contribute chapters. All found something new, something hitherto undiscovered: rock paintings, subspecies of plants, never-before-seen insects.

Proulx got a late start as a writer. Her first book appeared in 1988, when she was 53 (unless you count the book/pamphlet on how to make hard cider). She says it's not really a late start if you "count the lifetime of reading" she did before she was published. "You treat characters differently when you know something about how life works – how folks handle disappointments and wounding."

Proulx lived for 30 years in Vermont ("the only thing people talked about there was wood – how many cords for the winter, what kind burned the best"), where she wrote for an outdoor magazine called Gray's Journal. It was the closest she has ever come, as a writer, to a community.

"There were eight or 10 of us," she remembers, "including Ted Hoagland and Howard Mosher. The journal was an alternative to the hook-and-bullet press, more in the style of the 1890s field-and-stream pieces you used to see. The pay was always late."

These days, she complains of having no writing time. "It's a big house," she says, eyeing a line of dust atop a photograph that has been bothering her for the last hour or so. "It's hard to keep clean. I read with stupefaction of men who rise every morning and write until 2, then come downstairs to begin drinking."

Toward the end of the writing process, Proulx will often work 16 hours a day. "I love shaping things, pruning out the unnecessary, shaping unshapely sentences. After things are published I never read them again. I never, ever read reviews." (In the case of "Fine Just the Way It Is," that's just as well, since the reviews have been mixed.)

Proulx believes the computer is "the enemy of careful writing." She prefers to write by hand, using the computer as "a joinery device."

"There's something about the rhythm of writing on the page with a pen," she says, "that is richly fulfilling – like drawing a picture."

It is now hunting season in Wyoming: deer, elk and grouse. Pronghorn huddle in record numbers inside fences on private land. With their big eyes and white saddle markings, they outnumber the cattle. Roadside signs read "Open Range. Loose stock." It can seem like another planet, and people here like it that way.

Sunday morning, the little deli/cafe called Espresso Bellissima on the corner of Bridge Street and Route 130 is packed. A man everyone calls Buck says he enjoyed the movie "Brokeback Mountain."

Buck is 93 and has lived in Wyoming all his life. "People's choices are their own business," he says.

Father Karl, who has just delivered the sermon at St. Ann's, says he gave a copy of "Close Range" lary of poetry," Bock said.

"Cloisters" first came to being in the summer of 2004, after Bock had taken a three-year hiatus from writing. She sent her manuscript to 15 different contests, and was chosen as a semi-finalist by one of them. The next step Bock took was to join a local writer's group and revise the manuscript.

She sent it out again. This time, she placed as a semifinalist, not just once, but 12 times. She won the Tupelo Press First Book Award in 2006. "Cloisters" was published in October 2008.

Bock purposely arranged "Cloisters" so that the book is separated into sections that represent the five stages of grief – denial, bargaining, anger, depression and acceptance. In addition, Bock says the narrative is organized according to "the four seasons, which are marked by an arc of prayer, of reflection, of abandonment and of redemption."

"While most poems in the book are pastoral in setting, with their emphasis on Beauty, Nature, and the Divine, the hermetic vision of the speaker leads us into the interior of the Self," Bock said.

Many of her poems reflect healing through solitude and meditation. Hence the title "Cloisters." In medieval times, cloisters provided quiet areas for meditation or study.

"Poetry saves my world from passing me by in indistinguishable gray washes, as if I were on a fast train passing through a burned city. It brings my world into focus," Bock said.

Three years ago, Bock and her husband bought a house in Montague Center.

"The people are friendly and supportive, and you can't throw a rock around here without hitting an artist," Bock said.

This Friday, October 24, at 8 p.m., Bock will be reading from "Cloisters" at Amherst Books. The poetry reading is free and open to the public.

One not-so-jolly Christmas

JAMES A. MOORE/THE WASHINGTON POST

the store at the North Pole, said he was counting on the $30,000 he would earn as Santa when he bought a new house last year.

Now it's too late to book another mall, and he has already spent a good bit of money preparing for Christmas. It's not elves who make each of the three $900 custom-tailored velvet suits he uses each year, or the boots that go for $725 a pair.

"It obviously put me in a major bind," Graham said in a telephone interview.

Those who have known him over the years reacted to the news as if they had been exiled to the Island of Broken Toys.

"What a bunch of Grinches to do that!" said Michelle Gallagher, 40, who took her 3-year-old daughter, Anna, to see him. "I'm absolutely shocked."

Gallagher, of Leesburg, Va., said she still has last year's holiday picture, with her daughter and Santa, hanging on the refrigerator.

"He is the Santa you imagine in your mind," Gallagher said. "It's his whole demeanor, his whole presence. It's his eyes. The cheeks. The beard. It's a real beard, too — it's huge. I mean, I won't go back there if he's not there. I won't even shop there."

People who know Graham say his ability to play Santa Claus has something to do with having three children, four grandchildren and a deep religious faith. He also takes his seasonal work seriously. He said he has never missed a day of duty. He also said he does not drink. He does not smoke. He does not curse.

His impersonation of St. Nick inspired Southern Living Magazine to write, "Yes, Virginia, there really is a Santa Claus. His name is Mike Graham."

Graham, also featured in the mall's holiday advertising, said he signed a 10-year contract in 1993 that was renewed in 2003 and extended in 2006 for six more years to 2012. He acknowledged that the contract could be canceled on short notice.

Allison Fischer, a spokeswoman for Macerich Co., which manages the mall, said the company jointly selected a new Santa with a new photo operator, which she identified as IPI-World Wide Photography. The company arranges same-day photography for special events and malls that host Santas, according to its Web site. A call to IPI-World Wide late Tuesday was not returned.

Graham got his start when he filled in 23 years ago for a Santa who had a heart attack. His first job was at a mall outside Nashville, and it didn't take long for him to fall in love with the role. The next venue, in Tuscaloosa, Ala., featured a grand entrance with reindeer. Then he got the job at Tysons Corner. Over the years, he learned some tricks: He needed three suits (kids' accidents, wear and tear), and he has had to field some unusual requests. One boy asked for a mimosa tree.

"You take care of kids just like they're your own," Graham said. "The best thing you can do for any kids at all is give them that one-on-one time. But instead of talking over them, you look directly in their eyes. That's the secret of the whole thing."

Alzheimer stamp hits home

BY STEVE HENDRIX
THE WASHINGTON POST

WASHINGTON — Ethel Kessler is used to squeezing big ideas into tiny spaces. As one of four art directors contracted by the U.S. Postal Service to create stamps, the Bethesda, Md., designer has produced hundreds of peel-and-stick commemorations of subjects including American choreography, the Chinese New Year and love itself.

But when it came to reducing the vast and tragic issue of Alzheimer's disease to a one-inch canvas, that was tough. Because that was personal.

Kessler's mother is in the later stages of Alzheimer's. And it was just as the designer began working on an Alzheimer's awareness stamp three years ago that her mother began a steep decline, stopped recognizing her daughter and had to move to a nursing home.

"It's one of the most emotional projects I've ever worked on," Kessler said last Friday, the day her Alzheimer's stamp was officially released. "I'm not even sure my mother remembers my name now. She hasn't said it in a long time."

Kessler's design portrays an elderly woman wearing an expression of soft emptiness, a hand laid comfortingly on her shoulder by an unseen companion. It's that loving touch from behind that stems from Kessler's experience, the recognition that Alzheimer's strikes not only its victims but their families.

"The whole notion of caregivers is critical," Kessler said. "They provide the care that Alzheimer's patients need to live, and they suffer a terrible loss of their own. It took us 10 or 15 false starts before we finally figured that out."

David Failor, the Postal Service's executive director of stamp services, said officials looked at dozens of designs before Kessler provided one that fully captured the serene menace of the disease.

"It's about being able to tell a story on this little piece of paper," he said. "Ethel is just very good at that."

The Baltimore-born Kessler has designed more than 200 stamps for the post office since she became one of its outside art directors 12 years ago. Her studios, Kessler Design Group, are lined with images familiar from the daily mail: a bright and graphic Hattie McDaniel, the first African-American to win an Academy Award; a brilliant underwater coral reef; a sheet depicting paintings and images of the civil rights movement.

First-class art, in the most literal sense.

"How in the world do you fit the civil rights movement on a stamp?" Kessler asked with a laugh at the central challenge of her craft. Her answer: "Very carefully."

In that case, she found some of the most powerful paintings, sculpture and photographs from the segregation era and cropped them to work on an extra-small scale.

"Stamps are not just a reduction of a larger image," she said. "It becomes a new iconic image itself."

A citizens advisory panel decides who and what will be honored on our envelopes each year. Kessler's job is to take those topics — as varied as Irving Berlin and America's national parks — and make them work in thumbnail dimensions.

Her first step is to research the topic, seeking to understand the subject well enough to boil it down to its essence. For Alzheimer's, she contacted the National Institutes of Health, various advocacy groups and some of her friends who have parents suffering from the disease.

When Kessler finally hit upon her idea for the Alzheimer's design, she asked New York artist Matt Mahurin to draw the portrait. He used his aunt as a model and his wife's hand as the caregiver's.

"He was nearly perfect on the first sketch he sent," Kessler said. "That's part of my job: knowing of virtually every artist and illustrator out there."

Kessler also created the 1998 breast cancer awareness stamp, the first stamp used to raise funds for an outside cause. It was another personal issue for the designer, who won her battle with breast cancer in 1994.

The Postal Service has sold more than 1 billion of the breast cancer stamps, and those, plus her many other tiny works, surely make Kessler one of the best-selling designers of all time.

Her work is widely available and currently sells for 42 cents apiece.

They're having some 'fun' on 'Fox & Friends'

BY MAURA GOLD
LOS ANGELES TIMES

NEW YORK — It was just after 7 a.m. on the set of "Fox & Friends," but the studio already looked like the scene of a college all-nighter. Papers and blue index cards littered the couch next to the three co-hosts, and the mood resembled the giddy intensity produced by sleeplessness and large doses of caffeine.

Co-host Brian Kilmeade, discussing Sen. John McCain's debate performance, noted that he might be "a man of substance with a career and a resume, but he is not a master — a master debater."

Kilmeade broke into a grin as he realized how close he came to accidentally saying something else.

"We just gave the people who are reading the subtitles quite a shock," said co-host Steve Doocy, shaking with laughter.

"Master Debater," Kilmeade repeated carefully, trying not to crack up.

The loose atmosphere is the signature characteristic of "Fox & Friends," the freewheeling program on Fox News that dominates the morning competition on cable. The hosts' political observations and pungent personal comments have stirred controversy, drawing detractors even as they have raised the show's profile.

"Here you have an ability to do stuff, and then they can always rein you in," Kilmeade said after the program. "But I know I'm not going to get reprimanded."

"Fox & Friends" has attracted more than 1.2 million viewers on average so far this month, topping the combined viewership of CNN's "American Morning" and MSNBC's "Morning Joe." And in 16 major local markets, including Los Angeles, the cable program gets a bigger audience than CBS's "The Early Show," even though it airs from 3 to 6 a.m. on the West Coast.

Co-host Gretchen Carlson, who co-anchored the Saturday edition of "The Early Show" before joining Fox News, that producers there would cut her off when she tried to improvise.

Now, "when we make a mistake reading the news headlines, whereas at a (broadcast) network you'd probably get fired, instead, we're like, 'Eh, we screwed up,'" she said. "And I think that's disarming."

Essentially three hours of ad-libbed banter, "Fox & Friends" has generated a rich supply of YouTube moments, especially during the charged political season.

Often, it's the guests who are unpredictable: Friday, liberal radio host Ed Schultz walked off the show in exasperation after conservative radio host Steve Malzberg interrupted his defense of Sen. Barack Obama's tax-cut plan.

But the "Fox & Friends" hosts also have produced controversy on their own. Last year, they triggered a rare public admonishment from network executives after discussing an article in a conservative magazine that claimed Obama had attended a madrassa in Indonesia as a child.

The report was quickly discredited and John Moody, Fox News' executive vice president of news editorial, said at the time that they should not have reported the piece without confirming its accuracy.

For many Democrats, the incident cemented the program's right-leaning reputation, a charge the hosts reject.

"You have to remember that the mainstream media is not fair and balanced," said Carlson, who, like her co-hosts, said she's a political independent. "I've worked there. And so we maybe look a little different, because we're talking about issues that nobody else is."

Lately, "Fox & Friends" has focused on Obama's association with onetime anti-government radical William Ayers and questionable voter registrations by the community group ACORN, which has endorsed Obama. Both stories dominated the program during the last week, underscored by on-screen captions such as "Stealing the Election? McCain Calls Obama Out Over ACORN" and "Up in the Ayers."

See FOX on page 9

Will Mac Mention Obama Terror Ties?"

"The notion of 'Fox & Friends' being 'fair and balanced' is about as credible as fried chicken being low-fat," said Stephanie Cutter, chief of staff to Michelle Obama, after a tense on-air exchange with the hosts Thursday about ACORN.

The anchors insist they're tough on both presidential candidates. After interviewing Cutter, they noted, they asked McCain campaign manager Rick Davis about McCain's praise for ACORN in 2006.

"People know that we're going to cover both points of view," Carlson said.

Sometimes, the tone gets personal.

In July, Doocy disparaged a New York Times reporter who had written an article about Fox News' ratings that he called "a hit piece." The screen displayed digitally altered photos of reporter Jacques Steinberg and his editor, Steven Reddicliffe, that their outraged colleagues said resembled anti-Semitic caricatures.

The hosts disputed that notion, adding that their executive producer at that time, David Brown, is Jewish.

Doocy called the segment "our chance to have a little fun, goof on 'em." When asked if he felt in retrospect whether it was a good idea, he replied: "It got their attention."

At the time, Moody explained the bit by calling the program "an entertainment show that does some news," adding: "Some of the humor gets edgy."

The hosts embrace the program's light approach -- "Would you want to watch some boring old stodgy newscast?" asked Carlson -- but also defend their news chops.

"When we're interviewing Senator Obama, I don't break into song," Kilmeade said. "When we're interviewing Senator McCain, I don't tickle him. We're going to be serious at the right time."

On a recent show, they alternated between intense discussions of the campaign and teasing antics. After Kilmeade scribbled something on a piece of paper that he couldn't say on the air, Doocy stuffed the paper in his mouth.

Kilmeade noted that comedy programs such as "The Daily Show" often poke fun at "Fox & Friends," not realizing that the hosts are joking themselves.

"I mean, that's the way we are in real life," he said, gesturing to his co-hosts. "He's sarcastic, I'm sarcastic, Gretchen's got an attitude. They think they have the market cornered on humor, like we couldn't possibly be humorous on purpose."

Added Doocy, "We take the news seriously, but we don't take ourselves seriously."

Palin shows political humor, tact on SNL

BY VERNE GAY
NEWSDAY (MCT)

If not quite Richard Nixon's "sock it to me?" moment on "Laugh In" almost exactly 40 years ago, Sarah Palin's TV appearance on "Saturday Night Live" still proved two entirely separate, but related and incontrovertible facts.

First: The lady from Wasilla has a sense of humor. Second: That little show over at 30 Rockefeller Plaza remains as vital a part of the cultural landscape as it did back in 1975, at birth.

An estimated 14 million viewers tuned in Saturday night, the biggest "SNL" audience since 1994, when Nancy Kerrigan and Aretha Franklin appeared. It was, in fact, one of the heftier audiences for any network program so far this fall.

Palin was on camera five minutes, if that, and had three, maybe four lines — including, of course, one of TV's most indelible: "I live from New York ..." But what she said didn't really matter as much as what she did, which was to turn up.

Believe it or not, there was some political risk for Palin. An "SNL" appearance, however innocuous, threw her into the arms of the East Coast liberal elite — those arch, cynical, Harvard-educated types who presumably sneer at Joe Sixpack and Joe the Plumber — Sarah's people. Moreover, "SNL" has bestowed upon Palin — just three weeks before D-Day — a little comic credibility and maybe even a few additional votes in the process.

Tina Fey — the other Sarah Palin — didn't even meet her twin during the show, or at least as far as viewers at home could tell. Did Fey keep her at arm's length because of her own political leanings? A topic, no doubt, for bloggers this week.

During an interview with WWOR's Brenda Blackmon on Sunday, Palin said of her appearance, "We need more of these days. When it is just fun, I would do it again." She also noted that she didn't attend the famous after-show party — a reminder that for both Palin and "SNL," the appearance was strictly business.

Vice Presidential candidate Sarah Palin made a brief appearance Saturday on NBC's Saturday Night Live.

Wii game targets college drinking crowds

Midway's "Game Party 2" is available on the Nintendo Wii game console.

feasible way to think the game is well-made and fun to play would be under serious influence of alcohol.

The original "Game Party" was an awful release and lacked a diverse selection of games to choose from. "Game Party 2" improves upon the selection and has 11 games in all. The games include puck bowling, lawn darts, quarterback challenge, horseshoes, beanbag toss, trivia, darts, skill ball, hoop shoot and shuffle board.

There are no levels or difficulty settings. There is a tournament mode with allows to you to trudge through the monotonous mini-games for a longer period of time.

The characters you play with are very lazily made, and the poplar custom made Mii's cannot be imported from your Mii channel into the game.

For those of you who have played real-life ping-cup or have ever even tossed a ping-pong ball, you understand how they bounce. Apparently the designers at Midway do not. The game play is completely unrealistic. When playing puck bowling, you push a puck at bowling pins. The pins disappear on contact, rather than rolling around like regular pins do. The bounces, the rolls, the bowling pins falling, they all don't make any sense.

The trivia game is fun, and is the one redeeming highlight of the game as a whole. It's pretty addicting, but presents some questions based on facts that truly are impossible to have known previously to playing this particular game. It also does not take long for questions to begin to repeat themselves, which is quite frustrating.

"Game Party 2" tries to present itself as a glorified "Wii Play" or "Wii Sports," but fails epically. Considering the bad economy and the rising price of solo cups and ping pong balls, you may flirt with buying "Game Party 2" at $29.99. It probably won't be the worst thirty dollars you'd ever spend, but it would give that 2-disc "Gigli" Special Edition Directors Cut Blu-Ray DVD a run for its money.

On the other hand, if you have a burning desire to drink gratuitous amounts of alcohol and play lawn darts, you found your game.

'Suns' shows undeniable growth

On "A Hundred Million Suns" Scottish band Snow Patrol explore new territories while incorporating their usual pop ballads.

tion that is uniquely theirs.

"Lifeboats" and "Disaster Button" prove just how much diversity is present on this album. The former is a delicate but rhythmic picture of the abstract, based roughly on a dream of Lightbody's. The latter song is presented as a jaunting, electric guitar based anthem about losing control of oneself at the hands of a relationship.

Because there are a significant amount of risks taken on this album, some songs such as, "The Planets Bend Between Us (For You)" seem to get lost. Without any real diversity or points of interest, there is nothing substantial to keep this song afloat.

After the wild success of their last album, "Eyes Open," Lightbody branched out further with his music, decidedly aiming for a more experimental sound.

This determined experimentalism is most obvious on the final track, "The Lightning Strike." It is significantly closer to symphonic grandiosity than the typical Snow Patrol pop ballad.

Written in three distinctive parts, the song is at once rousing and complacent, depending on varying dynamics to keep the listener interested for the full 16 minutes.

Focusing again on the celestial in both lyrics and instrumentation, it displays impassioned professions of love drizzled in ambient piano, returning at the end to an alt-rock equilibrium.

Despite the diversity within the album, there are some aspects of the band's music that simply do not change from album to album, leaving room for a little more growth. The album displays both the subtle and the rollicking sides of Snow Patrol, but they still seem to write songs with little lyrical and tonal diversity, which can come across as monotonous at times.

"A Hundred Million Suns" is simply hindered by the growing pains of a young band with a lot of potential. The band only has to find the balance between variation and cohesion in order to perfect what they have already begun.

Having said that, the band has made tremendous progress from their last album on the individuality front. On "Suns" the band is successful in crafting a signature sound and displaying a penchant for gorgeous melodies.

Bryant's quarterback Jay Graber has started all seven games for the Bulldogs averaging 164.4 yards per game through the air. With the amount of times Bryant runs the ball, its unlikely Garber will have chart-topping numbers.

The junior has completed 105 out of his 190 attempts throwing for 1,151 yards, 10 touchdowns and eight interceptions. Against RMU Graber almost matched his average throwing for 161 yards and two scores.

Another familiar facet that the Maroon and White will face is the pair of running backs that the Bulldogs utilize.

Jerell Smith and Lindsey Gamble have 255 of Bryant's 311 total carries.

Smith, who has played in all seven games leads the team in rushing and in attempts. The senior has a net gain of 814 yards, an average of 5.7 yards per carry. He also averages 116.3 yards per game and has scored four touchdowns on the season.

Gamble has played in six of the Bulldog's seven games carrying the ball 113 times and rushing for a net gain of 429 yards. The junior averages 71.5 yards per game and has scored four touchdowns on the season as well.

The Bulldogs also boast a handful of receivers that touch the ball an equal amount.

Ross Giffune (19 catches, 224 yards), Anthony Dinaso (15 catches, 192 yards and three touchdowns), J. Solimando (13 catches, 167 yards and three touchdowns), Vinton South (12 catches, 183 yards and one touchdown) and Ryan Buckley (11 catches, 113 yards) have amounted for 70 of the 102 completed passes by Garber.

Bryant's big play defense has a dynamic defensive back in Samad Wagstaff. The 5-foot-8-inch freshman has five interceptions of the Bulldogs' 12 interceptions this season, leading the team.

The Minutemen will certainly have their chances, especially on special teams.

Bulldog's punter Brian Donnelly has had three blocked punts and only averages 37.4 yards per punt.

Coen could also have a big day. The Bulldogs have allowed almost 1,700 yards in passing thus far this season, almost 600 more than they have gained through the air. With strong play by the UMass offensive linemen, UMass' running back Tony Nelson could also have a solid day on the ground.

opponents in the backfield. Smith leads a Bryant defense that has recorded 46 tackles for losses with 7.5 tackles for a loss. Six other players have at least three tackles behind the line of scrimmage.

"They are trying to penetrate and get after people and setting the line of scrimmage," Brown said.

The Bulldogs' strong blitzes will face their toughest match so far this season when they meet the No. 17 Minutemen's (4-3, 2-2 Colonial Athletic Association) offensive line. The line, led by senior captain Sean Calicchio, has allowed six sacks through UMass' seven games this year. Those six sacks are the fewest in the CAA and UMass is the only team to allow fewer than a sack per game in the conference.

The other advantage that the Minutemen may have is their ability for the big play. With Bryant sending extra defenders at the quarterback, UMass quarterback Liam Coen will have to quickly get the ball to his two leading receivers Victor Cruz and Jeremy Horne.

Just as they have all year, Coen and his wideouts should fare well moving deep. Through seven games Coen has completed 28 passes of 20 yards or longer, 21 of which have gone to Cruz or Horne.

But when Coen feels the pressure from Bryant's blitzes, he cannot rush his throws because the Bulldogs have a strong secondary as well. Bryant has 12 interceptions on the year, led by freshman Samad Wagstaff who has five of them. Three other players have two, including Polomski.

As well as intercepting 12 passes, the Bulldogs have deflected another 33.

Bryant's aggressiveness against the UMass run game may prove to be beneficial for the Maroon and White as well. Coen and his wideouts are not the only offensive threat that the Minutemen have to break a big play.

Tony Nelson, the CAA's leading rusher, broke a 64-yard run in the first game of the year against Albany and broke multiple long runs against Northeastern two weeks ago, in the contest with the Huskies. Nelson ran for a career high 175 yards, his fifth career 100 yard game. UMass is 4-1 when Nelson runs for over 100 yards.

While the Bulldogs strength may be getting after its opposition quickly, they may just be feeding into the hands of the Minutemen who should be able to counter their blitzes well.

The UMass offense will face a heavy blitzing defense this weekend when Bryant comes to McGuirk Stadium. The Minutemen will utilize their big-play abilities to counter the Bulldog's blitzing schemes.

UConn hit with injuries at quarterback, starter unknown for Cincinnati game

BY JUSTIN VERRIER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

STORRS, Conn. — The decision regarding which UConn quarterback will start under center this Saturday is still a bit "fuzzy."

Although UConn coach Randy Edsall said redshirt sophomore Zach Frazer suffered a "head injury" in the Huskies' 12-10 loss to Rutgers in New Jersey, his status for Saturday's matchup with Cincinnati at Rentschler Field remains up in the air.

If Frazer is unable to go, redshirt freshman Cody Endres will likely get the start, with walk-on true freshman Johnny McEntee as the primary backup.

"The way that we classify his injury is a head injury," Edsall said. "He's gotten better each day and what we'll do is evaluate him again this afternoon. [Team doctors] will tell me what he can do today, and then we won't probably have any comment on him at all until Thursday."

Although Edsall and other players wouldn't specify the type of head injury afflicting Frazer, redshirt freshman wide receiver Kashif Moore said he heard from his coaches it is in fact a concussion.

"I was watching film after the game and saw the play that it happened," Moore said. "I think we were in the red zone [in the fourth quarter] and he tried to throw the ball. I think one of the linebackers blitzed and kind of put his helmet into his face, and I just saw his head turn back. My coach told me that was the play that he had gotten a concussion."

Frazer suffered a concussion during training camp this season that kept him out of action for several weeks. "We have confidence in all of them so it doesn't matter who's out there," said Donald Brown. "We just have to go out there and play."

Edsall said that he would not consider putting D.J. Hernandez, a former signal-caller converted to wide receiver, at quarterback.

A former two-star recruit from Washington, Pa., Endres has yet to take a snap in his one-year-plus in Storrs but was at times listed second on the depth chart behind Tyler Lorenzen. Both Endres and Frazer were often both listed at the two-spot and whoever had the better week of practice was given the primary backup role.

Endres saw his only live action against Hofstra, where he completed 4 of 5 passes for 49 yards.

In the Blue-White game April 19, Endres finished a combined 14-for-26 for 94 yards and two interceptions while playing for both teams.

"He's been working every day," Edsall said of Endres. "Zach was in there and he knows he's one play away from going in there; you've got to be prepared. And again, he's done well. He's a guy who can throw the ball well. The thing with him is he doesn't have a whole lot of experience."

EDSALL CLEARS THE AIR

Edsall clarified that there isn't a "conspiracy" regarding the unavailability of Frazer and all other quarterbacks to the media.

At the onset of his interview Tuesday, Edsall said Frazer has a class and the time conflict doesn't allow him to attend the weekly press conference.

"His first obligation here to the University of Connecticut is being a student, first and foremost," Edsall said.

Frazer was also not available before his first start against North Carolina.

UMass men's soccer coach, Sam Koch, and the Minutemen will return home to Rudd Field for the first time in almost a month. UMass will host Richmond Friday and George Washington Sunday.

UMass to face two hot teams

Simmons said. "I think it definitely could be tough for them. We're pretty used to it and we like playing in the cold more than other teams so yeah, it could be an advantage."

While the Spiders do not look formidable on paper while being outscored 31-15 in the 13 games they have played so far, they are coming off a three-game unbeaten streak, tying Xavier (1-1) and Temple (0-0) in-between, notching a win over St. Joseph's (3-2).

The good news for UMass is that Richmond is 0-3-1 on the road this season, while the Minutemen are 10-2-1 playing on Rudd Field, dating back to last season. If the trends continue, the Minutemen may have the edge.

The Spiders are not particularly skilled at creating plays in the open field, but they are strong at creating and finishing set pieces. They also have a goalkeeper who has the ability to kick the ball three quarters the length of the pitch, giving Richmond the ability to create offensive chances seemingly out of nowhere.

"We have to be ready for those punts, that's one little wrinkle that Richmond's brings comparing to other teams," Koch said. "I don't think we have to worry too much, but we have to be prepared for that."

Sunday's game against the Colonials should pose a much tougher challenge for the Minutemen. George Washington has far more offensive firepower compared to Richmond, scoring 19 goals this season, and is riding a hot streak defeating Temple, 5-2, and shutting out St. Joe's, 5-0, in its last two games.

Offense showing signs, must keep up scoring

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The pressure is off. Sort of.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team ended a four-game scoreless streak last Friday in its 4-1 win at St. Bonaventure, but two days later, the Minutemen went scoreless again in their 0-0 tie at Duquesne.

This weekend the Minutemen are looking for more A-10 wins as they challenge Richmond and George Washington.

Wins come with goals, and after last Friday's performance the Minutemen know they can score. They broke their streak and junior Mark DeSantis got on the board for the first time this season – putting less pressure on him and the team to finally get that goal. But that doesn't mean UMass can't revert back to its scoreless ways.

"I think we are feeling better about our ability to score," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "Does it take some of the pressure off? Yeah it takes some of the pressure off, but that's last week, this is this week, we've got to get results this week. Whether we win 1-0 or 3-0, as long as we get the result, that's the important thing."

DeSantis was last year's second-leading scorer, behind junior Bryan Hogan who has yet to tally a point this season. Coming into this season, DeSantis has faced pressure to be an offensive threat for the team, and not until Friday did he alleviate some of the pressure.

DeSantis started his sophomore campaign similar to this season. On Oct. 12, 2007, DeSantis scored his first two goals of the season – and his career – in UMass' 3-0 win against Dayton. He later tallied two more goals, including the game winner, against St. Louis (Oct. 19, 2007) and the other at Saint Joseph's (Nov. 9, 2007).

"[Scoring last Friday took the pressure off], that's for everyone so hopefully they keep coming now. I'm happy I got my first one off my chest. Hopefully the pressure is off," DeSantis said. "[Against St. Bonaventure] we just never let up, we just attacked. Every time we got the ball we looked forward. We just had that mentality all game and it worked out."

This weekend, UMass will have to be aggressive on attack. Richmond plays a low-pressure defense, meaning it sits back in its own end and has more players behind the ball. GW tends to attack more defensively and is a bigger and stronger team than the Spiders.

"We're going to have our hands full in both games," Koch said. "We're not an attacking power so we're going to have to finish our chances."

"[To have the same success as last Friday we need to] play the way we've been playing. We have been playing well the last couple of weeks; we haven't gotten all the wins, but we've been playing really well. Just keep attacking, scoring some goals and we'll get the W's, they'll start coming soon," DeSantis said.

Saint Louis falls to Dayton, second conference loss of year

49ers led by freshman James, GW now tied for second in A-10 Soccer

BY JEFFREY ENGMANN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

No. 18 Saint Louis suffered its first home loss of the season falling to Atlantic 10 foe Dayton, 1-0, on Oct. 19.

The loss to Dayton (9-2-2, 3-0-1 A-10) marks the first time that SLU has lost more than one conference game since joining the league in 2004.

In a low scoring affair, the surprising result was in large part due to its inability to convert on its scoring chances. Although the Billikens (6-2-5, 2-2 A-10) controlled possession for most of the match, it was the Flyers who made the most of their opportunities.

In the 16th minute, freshman Jack Pearson scored a header on the team's first shot on goal to give his team the early 1-0 advantage. The goal was his fourth of the season. Despite the Billikens multiple chances in the second half (eight shots on goal), they couldn't capitalize on those opportunities.

Another freshman that was key to the victory was Flyers' goalkeeper Tyler Picard. He had three important saves to help his team win their third A-10 game and remain undefeated in conference play. The win propelled the Flyers to sole possession of first place, while SLU fell to seventh in the conference.

There is no rest for the Billikens, however because they have an important A-10 showdown with Charlotte on the road on Oct. 25.

49ERS REACH 10 WINS

Charlotte climbed back on the right track last week as freshman Evan James scored a goal in the 85th minute to lead the team to a 2-1 victory over Xavier on Oct. 19. The goal came off a misfired kick and marks the second time that the forward has scored a game-winning goal this season.

Xavier, winless in four conference games, put up a strong fight on No. 23 Charlotte's (10-3-1, 3-1-1 A-10) home field. The 49ers were in need of a victory after going winless in their past two games. The team suffered a heartbreaking 3-2 loss against La Salle (2-8-3, 1-2 A-10) last week. Senior forward Daniel Heavey broke the 2-2 tie in the 87th minute, cutting through the defense to scofe his second goal of the season.

Charlotte also played its way to a double-overtime 0-0 tie against division leader Dayton on Oct. 17.

Its win against Xavier (1-9-1, 0-2-2 A-10) marks the first time that the 49ers have had double digits wins in back-to-back seasons for the last 10 years. With approximately three weeks before the A-10 tournament the 49ers still sit in a three-way tie for second place with seven points in the conference.

COLONIALS TIED FOR SECOND

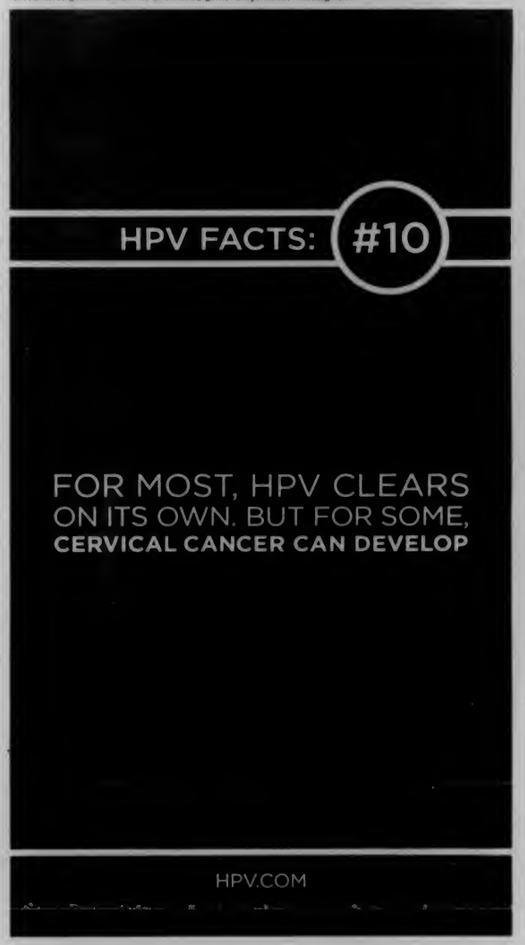
George Washington had a strong offensive showing this week, as it went undefeated in their two conference matches this week.



With its home crowd behind them, the Colonials (6-4-2, 2-1-1 A-10) defeated Temple, 5-2, on Oct. 17. The Owls (6-4-3, 2-1-1 A-10) entered the game undefeated in A-10 play and had not lost to the Colonials since 2004. Led by stand-out junior forward Andy Stadler, GW seized control of the game right from the start.

Stadler netted his A-10 leading 11th and 12th goals of the season in the first 16 minutes, as the Colonials surged out to an early 3-0 lead. Temple closed the deficit, when J.T. Noone scored his second goal of the game on a penalty kick to make it 4-2. Stadler was named co-A-10 player of the week for the second time this season.

The Colonials, despite playing without Stadler and starter Byron Walker, defeated Saint Josephs, 5-0, on Oct. 19. Redshirt senior Matt Scheer and redshirt Sophomore Scott Goosens teamed up in goal to record the team's forth shutout this season. The win puts GW in a three-way tie for second place in the conference.

UMass gelling at right time

Offensively, the Wildcats haven't done anything particularly impressive. In their first three games, UNH has scored eight goals while allowing two.

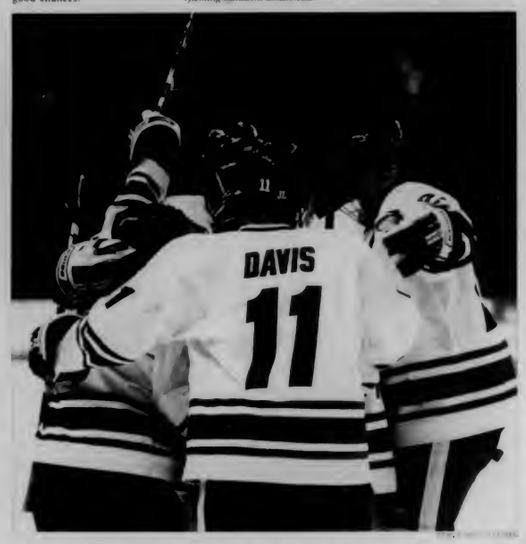
The Minutemen are as close as they can get in mirroring on special teams. UMass is 3-for-14 on the power play (.214) and opponents are only 2-for-11 (.182).

Cahoon realizes that when it comes to special teams, it all depends on which team has better success executing the plays with the man advantage.

"It's about execution," Cahoon said. It's about putting passes on sticks, if we're really thinking clearly and not becoming paralyzed by our own inhibitions then I think we'll have good chances."

Minutemen goaltender Dan Meyers has put up impressive numbers as well. Meyers has currently registered two wins, 78 saves and a .940 GAA in three games this season.

In UMass' last game, against Rensselaer, the Minutemen won 6-0, making few mistakes.



The Minutemen had 12 different players register points including a two-goal performance from Chris Davis. The win was also a game of firsts for a few of the other Minutemen. Doug Kublin, Danny Hobbs and Casey Wellman all scored their first collegiate goals.

UMass is charging into New Hampshire at the right time; it's playing well as a cohesive unit and its players are getting healthy at the right time.

The Minutemen will head to New Hampshire Friday to take on the No. 4 Wildcats. UMass seeks revenge as New Hampshire ended the Minutemen's conference title hopes last season with a two-game sweep at UNH in the Hockey East playoffs.

Senior Chris Davis has scored two goals on eight shots through the Minutemen's first three games. The forward has also recorded the most penalties (3) and penalty minutes (17) on the team.

Davis plays enforcer on hard-hitting UM

each other, but there was a clear disconnect on the ice. Passes, which once led to odd-man rushes or fast offense, sailed over, under and past sticks. Loose pucks went the other way and quickly tilted the scoreboard in favor of UMass' opponents.

If Davis's and Berry's hits meant anything positive for UMass, they made it clear to their opponent and those in the future that the Minutemen are unified again. The role of enforcer has always been invaluable for Cahoon's UMass teams given the general lack of size on his four lines. Maybe it's ironic that the 5-foot-9 Davis plays the role when he has to. But tenacity is as common among UMass forwards as a lack of size.

Beyond that, and within Hockey East, UMass is not the most talented team vying for a conference championship. Having players who act as both physical and offensive presences makes the UMass offense a more well-rounded unit.

It's nothing new for Berry and Davis to throw their weight around when need be, but to see them do it in defense of another teammate proves the Minutemen are back in the mindset that warranted a No. 5 national ranking and a series of impressive victories last December.

The readdition of John Wessbecker and Chase Langeraap, who played Tuesday night for the first time this season and posted plus-3 ratings, won't hurt the cause either. Both players measure north of 6-feet and don't hesitate to defend themselves or their teammates. In the second period against RPI, junior goaltender Dan Meyers froze the puck as an RPI player sailed toward the crease. The whistle blew and the player didn't stop, Wessbecker promptly dropped the player before he collided with Meyers.

Call it motivation to finish their collegiate careers with something to show for it, through the season's first three games, the UMass seniors look determined to pick up some hardware come season's end.

A national championship is attainable but probably a little too lofty a goal at the moment. The program's first conference title, however, remains in grasp. The first step comes this Friday in Durham, N.H., against New Hampshire. The same place that last season's hope of a conference title ended when the Wildcats embarrassed the Minutemen in a two-game sweep.

Through three games in 2008, there's something different about the Minutemen. It's a shame that it's most noticeable manifestation of this could potentially end an opponent's season. Appert mentioned after the game that Bergin may not play again in 2008-09 — but the hit on Watson wasn't far from doing the same.

Since his tenure with the Minutemen began in 2000, physicality hasn't been the hallmark of Cahoon's team, and it won't be this season. Team chemistry and unity are normally among their biggest strengths. In the second half of 2007-08, those principles disappeared completely. It's only been three games and the team still has its issues — injuries, some inexperience — but the mindset that defeated UNH, Notre Dame and Colorado College in consecutive games is back.

And so are the Minutemen.

Maroon and White must continue strong special teams

Mass Attack to utilize sharp power plays and penalty kills

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Special teams is key when it comes to winning a game, especially when the Massachusetts hockey team has spent 69 out of 180 minutes this season on special teams — totaling over one entire game of hockey.

In Friday's game against No. 4 New Hampshire, the Minutemen will have to play a strong penalty kill and power play against arguably one of the best teams in the nation.

"[The Wildcat's] power play always is a good element. Their special teams in general; their man down has been one of the nation's best in the last several years. They are a real good special teams program," UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

New Hampshire has scored on three of its 26 power-play opportunities, but the Wildcat's penalty kill is nearly perfect, not allowing a goal in 25 of their 26 penalties.

Overall, the Minutemen (2-1-0) have had 14 power-play opportunities, scoring three of their 10 goals on the power play. While being short handed, the UMass' penalty kill has allowed two goals on its opponents 11 chances.

"We're where we expect to be at this time [with special teams]. Some power plays look like we're in sync in a big way, other power plays look like there is a lack of rhythm," Cahoon said. "I think we've got the personnel right now where we want it to be, but it's a work in progress as it is with most teams."

The strength of the Minutemen's penalty kill is important. UMass averages 12.3 minutes in the box per game, or 4.3 penalties per game — totaling 37 minutes on 12 penalties in its three games played. It has played 32 minutes on the power play, as their opponents average 5.3 penalties (10.7 minutes in the box) per game.

Tuesday night in the Minutemen's 6-0 win against Rensselaer, UMass' penalty kill allowed one shot in the six minutes they spent short-handed, making the job of junior goaltender Dan Meyers significantly easier.

"Our penalty kill has been pretty solid, the most important penalty killer is always the goaltender, so if Danny is up to the task and plays with the same confidence he's been playing with of late, I'd like to think our penalty kill will be strong," Cahoon said.

The Minutemen didn't allow a single shot against them while on the power play and while being a man up against Rensselaer. UMass scored one power-play goal on five shots in the four penalties whistled on RPI.

Against the Engineers, younger players got more time on special teams, including freshman Casey Wellman, sophomore Michael Lecomte and freshman Danny Hobbs. UMass also saw the return of senior John Wessbecker, who was one of the defensive anchors on the penalty kill last year, and sophomore forward Chase Langeraap. Both returnees saw ice time on special teams.

"[We're] trying to get as many people involved, as many people trained because we have go to people, more experienced people, that we use in the most critical situations," Cahoon said after Tuesday's game. "But sometimes the game brakes where you've got fatigued players and you want to get fresh players [on the ice] so you rely on the younger kids who haven't learned enough to go out there and do the job."

Typically playing the first power-play unit are James Marcou, Cory Quirk, Chris Davis with Alex Berry and Justin Braun at the blue line. The second unit rotates, but Wellman, Lecomte, Hobbs and Langeraap have all seen ice time. The penalty kill tends to be Davis and Brett Wattson or Quirk and Berry with defenders Wessbecker, Braun and Martin Nolet — rotating through.

Melissa Turtinen can be reached at mturtinen@dailycollegian.com

Goaltender Dan Meyer's had an easy night in net against Rensselaer because of UMass' great special teams. The Minutemen allowed just one shot on net on Tuesday against Rensselaer when they were playing a man down.

No. 17 UMass hosts Bryant

Bulldogs in a transitional year

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The No. 17 Massachusetts football team will welcome Bryant College into McGuirk Alumni Stadium Saturday with hopes to rebound and even save its postseason aspirations after losing to No. 9 Richmond.

The Bulldogs beat Robert Morris 20-7 in their previous game, with solid defense led by Pat Gauthier, who forced three sacks.

The Bulldogs (4-3) have lately earned the reputation of a "big play" team. They like to blitz on almost every play, which causes them to register at least a few sacks per game. In their win against Robert Morris, Bryant tallied eight sacks. Of course, blitzing leads to larger areas for UMass (4-3, 2-2 CAA) quarterback Liam Coen to throw to.

Saturday will be the first ever meeting between the two teams as this is the Bulldog's first season playing Division I football. Bryant is currently playing a schedule as if they were part of the Northeast Conference schedule and will officially become members of the conference in 2012.

Like many of the teams the Minutemen have played in the past, the Bulldogs have an overwhelming tendency to run the ball many more times than they pass. So far this season, the Bulldogs have run the ball 311 times compared to

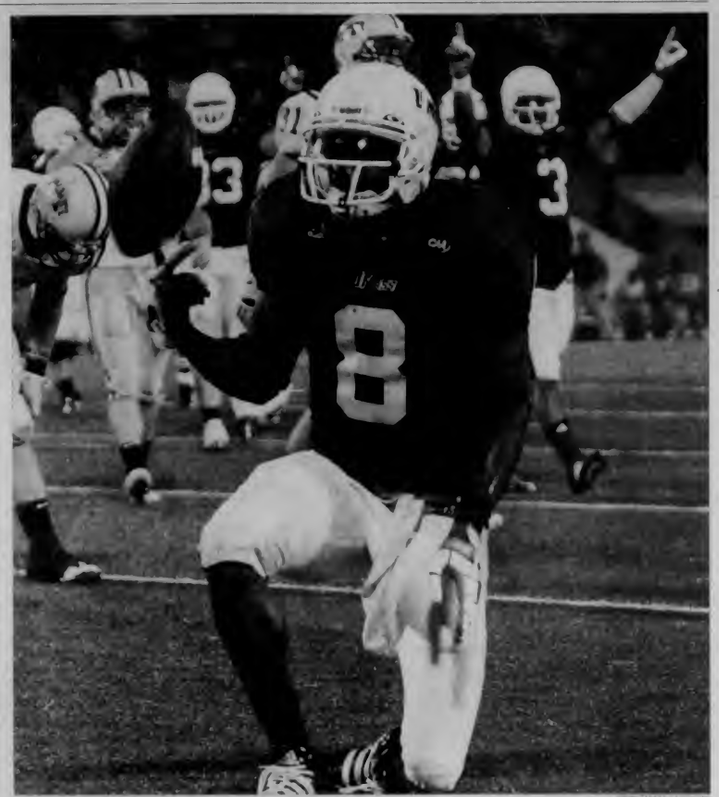
Don't let the fact that Bryant played in Division II last year fool you, because the No. 17 Massachusetts football team won't be fooled.

Despite being in a transition year as its program moves from Division II to Division I-AA, the Bulldogs and their defense are not something that should be overlooked.

"They are very aggressive on defense," UMass coach Don Brown said. "They are gonna blitz from the time they get off the bus until the time they go home."

Even that may be an understatement for Bryant (4-3).



The Bulldogs come into Amherst averaging just over three sacks per game. Of the 22 sacks Bryant has recorded this season, 12 players have been credited with at least one full sack and four of them have more than two.

Defensive linemen Don Smith leads the team with five sacks and is followed by linebackers Paul Polomski and Pat Gauthier who each have three. Bryant's blitzing success does not end at getting to the quarterback.

"They'll not only blitz the pass game, they'll blitz the run game," Brown said. "I would even say their ability to blitz the run game is impacting them in a positive way more than in the pass game."

The pressure is evident with the number of times that the Bulldogs have gotten to their

UMass wideout Jeremy Horne leads the Minutemen's wide receiving corps with four touchdown catches on the season. The redshirt junior also ranks second on the team with 30 catches for 451 yards in seven games.

Mass Attack showing unity

Rensselaer coach Seth Appert didn't call Alex Berry and Chris Davis dirty players following their hits on RPI players in the third period of the Massachusetts hockey team's 6-0 win Tuesday night in Troy, N.Y.

He didn't exactly compliment the wingers, though. In retaliation to an open-ice check on junior captain Brett Watson, Davis lined up RPI center Garett Vassel behind the UMass goal. Out of context, the hit seemed unsportsmanlike and Davis deserved the game misconduct he received. The Minutemen led 5-0 at that point and added a sixth after an RPI bench major called on Appert for arguing with officials about a lack of punishment for Berry after he leveled freshman Mike Bergin.

Joe Meloni

"I'm upset about [Berry's hit]," Appert said. "That's a play where if it's not college hockey, it's on there ... it's a brawl. It was dirty and it was unnecessary."

The hits proved something, though. UMass coach Don Cahoon cited a series of potential causes for his team's collapse last season – unity was one of them. There was no dislike or distrust in the locker room; things were just a little too divided. After the start that saw UMass atop both the national rankings and the Hockey East standings, winter break struck and iced UMass from then on.

The players never mentioned any resentment toward

Senior forward Chris Davis was given a misconduct penalty late in Tuesday night's game for a hard hit he delivered to a Rensselaer player.

Off to UNH

Minutemen match up against undefeated No. 4 Wildcats

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Riding its two-game winning streak and a hot goaltender, the Massachusetts hockey team travels to Durham, N.H., on Friday to face off against No. 4 New Hampshire.

The annual Hockey East powerhouse has won three-straight games, which includes victories over former No. 14 Wisconsin, Rensselaer and most recently No. 6 Boston University.

The Wildcats (3-0, 1-0 HEA) came out on top in a highly contested game against the Terriers, 2-1, on Sunday. UNH goaltender Brian Foster was the star of the game stopping 31 BU shots, 17 in the second period alone. Because of the junior's performance he was named Hockey East Defensive Player of the week.

Foster has started all three of the Wildcats games posting an amazing .975 save percentage, 0.67 goals against average and 78 saves. If the Minutemen (2-1) want any chance at winning this game, they're going to need to find a way to get the puck by the Florida Panthers' draft pick.

"It's someone who've we've seen a lot as a staff," UMass coach Don Cahoon said referring to Foster. "Our concern is breaking UNH down so we can get good scoring attempts."

The Wildcats' penalty-killing unit has allowed one power play goal so far this season. New Hampshire opponents are 1-for-26, with a .038 percentage.

A rarity with the UNH is its struggles on the power play. UNH is 3-of-26 on the power play, good for a .115 percentage.

Junior Mark DeSantis, last year's second-leading scorer, scored his first two goals of the season in the Minutemen's 4-1 win over St. Bonaventure last week.

Maroon and White return home for two at Rudd Field

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

At long last, it is back at home.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team will be glad to be back at Rudd Field this weekend as it hosts opponents for the first time in nearly a month. UMass will play Richmond (2-9-2, 1-1-2 Atlantic 10), on Friday, followed by George Washington (6-4-2, 2-1-1 A-10) on Sunday.

"It's definitely good to be back at Rudd," goalkeeper Zack Simmons said. "No more planes, I'm glad for that. I'm tired of taking off my shoes and taking my laptop out of my bag."

The Minutemen (3-6-3, 1-1-1 A-10) have endured a tiring month as they have traveled over 2,000 miles since their last home game on Sept. 28. Over that span, they have been to North Carolina, New York, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island for an east coast tour. This season, UMass has played three home games compared to nine on the road.

However, the Minutemen have started to get into a rhythm with a 4-1 win over St. Bonaventure and a 0-0 tie against Duquesne last week. With two home games coming up against conference foes, UMass has the chance to put itself in a great position to make the A-10 Tournament.

"Obviously there's more at stake [in conference play], so the games are very important," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "[The players] are ready to play, they are focused on what they have to do and focusing on controlling the things they can control."

The Minutemen will have the privilege of facing opponents who have to deal with travel and fatigue. Both George Washington and Richmond have to fly at least 400 miles before they step on the pitch.

The Minutemen's strong depth, combined with the advantage of getting to sleep in their own beds, could give them a competitive edge as they will likely have fresher players on the field.

"I think [conditioning] is certainly a factor that is in our favor. Will it be the deciding factor? I don't know," Koch said. "I don't have a crystal ball so I can't predict the future, but I'm working on it," Koch said.

Another small, but possibly key edge the Maroon and White enjoy is its familiarity with the cold weather. Richmond and George Washington are both southern schools, and when a team gets used to playing soccer on a sunny, 73 degree day, playing in the chilly New England fall should prove an unusual experience.

"The weather could be an issue, I don't even like playing in this weather and I'm used to it,"

Budget cuts slam University

Public colleges take major hit in cutbacks

BY JOSH WALKITCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The recent financial collapse of the United States economy has come to bear on the commonwealth's public colleges with more than $45 million in reduced funding.

The University of Massachusetts received one of the hardest hits with a forced budget cut of $11 million, Amherst's share of a five percent cut to all public colleges and universities. The total cut to the Five Colleges is over $24 million.

The UMass system has announced it doesn't plan to increase student fees mid-way through the academic year or reduce financial aid. In order to make up for the loss of funding, workforce reductions and reduced funding for some academic departments are expected.

"The other public universities in other states are also enduring this difficult process and many other essential services are seeing

BY KATE OLSEN

Administrators at the University of Massachusetts held their breath as Gov. Deval Patrick announced his plans for state budget cuts. But when University officials exhaled – there was no sigh of relief.

Totaling about $11 million in cuts for the UMass Amherst campus and $24.6 million for the UMass system, these cuts are newly appointed Chancellor Robert Holub's first and largest challenge in leading the flagship campus.

"Certainly when I accepted the position in May, I had no inkling that this was going to occur," said Holub in an interview last week. "No one wants to preside over this kind of a budget situation. Certainly, what I have to do is look out for the institution as a whole – no matter what the situation would be."

Holub, in a campus-wide e-mail to students and faculty, explained

The Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP) announced their own plan last week to deal with the current economic crisis in conflict with that of the University of Massachusetts Chancellor Robert Holub.

Holub's plan was released to the campus community via e-mail on Oct. 15, the same day Governor Deval Patrick ordered cuts to help close the commonwealth's projected $1.4 billion budget gap. The cuts include an $11 million reduction for UMass, with many possible cuts pending.

As a result, the chancellor has proposed an [illegible] [illegible] including [illegible] academic units, [illegible] [illegible] and not filling spots left by departed or retired faculty. # Current issues debated by political RSOs

By Lisa DeBenedictis
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts' Daily Collegian sponsored a political debate last night between the UMass Democrats and the UMass Republican Club.

Moderating the event was Daily Collegian News Editor William McGuinness, who asked a series of questions relating to the presidential candidates' views on the economy, the war in Iraq, immigration, energy and the merits of each candidate as a whole.

Speaking on behalf of the the Republican Club was President Greg Collins and Vice President Brad DeFlumeri. The UMass Democrats were represented by President Emma Einhorn and Vice President Matt Cadwallader.

The event took place in the Cape Cod Lounge of the Student Union at 7 p.m., and lasted nearly two hours.

Both student organizations said they were pleased with the event, and stressed the importance of student interaction with each other about the issues surrounding the election.

"I think it went well," said Cadwallader. "My only problem with it was that we didn't get as in depth with the issues as I would have liked, but the debate format isn't the best way to really get in depth with these issues."

"I think it was a success," agreed DeFlumeri. "I

there was no other option but to acquiesce to mid-year cuts, and announced his intentions for one-time reductions to campus units and a hiring freeze.

Any faculty hires must be looked at "strategically," according to Holub and "reviewed and approved by the executive senior officer in each area and by the Chancellor," said the e-mail sent on Oct. 15.

No mid-year fee increases or reductions to financial aid will be applied during this fiscal year, but after a close review of the budget by the Board of Trustees come spring – that could change.

"We're taking a lot of these cuts as one time assessments and we'll have to take the budget cuts and look very closely at every aspect," said Holub. "I think it's always better to do that on a longer-range plan."

Instead of neglecting to address future budget plans and discuss how it operates, Holub is working to keep the community informed.

This includes campus-wide e-mails and a Web site, which went live yesterday afternoon, linked directly to the Chancellor's page, dedicated to an explanation of how the UMass budget operates.

This "budget primer" is intended to educate those inexperienced students or community members on how it all works.

"We as a community are faced with making hard, financial choices that none of us wished to encounter," said Holub in an e-mail to the Daily Collegian. "I want to encourage input from the campus community regarding the budget, and I am determined to listen carefully to the campus community in establishing priorities in these difficult times. Together, we must devise the best possible solutions to this situation."

In terms of the campus community, Holub said in yesterday's e-mail to the campus, that he hopes to coordinate with the faculty senate. He has appointed its secretary, professor Ernie May, to organize a Budget Planning Task Force of 8 to 10 faculty members.

He also cited the importance of input from student groups in decisions concerning what kind of cuts the University should be making.

Provost and senior Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs Charlena Seymour also released a statement on the Chancellor's Web site. She explained her role in the budget and how she will go about appropriating and cutting funds when the time comes.

"When I receive the target for Academic Affairs I will establish targets for each school and college, taking into account the information provided by the Deans," she said in the statement. "At that point I will work with each Dean to explore all possible options for meeting the budget reduction target within the college and from that discussion I will be able to recommend to the Chancellor faculty searches that should be exempted form the current campus-wide halt to hiring."

Holub, engaged in a flurry of travel and visits to campus organizations over the past week, was on his way to the UMass Cranberry Station in Wareham while he explained the background of the UMass budget.

"Some people get the mistaken notion that we have this big pot of money that we can spend any way we want," he said. "People are going to be looking at our budget now very carefully and I want them to understand what it is that they're looking at rather than jumping to conclusions."

The Chancellor separated the budget into two categories: operating and capital funds.

Operating funds partially consist of tuition and fees paid by students, deposited into an interest-bearing account within the operating budget. This money, although it accrues interest (recent years have gathered around $9 million) is calculated by the budget committee and "folded into the revenue," according to Holub.

"At a large university such as UMass-Amherst, the campus benefits by generating considerable interest on its cash flow," said Holub in an e-mail to the Collegian.

"But this money is also not free to be used for any expense. It is part of our calculation of revenues right from the start."

The state funds, which supplement tuition and fees, pay salaries for faculty, staff, teaching assistants and fuel costs among others, are those being cut by the state.

According to the Governor's Web site, UMass was appropriated $117,800 in operating expenses for fiscal year 2009 but those are being cut by $7,000 in the "9C" cuts.

Wages and salaries also suffer, where the state appropriated $485.5 million but that amount was cut back by $24.3 million. Employee benefits are being cut by $262,000.

Capital funds, on the other hand, are one-time use only. They are either saved in a special account, called plant funds, or appropriated by the state for specific, campus projects – like new building construction.

These are funds that cannot be appropriated to just anywhere.

"Capital money is given to a specific project and can't be switched," Holub said. "We can't just take that money and use it to pay somebody's salary, and when we're right in the middle of [construction] we can't just stop building the building, there are people working there and we're under contract. … If we tried to [use capital funds for operating purposes], people would be very upset with us. We would run the risk of getting sued or worse – for instance, not getting any more funds in the future."

According to Holub, the campus averages over $11 million a year in smaller projects crucial for safety issues, like emergency repairs to roads, leaking roofs or heating systems.

These are under the category of capital projects, and operating budget money can be transferred over to pay for those expenses.

"For example, during recent years we have borrowed money to do many construction projects," Holub said in the budget primer. "We have to pay a debt service on those projects which is an expense that recurs for many years, but at some point will disappear from our expenses."

However, that money cannot be turned into a paycheck for faculty.

"Money transferred from operating to capital therefore most often involves sums that cannot be simply used for other operating expenses, such as hiring faculty members," reads the primer. "We cannot renege on our debt payments for projects under way or recently completed. Nor can we endanger our campus employees and students by not having a fund to support emergency repairs, especially involving health and safety issues."

Gov. Patrick announced the $2 billion in capital funds for the UMass system last spring, which the Amherst campus was to receive $1 billion of over the next 10 years.

But Holub said that he hasn't seen that chunk of change.

"Who knows when we're going to get that money," said Holub.

Despite budget woes, the Chancellor remained optimistic about the University's future.

"First of all, this is a situation that is not unique and I don't think that other campuses are immune [to it]," he said. "I also don't think we're at a competitive disadvantage. … We're a better institution than any of the other public, New England research institutions … We're not cutting back when others are adding, we're just putting things on hold."

In addition, the Chancellor attempted to reassure the campus community with an e-mail sent yesterday afternoon and cited the need for continued commitment.

"I take great comfort in your loyalty and dedication to UMass Amherst," Holub wrote. "You have pledged to join in our efforts to build an even better University, and now, more than ever, we need your commitment. … We can, and we must, meet the challenges that face us and focus on our goal of leaving this fine institution better than it is today. We have the potential, and even the obligation, to aim higher."

thought it was important for the Collegian to host an event that allows students to see the issues from both the left and the right sides."

Representatives from each group expressed a desire for students to get involved in the upcoming election, and to educate themselves on the candidates' policies in order to make the decision for themselves.

"We are getting close to the election," said Cadwallader, "and so students need to really, really get educated about the candidates, and if one of them inspires you, get involved…civic involvement is at the core of our democracy."

greater cuts than we are," said UMass President Jack Wilson. "Many private universities in this region have also announced freezes and budget cuts. The pain of this economic decline is widespread."

Critics of UMass' proposal have suggested using money from existing reserves as an alternative to cutting funds from academic departments and freezing hiring of faculty. However, most reserves are legally restricted to the purposes for which they are given, making them legally untouchable for other usage. Reserves not legally bound to their purposes are being considered for reallocation.

"I've seen some press reports that there's some secret trove of $200 million in unrestricted reserves we could use," said President Wilson. "That is preposterous."

This Wednesday, Chancellor Michael F. Collins of UMass Medical addressed the school in a press release proposing to "re-evaluate discretionary spending, review previously planned contract services, and reassess open or new positions to make sure the business case has been made before we do additional hiring."

"I'd like to emphasize that our medical school is in a solid position compared to many institutions, in large part because of the achievement and hard work of our faculty and staff," said Collins. "So, we shouldn't worry unduly, but instead make sure that we're acting in a thoughtful and businesslike fashion as we continue on our ambitious course."

UMass Lowell was forced to cut approximately $4 million from the state appropriation as a result of the Executive Title 9C spending cut announced last week.

Lowell Chancellor Marty Meehan announced workforce reductions, including layoffs, the suspension of hiring for non-strategic positions, and the elimination of overtime costs.

"We're going to be forced to cut state funding to programs that do not support our core mission, including many established K-12 partnerships that provide important training and education to teachers and students throughout our region," Meehan said in a statement made last week.

"These cuts are unfortunate; they are drastic and they are going to hurt the people we serve," he said.

UMass Dartmouth Chancellor Jean MacCormack addressed state budget cuts publicizing consideration to enforce a hiring freeze with some potential layoffs, a targeted reduction in non-personnel operating budgets, a delay of some planned new activities, an accelerated energy savings plan, and a selected use of limited cash reserves.

"Because we're already several months into the fiscal year, our options are limited right now," MacCormack said. "Going forward, everything must be on the table to insure that we can continue to offer a quality education at an affordable price."

Question One to eliminate the state income tax in Massachusetts has some school administrators worried that future budget cuts could be on the way. The loss of income from taxes would impact public education funding.

UMass has successfully recovered from budget cuts in the past, however. Six years ago the University experienced a cut of $28.5 million in the emergency state budget.

"In 2002-2003, we faced terrible budget cuts that were much larger than the ones we face at present. It was very difficult, but everyone pulled together and protected the students," said Wilson. "In spite of the cuts, we gave students a great education and managed to win four of the nation's major federally-funded research projects, the first four in our history."

Wilson addressed the student body in a statement earlier this week.

"To the students of the University, I would say that the chancellor, the president, the faculty and the staff will all work very hard to minimize the disruption to the University and to protect the student experience and education at the University of Massachusetts," the statement said.

Wilson also said he was disappointed the state cut the budget for UMass, and that he would continue to work on increasing funding for the university, as well as financial aid.

Other Massachusetts colleges enduring large budget cuts are Bridgewater State College and Salem State College, with $2 million in cuts each. Additionally, Framingham State College, Fitchburg State College, Westfield State College and Worcester State College all have forced budget cuts around $1 million.

The governor's office and UMass Boston were also contacted but were unavailable for comment.

librarians at UMass Amherst, said it realizes money is tight, its members feel that Holub should utilize existing reserves from UMass' capital fund.

According to the group's proposal, about $40 million is removed from the campus' operating budget each year and put into a capital fund for future building projects, but these funds have not been spent. The group also says an increasing amount of the operating budget has been moved to the capital plan, which has grown to about $200 billion.

Members say because the state legislature passed a $2 billion capital bond in July, the campus should freeze contributions to the building fund and use the money to cover the immediate crisis.

The MSP also said the interest from money for the New Dirt construction projects has increased to more than $9 million, which could cover three-fourths of the amount needed this year.

"What we're saying is that we are in a bad situation. We recognize that, but we have to have a transparent process to look at all areas where we might make these required budget cuts," said Max Page, president of the MSP and professor of architecture at UMass.

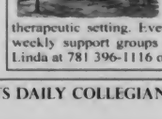
He also suggests looking at other expenses, such as the $20 million he said the Amherst campus sends every year to UMass President Jack Wilson's Boston office.

"That's a very big chunk of change and we're wondering whether that should be cut," said Page, adding that Holub's plan would disregard the "Amherst 250 Plan," which was started in 2005 to increase the size of the tenure system faculty by 250 over five years.

Page said the MSP's recent proposal is just an alternative he feels should be considered before carrying out Holub's plan.

The MSP, which plans to release new proposals every week, also calls for the administration to be more transparent when dealing with these issues.

"[Holub] sent us all an e-mail saying, 'This is what's happening.' That's not the way to work on an open, transparent campus," said Page, who has been at UMass since 2001.



"There's no doubt that these cuts will be difficult and painful," said a statement from Holub, "but we have no choice given the financial crisis facing the Commonwealth and the reductions announced by the governor. State officials are closely monitoring the commonwealth's fiscal situation, and they'll decide if further cost-cutting is needed and whether such reductions will affect public higher education.

"While you can understand people being upset and even pessimistic in light of difficult news, we have to face the challenges before us and not give up on our goal of being one of the best public research universities in the nation," he said.

The MSP is also working with AFSME Local 1776, the University Staff Association, the Professional Staff Union and the Graduate Employee Organization to determine other measures that cut costs without causing layoffs, which hurt students and undermine what they consider to be "the core mission of the University."

Controversial case proves to be a long road for Jason supporters

By Mark Grinstein-Camacho
Collegian Correspondent

Late on the night of Saturday, Feb. 2, two men, John Bowes and Jonathan Bosse, pounded on and broke Jason Vassell's window and yelled racist insults at him. They snuck into the lobby of the MacKimmie residence hall and started a fist fight with him, resulting in a concussion for Vassell.

He defended himself with a knife. The District Attorney, Elizabeth Scheibel, is trying Vassell for attempted murder. She isn't trying Bosse at all, and is only trying Bowes for disorderly conduct. Jason is black, while John and Jonathan are white.

Told this way, it sounds like institutionalized racism, but there are many interpretations of this conflict, coming from all areas of campus.

A committee of dedicated student activists formed almost immediately after the altercation to help protect Vassell's name and to try to convince Scheibel to drop the charges against him. "Justice for Jason" has become a campus buzzword. The Committee for Justice for Jason Vassell (CJJV) gets help from many RSOs, teachers, community leaders and anonymous supporters. They've held rallies, a teach-in, an ongoing letter-writing campaign, demonstrations and tabling. The truth of what happened that Saturday night will come out during the trial, which will probably happen some time this January. But until then, the committee is doing what it can to raise support.

"At all his court appearances, the courtroom has always been filled to capacity," said Arturo Castillion, who's been to all of them.

A member of CJJV, Caitlin Daley, recalls how she and all of the other original members of the committee were taking the Student Bridges course with Vassell. The Student Bridges program is an outreach project to local communities. Half of the course is tutoring middle school and high school students in Holyoke. But most of the members of the committee never got to know Vassell very well. The MacKimmie incident happened the first weekend of the spring semester. All members of the class had to do some kind of semester project. Tracy Kelley, Jason's girlfriend and classmate, asked if she could start a committee to help clear Jason's name for her project. She got the go-ahead.

The first challenge the committee faced was Collegian coverage. The Tuesday after the incident, it was covered in a 162-word news story with the headline "Three injured and one arrested in lobby of MacKimmie." The story refers to Jason Vassell as "the alleged attacker," refers to Bosse and Bowes as "victims," and only tells of the charges brought against Jason.

"The story demonizes Jason," said Daley. "So our first job was to spread the truth."

The main issue the committee faced, and is still facing, is the lack of cooperation on the part of DA, Scheibel. According to her profile on the National District Attorneys Association, Scheibel's main interest is domestic violence.

"I feel that I make a difference in someone's life every single day," Scheibel said on her governmental Web site.

The CJJV was excited to get Scheibel on the phone with Kelley, then the head of CJJV, and according to Daley, Scheibel said she wanted to prosecute all the witnesses – Bowes, Bosse and Vassell – to the full extent of the law. Yet she only pursued prosecution of Jason.

"That was like a slap in the face to us," said Daley. "Right when it happened, [Scheibel] tried to say Jason was 'a danger to society' and couldn't be let out on bail," Daley added.

The CJJV is holding an ongoing letter-writing campaign to Scheibel, and provides her public mailing address at all of its tabling sessions and on its Web site.

The committee is broken into four sub-committees: logistics, fundraising, outreach and media. The outreach committee handles tabling, chalking, dorm-storming and making and distributing flyers. The logistics committee organizes events, such as the "Jam for Justice" that happened this past Thursday. The media committee, who works closely with the outreach committee, e-mails local journalists and tells them of Jason's court dates and the CJJV events. All four of these sub-committees meet together on Monday evenings from 7 to 9 p.m.

The committee is using several methods to get the word out about Jason and DA Scheibel on campus and the local community. They raise money to support Jason's legal fees, which are in excess of $20,000.

There's an email list and a Facebook.com group, both of which have existed since February. The group has listed all of Jason's court appearances – both his arraignment and all of his pre-trials – on both of these, which is reportedly effective.

"At all his court appearances, the courtroom has always been filled to capacity," said Arturo Castillion, who's been to all of them.

The committee also holds frequent events to help raise awareness and money, such as vigils and rallies. The next rally is planned for November, and the committee hopes to draw people from Amherst as well as from the University.

At the "Jam for Justice" held on Thursday night, the committee brought in a DJ and a spoken word poetry troupe from New York, who lowered their fees, and raffled off dozens of gift certificates donated by local businesses. The committee has distributed information about these events not only by e-mail and Facebook.com, but also through flyering. The SGA and various other RSOs donate printing costs. In addition to flyering, they've been dorm-storming since Jasmin Torrejon, a resident assistant in Cance hall, told all her residents about the events last year.

The committee also does tabling, although the places and times vary. According to William Syldor, a member of CJJV, most of the tabling last year was in the campus concourse, and this year most of it has been in front of the Student Union, but the committee is trying to spread out the places that it tables in.

"More and more, we're seeing the same faces," Syldor said.

CJJV has also held tabling in front of the Northampton courthouse, in Amherst Center and in front of the Berkshire Dining Common. Tablers have available the e-mail list to sign up for, DA Scheibel's public mailing address, information on upcoming CJJV events, and petitions. CJJV also sells "Justice for Jason" T-shirts for $10 and pins for $1.

How effective have these tactics been?

Daley says they've been "pretty damn effective." Daley thinks "pretty much everyone" she has talked to knows about it.

But Jason's story has probably spread faster than news about the CJJV. Many students at UMass are familiar with Vassell's case to some degree.

Laurel Leake recounted an odd version of the Jason story involving a botched drug deal, but didn't know the CJJV even existed. Jesse Seward recounted a version in which Bowes and Bosse broke through Jason's window and assaulted him in his room. Rebecca Buttnam said she had only a "very weak opinion" of the case, knew only its basic facts, and didn't know what the committee did. Sam Manpha, said at this point it's a "he said, she said" game.

The most recent challenge the CJJV faced was probably the publication of Alana Goodman's editorial column, "A New Look at 'Justice for Jason'," on Sept. 19.

Goodman accused the CJJV of circulating a "fragmented and ... skewed recap of evenis" and not disseminating information on public record about the incident.

"No matter what happened, a hate crime happened," Jasmin Torrejon said. "That's the bigger issue. These men attacked Jason because of his race. I don't see how telling how the number of days spent in the hospital or the number of times they were stabbed changes anything."

Although Goodman does not defend or attack Jason, she does criticize the CJJV itself.

"I remember picking up the paper and my jaw dropping," said Daley. "We all had to drop everything we were working on."

The CJJV held an emergency meeting the following morning, and members helped SGA president Malcolm Chu write a letter of rebuttal.

"Just one article from one crazy, misinformed woman strained our capacity," said Chu. "Imagine dealing with a hundred editorials like that."

For this reason, among others, Chu does not want the case to attract national media attention.

Torrejon, a leader of CJJV, gave a more detailed critique of the editorial. Goodman, she said, cited "the police report" as if it were a single document. In actuality, there are several. The UMass Police Department performed six interviews – of Vassell, Bosse, Bowes and three bystanders who witnessed the event. They all give slightly different versions of the event.

Torrejon said the editorial mainly references the interview with Bosse. These documents are, as Goodman points out, on public record. Goodman travelled to the Hampshire county courthouse in downtown Northampton in order to view them. Torrejon herself has also recently visited the courthouse and read the public reports.

"We weren't aware that they were public [until the publication of Goodman's editorial]," Torrejon said.

But Torrejon doesn't feel that further dissemination of the information in those documents is necessary.

"No matter what happened, a hate crime happened," Torrejon said. "That's the bigger issue. These men attacked Jason because of his race," she said. "One of the witness statements said he showed them the knife and said 'Stay away from me.' He didn't want to hurt them. I don't see how telling how the number of days spent in the hospital or the number of times they were stabbed changes anything."

The CJJV collectively does not want to make the case national news before the trial, per the advice of Jason's lawyers. Chu also cited the privacy issue, saying if the case becomes national, Jason and his family would be subjected to intense scrutiny. He also expressed distaste for what might happen if mass amounts of journalists swarmed to Amherst.

"An injustice to Jason is an injustice to the community," Torrejon said. "We all have to be aware; we all have to do something. This is not just a UMass issue."

(Clockwise) UMass students Harream Purdie, Lindsay McCluskey, and Vanessa Snow socialize at "Jam for Justice." There was a $10 suggested donation for students and a $20 suggested donation for the general public. All proceeds went to Jason's legal defense fund.

Wake up and smell the recession

Rachel Dougherty

It's there when you first wake up in the morning. Hovering in the air as you skim your morning newspaper emanates the acrid smell of freshly brewing economic recession. The economic decline is affecting every level of American society from big banks to public universities.

Yet as the economy moves rapidly into recession, the people with the most reason to worry – economically fragile college students – seem to be worrying the least.

At a time when the government is looking to pour as much as $300 billion into economic stimulus packages and the average American is "having to choose between gas, meals and medication," according to Dr. James King, chairman of the American Academy of Family physicians, students at UMass continue to buy and spend as much as they ever have.

"I haven't seen any difference – certainly no decline," says Charlotte Chandler-LaRoe, manager of the Dubois Library's Procrastination Station, on the state of on-campus sales over the past months. "We're just as busy as we've ever been, if not busier." Her statements were echoed by David Eichstaedt, campus center operational retail manager, who said that "Sales have been steady. They definitely haven't gone down ... not yet anyway." Student spending on-campus has remained constant despite the warnings of economic recession and the $12 million budget cut that was announced last week by UMass Chancellor Robert Holub. The consensus among students seems to be that we may be headed into economic recession, but is that any reason to skimp on the mocha-whatevers?

The consensus among students seems to be that we may be headed into economic recession, but is that any reason to skimp on the mocha-whatevers?

Actually, it is. College students are just as affected by the hiring cuts, rising housing costs and federal and state budget cuts as any other demographic, if not more so. Budget cuts will most likely be cutting directly into our financial aid.

The average UMass graduate leaves school with over $17,000 in loans, according to a data set compiled by campus institutional resources for 2006-2007. UMass graduates will struggle with more debt and fewer employment opportunities than ever before. 52 percent of UMass graduates (2005-2007) are unemployed. 41 percent are unemployed and looking for work, according to the UMass Institutional Resources graduating senior survey. Hiring cuts like those implemented last week by UMass Chancellor Holub will only work to decrease employment among recent college graduates.

We have to ask ourselves: are we ready for an economic depression? Our generation is used to having the things we want when we want them. We grew up in a time of steady economic growth, when every middle-schooler had a cell phone, when every 16 year old had a car and the world was becoming economically flat.

Being in college has a bubble-like quality. We're insulated from the rest of the world and are often disconnected from the realities of student loans and insurance payments. The crumbling economy seems like a distant thing when you're swiping into an all-you-can-eat buffet twice a day with a meal plan that was probably paid for by your parents.

The effects of the recession haven't reached us yet. They've been delayed for the day when we take that college diploma, and with it nearly $20,000 in debt and a 48 percent chance of finding a job to pay it off. If the graduating classes of 2009, 2010 and 2011 don't start taking the hint, economic independence among college graduates could be a thing of the past.

Dress for success, not for bed

Shruti Sehgal

Fashion faux pas come and go, but there's one pesky trend that just won't leave. Like the oft-famed socialite who shows up without an invitation, loungewear has long outstayed its welcome at our campus.

Making its debut at the college scene back in 2004, loungewear is a subcategory of casual wear characterized by sophisticated ensembles of sleepwear, exercise clothing and scruffy attire. A form of casual expression at the time of its inception, its laidback attire code has moved past its original limits to now become accepted apparel at UMass.

At first glance, this steady transition makes sense. Preserving efforts and inexpensive accessories to the everyday burden of what to wear, pajamas and the like are quick fixes for dining halls, dorms and classes.

But here's the catch. Victoria's Secret "Pink"-brand sweats can only look so good. Try as you may, loungewear isn't going to enhance your appearance. Who cares? You should. While image may not be a priority when you just want to grab a bite or take a nap, looking the part of a student in class is necessary for two important reasons.

First of all, professors and TAs notice what you're wearing. This shouldn't come as a surprise when they lecture. Yet without realizing it, students attending classes in sloppy clothes demonstrate a severe lack of respect for the instructors and the subjects being taught.

Fashion expert Clinton Kelly of TLC's "What Not to Wear" agrees. "I think dressing so far down is incredibly insulting to a professor who brought his or her 'A' game to class. Nobody wants to speak to a room full of people who look as though they'd rather still be in bed."

College students are soon-to-be professionals, and nothing says, "I'm unprepared for that reality" quite like inappropriate threads.

Given the time and energy these professionals burn to engage and inform us, it seems very little to ask that we reciprocate their consideration by putting some thought into our appearances.

Also keep in mind that your professors are the ones who will guide you through college and whatever may come after. Through writing recommendations, giving advice, and assisting as college references, these teachers give you the edge to pursue the internship, job or graduate school of your most ambitious desire.

On what grounds can professors think and speak highly of you if your clothes suggest you'd sooner sleep, jog, or roll in the mud than be a proper member of their intellectual communities?

Of course your capabilities as a student are probably stellar. In college classrooms, loungewear may inaccurately reflect personal qualities. Students who show up to class in pajamas are certainly not careless and indifferent to their studies – if they were, they wouldn't show up at all.

But herein lies the problem: your sparkling personality does not supersede your dress sense. Without a doubt, a student in clean-cut jeans appears to be far more intelligent, alert and prepared than a classmate in orange velour pants with dangling strips of dirty fabric.

On that note, I slide into contention number two: clothes aren't just about looks – especially when it comes to professional standards. According to BBC News, "Research indicates that 55 percent of the impact you make at work depends on how you look and behave ... only 7 percent on what you actually say."

The connection here is obvious. College students are soon-to-be professionals, and nothing says, "I'm unprepared for that reality" quite like inappropriate threads.

Illinois State University took this bit personally. In 2007, the College of Business' marketing department took notice of the shoddy classroom style, and put an end to it by instituting "professionalism," a strict business casual dress code. Their objective is to teach students how to put the right foot forward in and after college.

Granted, not all of us are marketing majors. Several UMass students will never need to dress up for corporate events. At an upcoming stage in all our lives, however, each and every one of us will have to make a good impression on an employer. Whether you like it or not, you will be required to look polished and put together.

Given this inevitability, it only makes sense that college students learn what to wear and where to wear it well in advance. Higher education institutions are ideal practice grounds because they are the means through which you transition from adolescent to professional adult. While this conclusion doesn't mean you ought to dress daily in your best Sunday clothes, you are expected to appear decent and presentable when required.

As the popular saying goes, there's a time and place for everything. Loungewear is therefore only appropriate for what it is designed for – lounging.

A vote for Obama

Alana Goodman

Something has suddenly come over me. Maybe I have been listening to too much RatDog over the weekend. Maybe Oliver Stone's "W" helped me see the light. Or maybe I just desperately don't want Susan Sarandon, Tim Robbins and Alec Baldwin to move to Canada. Whatever it is, I've had an epiphany: I cannot vote for John McCain this November.

I just wouldn't be able to live with myself if I contributed to four more years of the same failed George Bush policies.

Truth be told, America is a broken and immoral country. It expects people to take responsibility for their actions. It encourages wealth and prosperity. It's mean to terrorists. The time has come for Americans to embrace "change."

This is why we need a president like Barack Obama. He understands it's unfair for some families to selfishly have incomes of $250,000 while others earn significantly less. Why should one family be able to send their children to college, while another can barely scrape together enough money for abortions and clean needles? That's not the America I want to live in.

Under an Obama presidency, families who make more than $250,000 would be punished with higher taxes and discouraged from making that kind of money in the future. More importantly, Obama believes American tax money should be turned into welfare checks for the 40 percent of those who don't pay any income tax at all.

This country needs a president like Obama who will stop pressuring low-income single mothers and minorities to take "personal responsibility" for their actions. Republicans simply don't understand that low-income people are poor because of racism, sexism, anti-Semitism, ageism and homophobia. There's no way for poor people to overcome these obstacles and they'll need to be supported with public money for the rest of their lives.

Like most Americans, I'm also tired of being lectured to take unreliable precautions against pregnancy like "abstinence," "condoms," "birth control pills," "Depo-Provera," "diaphragms," "IUDs," "withdrawal" or "the morning-after pill." How restrictive. How old fashioned. America needs a pro-choice president like Obama who understands that women are too weak and blinded by their hormones to take control of their own fertility.

The next leader of this country also needs to take a stand against the radical pro-life lobby. Obama, who has voted against the Born-Alive Infant Protection Act twice, realizes that giving medical care to a baby who survives an abortion may put undue stress on doctors. Unlike the heartless pro-lifers, Obama kindly takes the feelings of medical practitioners into consideration.

Another reason why Obama should be president is because he promises to shut down the terrorist detention camp at Guantanamo Bay. It's true that Khalid Sheikh Muhammed personally beheaded journalist Daniel Pearl, but that's no excuse for the U.S. government to keep him in a tiny prison cell with no Internet access.

What America needs right now is a strong leader like Obama who believes that the Iraq war is unwinnable despite all evidence and reason. After the U.S. surrenders in Iraq, we need someone like Obama who vows to irrationally send our troops into Afghanistan and Pakistan.

It's also crucial that Americans elect a candidate with good judgment, as opposed to a lot of experience (unless we're talking about female Republican vice presidential candidates – then experience is paramount). We also need to stop worrying about Obama's radical associates. I personally believe William Ayers would make a great secretary of defense – he obviously already knows his way around the Pentagon.

I just wouldn't be able to live with myself if I contributed to four more years of the same failed George Bush policies.

Most importantly, the new president must abandon President Bush's dangerous foreign policy strategies. Sure, we haven't had a terrorist attack on our soil for seven years, but we've also become pretty unpopular among radical dictators.

I have faith that Obama has the interpersonal skills necessary to sit Mahmoud Ahmadinejad down over some arugula and convince the rakish terrorist to stop teasing Israel and abandon his nuclear ambitions. And if that doesn't work out? Well, I'm sure the Israelis will be fine. After all, if there's anything that history has proven, it's that the Jews always land on their feet.

If you look beyond political achievements, experience, moral fortitude and judgment, then I'm positive you'll begin to like the Democratic candidate as much as I do. However, what really convinced me to support Obama was the list of his glowing endorsements.

Hamas, the New Black Panther Party, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Columbia (FARC), the U.S. Communist Party, Louis Farrakhan, Fidel Castro, Hugo Chavez, Moammar Quaddafi, Ahmadinejad and Kim Jong Il are all publicly backing the Illinois senator. Would they really want us to elect someone who is bad for America?

Let's face it: McCain is old. He's out of touch. He has cancer and he can't even use the Internet. It's time to do our "patriotic duty" and help "spread the wealth around." It's time to "slow [the U.S.'s] development of future combat systems" and "not develop new nuclear weapons."

America, we need to let go of our guns and religion and start clinging to hope and change.

Keynesianism: an ignoble investment for America

Matthew M. Robare

Last week, Paul Krugman, a Princeton faculty member and New York Times columnist, was awarded the Nobel Memorial Prize in Economic Sciences. This is the moral equivalent of being hailed as a great scientist for defending creationism. Krugman is Keynesian, a follower of British economist John Maynard Keynes and his economic theories as expressed in "The General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money," published in 1936. The problem is that Keynesian theory, despite its popularity among academics and politicians, gets an awful lot wrong.

Keynesians are like creationists, who claim that the book of Genesis is scientifically accurate. To reduce the complexity, beauty and harmony of the universe, creationists deem that God created it for no reason, and sustained the new existence with miracles. Keynesians claim that for no given reason, an economy will suddenly experience insufficient aggregate demand – consumption plus investment plus government spending, plus net exports, resulting in a recession.

Once this happens, governments should increase their spending – and therefore aggregate demand – to mitigate or end the recession. But because consumption is part of the aggregate demand formula, governments must somehow increase spending without affecting the consumer's ability to purchase goods and services with high taxes to pay for its own spending.

The Keynesians say governments can do this by taxing savings, borrowing from private sources or getting the central bank to print as much money as the government needs – another form of borrowing, which allows the government to operate on a deficit. The bank, being part of the government, would never try to collect its debts because that would cause the whole system to collapse.

Most governments do all three and are especially dependent on the third idea, which Keynes claimed to be "the miracle of turning a stone into bread." But a theory of purposeless causes sustained by miracles does not seem to be a good theory.

Fortunately, there is a good theory for economics, the Austrian theory. The argument of the theory (incredibly simplified) is that during inflation, banks think they have more money than they really do – the supply of money has increased, but its value has decreased – so they lend the money to businesses at lower interest rates than they would without inflation. The businesses then invest in capital goods – building factories or other expensive, long-term stuff.

But eventually something causes people to lose confidence in the banks, and people try to get as much of their savings as possible. Unfortunately, the bank doesn't have the money – it never really did because the value decreased – and interest rates have to go back to normal. Bad investments must then be liquidated by businesses so they can pay off loans – the result is less consumption, but more production, unemployment and recession. No miracles, just good reasoning.

Keynesianism is like creationism in another way – the relationship of the book to the people and their prophet. The most popular myth is that when "The General Theory" was published, it was a totally new and original work ushering in an overnight revolution in economics. This is not true. Most of Keynes' "original contributions" were made by other economists years before – it was essentially isolated from world trade. South Africa before the lifting of apartheid is an even better example because there was no war to decrease its industrial capacity.

In short, Professor Krugman espouses an unrealistic, backward and inherently illogical theory of economics and his Nobel Prize gives undue prestige to his school of thought. He does not deserve a Nobel – although perhaps an IgNobel is in order – and I can only be amused by the Nobel Prize being awarded by a central bank and given to an economist advocating greater power for central banks. I fear the consequences of Keynesianism influencing future policies.

Bad investments must then be liquidated by businesses so they can pay off loans – the result is less consumption, but more production, unemployment and recession.

A cappella and comedy at UMass

The Vocal Suspects and other Resident Student Organizations at UMass have set up a night of improvisational comedy and a cappella at the SOM on Saturday.

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Staff

It's a well-known fact that at the University of Massachusetts, Halloween lasts longer than any other two Holidays put together. It's a holiday that easily trumps Cinco de Mayo or Easter in college popularity. This Saturday, several UMass performing groups have decided to kick off the season with a little event they like to call "Holla-ween."

"Holla-ween" is an annual event put on by UMass a cappella group, The Vocal Suspects. It's meant as both a seasonal party and a showcase for campus talent. This year, they will be joined by Missaun, IMPROVable and The UMass Dynamics.

Missaun, IMPROVable is one of the largest and most popular comedy groups at UMass. Performing weekly shows since 1990, Missaun, IMPROVable is known throughout campus for their consistently wacky improvisation and loud music.

The UMass Dynamics is a co-ed a cappella troupe, and one of the newest musical groups on campus. Although only recently formed, the Dynamics have hit the scene fairly quickly. They've already released 2 CDs and performed at multiple festivals throughout the Northeast.

Every year, an effort is also made to bring in performers from others schools. This year, the out-of-town act will be the Pennsylvania, an a cappella group from the University of Pennsylvania.

While not all the acts will have spooky material prepared, the event will undoubtedly be festive. "We decorated the bejesus out of the auditorium," said Jaime McTyre, gig manager for The Vocal Suspects.

All performers will be in costume. Attendees are encouraged to dress up as well, with prizes for the best costumes chosen by the audience. The event will also include refreshments, a T-shirt design contest and free candy.

For those who choose not to stray from the musical mainstream, "a cappella" is a type of music, usually performed by groups of four or more, that does not employ any instruments. Instead, the goal of a cappella is to flesh out the sound with a range of voices and vocal effects.

Local band to perform new material at Iron Horse

By Angela Stanonis
Collegian Correspondent

No band embodies the truism "Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home," better than Northampton's own Winterpills, who make their welcome return to the open arms of the Iron Horse Music Hall on Saturday, Oct. 25.

With the dependability of a boomerang, the local legends return to celebrate the release of their latest album, "Central Chambers."

The recently recorded album is the product of a year's worth of effort and an abundance of positive reinforcement from their previous release, "The Light Divides."

"Central Chambers" will be the band's third record on Signature Sounds, an independent label many folk and Americana artists call home, including Josh Ritter and Erin McKeown.

From their earliest days, the Winterpills have been causing quite a stir for a supposedly "quiet" band.

They were conceived in Northampton in 2003 by singer, songwriter and guitarist Phillip Prince with Flora Reed, Dave Hower, Denis Crommett and Brian Akey.

Their self-titled debut created uproar in the underground front, with the track "Pills For Sarah" showcased on the 19th edition of Paste Magazine's monthly sampler. The band was also featured on NPR at this time.

The band immediately earned comparisons to the likes of Elliott Smith, Iron and Wine, Fleetwood Mac and a myriad of other musical legends. Keeping this sonic diversity in check, they managed to exhibit all these influences without appearing a cheap imitation.

Winterpills produces a fusion of folk rock and chamber pop that is uniquely theirs, complete with swelling harmonies and tender guitar chords, which often mirror the junkie-chic styling of Smith and his contemporaries.

"Central Chambers" makes a clear allusion to the chambers of the heart, with each song reflecting heavy emotion. However, the title carries a lot of literal weight as well, referring to Price's recent diagnosis of an aortic aneurism.

Whether he intended it or not, the heart theme became central to the album, with songs like "Secret Blue Thread" making further references to this somatic system.

While Price is aware his condition poses no immediate threat to his health, he couldn't help but allow the experience to influence his songwriting.

"Just learning there's the potentiality of something like that is disturbing. It did affect me," said Price in a recent interview for Metromix Entertainment Guide.

See WINTERPILLS on page 10

Phillip Prince and the rest of the Winterpills will play at the Iron Horse Music Hall this Saturday for their return home to Northampton.

Musician explores the influence of jazz music

By Peter Rizzo
Collegian Staff

In the words of Bart Simpson, "Cartoons are America's only native art form." But in the real world, this distinction is reserved primarily for jazz, a style of music indigenous to America and whose influence continues to be heard. Jeremy Milligan, a local jazz artist, used to harbor distaste for the art form until high school came around.

"When I first started playing guitar, I listened to a lot of Queen, Motley Crue and Van Halen, who were all popular at the time. I didn't start listening to jazz until towards the end of high school," he said. "When I first got it, it was way over my head and I wasn't prepared for what I heard."

Despite some early inclinations against jazz, it's the primary inspiration behind his new band, The Jeremy Milligan Quintet, and their new album, "Still Moving."

The album, released in September, now boasts positive reviews from the Hampshire Gazette and the Valley Advocate.

The latter calls the album's sound, "Not quite like anything you've heard before."

The Quintet represents the next chapter in the career of Milligan, whose musical projects have a wide range. While at Keene State College in New Hampshire, Milligan majored in classical guitar performance. During his four-year tenure at the school, he started a band called "The Sofa Kings." It was the first of many band names for Milligan, though he admits choosing them isn't his favorite part of being in a band.

"Band names are the worst. I didn't even bother with this one. That's why I just called it my name. You always end up with things that don't really make much sense and aren't really flattering," he said.

One of Milligan's more bizarre projects came in his tenure with the Enchantment of the Seas Orchestra on Royal Caribbean Cruise Lines. While on board, Milligan would provide evening entertainment for people on their extended island getaways. But the experience wasn't as good as it sounds, he said.

"For everything good, there was something else that was really bad. I got really good beach time, and a good tan. But it was honestly just incredibly boring," he said. "If you get sick of your dorm, at least you can go for a walk. If you get sick of your cabin, there's nowhere to go."

Today, Milligan tours behind his Quintet. The band will be coming this Saturday to the Unitarian Church in Amherst. Tickets are available at the door, and are $7; $5 for students. There, he will be playing tracks from his new album, among them his personal favorite, "Settle."

"It's one of the first tracks that was finished. We had three songs done right off the bat and "Settle" was interesting because as I was creating it, I hated it," said Milligan. "It just wasn't what I expected or thought it would be. When it was done, it was exactly what I wanted. That's the one I'm happiest about."

The six-minute track is one of the standout tracks off the album, with a slow-building groove augmented by horns that would sound at home in a New Orleans club.

Despite the lengthy tracks on the album, Milligan tries to stay away from the "crazy improvisations" that usually dominate jazz music, instead opting for a "pop sensibility."

"Even though there's no singing, I try to work pop into the music to make it catchy and listenable," he said. "It's one thing I feel I could've done better in a couple songs, but it was the hardest part of the process."

The lack of singing was a creative decision Milligan felt was best for the album.

"I've thought about doing albums with lyrics, but it would be such a different thing for me. My playing doesn't really suit my singing all that well, so it would be a challenge. I'm sort of an instrumental guy," he said.

Today, Milligan balances touring with his new project and playing wedding receptions, where he primarily plays classical guitar. He maintains that despite his earlier attempts at bands, his new project will be something that lasts.

"I've been in quite a few different bands, but this is the first time it's been exactly what I want to be doing," he said. "I wrote all the music and wrote exactly what I wanted to hear. So it's much more fulfilling for me. I'll definitely be sticking with it."

Phillip Seymour Hoffman stars in Charlie Kaufman's new film "Synecdoche, New York" as a theatre director struggling with life and death.

Weekend film releases look to bring something new

By Keats Kokoszka
Collegian Staff

This past weekend saw "Beverly Hills Chihuahua" drop from its top spot at the cinema. With a new crop of films being released this upcoming weekend, contending for the top spot at the box office will be quite competitive.

This weekend features Charlie Kaufman bringing his view on life to the screen again, this time in the director's chair along with writing credits. Clint Eastwood dives into another depressing story of a woman's struggle to find truth and her child. Edward Norton and Colin Farrell face off in a crime drama. Swedish vampires haunt the night and fall in love. And fans of horror and gore get their annual dose of "Saw" for the fifth time.

Saw V

The Production Manager of the last four "Saw" movies now gets his chance at the director's chair. David Hackl takes on this franchise horror series for its fifth installment hoping to bring the story to life or just to make money. The movies all follow the same simple plot that has allowed this film series to bring in a good amount of profit. The formula is simple: gross torture scene one after the other, making the audience queasy rather than scared, then a plot twist at the end that allows for a sequel. When will it end?

Pride and Glory

This film is another New York City crime drama. One police officer starts to investigate a series of crimes only to find out that the culprit isn't just another police officer, it's his brother and brother-in-law. The movie tries to bring family drama, morals and law enforcement together on screen with an emotional and thrilling punch.

Gavin O'Connor ("Miracle") takes a talented cast (Edward Norton, Colin Farrell and Jon Voight) on a journey through the streets of New York. But is it the same tale that has been spun so many times before? Or can O'Conner create something totally unique with this script he worked on with a litany of writers?

Let the Right One In

This Swedish vampire tale looks to be one of the most original thriller/horror films to come out this year. A movie about a 12-year-old boy, Oskar, who is anxious and constantly bullied, finds a new friend in a unique girl, Eli. She has some problems of that aren't normal, such as burning on blood in sight, avoiding the sun and never being affected by the cold weather of winter. She just so happens to be a vampire.

Oskar and Eli explore what friendship means while blood pours from every bodies, lights on fire and people are killed.

Changeling

Clint Eastwood directs another film with a depressing, dark premise. He brings along another all-star cast hoping to make a splash at this year's Oscars. Angelina Jolie received rave reviews at Cannes for her portrayal of a mother whose child was kidnapped. The police in Los Angeles return her son, but it is not her son. She believes that she is being duped by authorities and sets out to find answers.

She meets a priest along the way, played by John Malkovich, who sees her case as a cause for concern and believes her story. The two move through the film trying to find Jolie's son in the corrupt world of 1920s Los Angeles.

The most vital component to the Winterpills' sound is the male-female harmonies of Price and Reed. The layered delivery has a profound effect on the wholesome believability the band emanates, and provides them with a distinct style.

Price's vocals have a certain earnestness that makes his emotions tangible to the listener. Whether he's exploring his sonorous, lower register or the heights of his wispy falsetto, there's a comforting component to his voice that's always tonally pleasing.

Often, Price becomes the sonic equivalent of a warm cup of tea, especially when combined with the honey-sweet harmonies of Reed. In particular, songs like "Wire" and "What Makes Me Blind" work best to showcase how effortlessly the two voices entwine.

"Central Chambers" is taking the Winterpills in a relatively new direction from their humble folk beginnings. By far their most heavily produced album to date, the production process has allowed them some breathing room in terms of instrumentation.

One of their catchiest tunes on the record, "You Don't Love Me Yet," is riddled with their flawless formula of acoustic guitar and harmony. There's a certain bubbly nature to the downplaying of romantic feelings, which gives the song a sort of wry satire.

"Take Away the Words," the album's first single, is about as pop-oriented as the folk rockers can muster. Leaning towards the chamber pop sound they've alluded to with "The Light Divides," distant keyboards layered with guitar and melodic proclamations of the subjectivity of expression make this song both toe-tapping and thought-provoking.

"Beesting" is the most distinctively innovative track on the album. Beginning with a curious blend of synthetic, distorted sounds, the track quickly progresses into the typical Winterpills format of highly melodic keyboard riffs and evocative vocals.

None of the instrumentation employed in a Winterpills song is unnecessary; every chime or beat is heartfelt and deliberate.

The band also prides itself in creating an intimate live performance that readily engages any audience.

"That's one reason the Winterpills exist, because I wanted to create a really dynamic situation that was also intimate," says Price.

With their reputation for intensely moving live performances and an arsenal of new tunes, Saturday's performance promises to be quite the homecoming.

The Winterpills will be performing at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton on Saturday, Oct. 25 at 7 p.m. Tickets are $10 in advance or $13 at the door.

Traditionally, this particular form is associated with doo-wop and barbershop styles, but nowadays nearly every style of music imaginable has been converted to a cappella by inventive performing groups.

"People have expectations about what a cappella is," said McTyre. "It's a lot more fun than people think. Our shows are very relaxed, and everyone usually has a good time."

Although UMass currently has nearly half a dozen of these troupes officially registered, The Vocal Suspects claim to be the premiere group. "We've been around for just as long as some of the other groups," said McTyre, "but in terms of the different gigs we do and the type of music we play, we're the original co-ed modern pop group."

This is The Vocal Suspects' first major event of the school year. With nearly half the group being made up of newcomers, those who have seen them in the past may be in for a bit of a surprise.

"Holla-ween" is scheduled to take place this Saturday, Oct. 25 in the Isenberg School of Management auditorium. This year marks the 10th annual hosting of the event, coinciding with the 10th year of The Vocal Suspects' existence.

The show will begin at 7 p.m. and is expected to run for roughly an hour and a half. The show is scheduled to not cut into too much of the late-night Saturday action.

"This is one of our biggest events of the year, and we expect upwards of 200 people" said McTyre.

Kaufman's outside the box

Synecdoche, New York

Charlie Kaufman gets his first trial in the director's chair since film school for "Synecdoche." He also gets one of the best casts in Hollywood to tell his tale of a man struggling with imminent death, separation from his wife and child, and all the other struggles the human soul must endure in a lifetime. It's another one of Kaufman's wacky scripts that's sure to pull in audiences, even if they don't fully understand it.

The movie stars Phillip Seymour Hoffman ("The Savages," "Capote") as Caden Cotard who tries to build a life-sized replica of New York City in a warehouse and produce a play about his life in the replica. He recruits actors to play all the characters in his life, and himself. This all happens after he is left by his wife, played by Katherine Keener ("Into the Wild"), because she wishes to pursue her own career as a painter in Berlin. She takes their daughter Olive with her, devastating Caden. Caden begins to decompose, while his play and real life blur into one element, creating a greater divide between him and the people he loves.

Senior recalls path to UMass captain

Youth experience shaped veteran Patry

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

Vanessa Patry began playing soccer about 16 years ago. From the moment she laced up her cleats, likely alongside her brother, she was a standout.

Patry grew up in Delmar, NY, which has close to 8,500 residents. The suburb of Albany may have been voted by CNN's Money Magazine as one of the best places to live in 2005, but couldn't round up enough girls to form a youth travel team when Patry was just seven.

To her chagrin, she was forced to play on a boys travel team called the Bethlehem Bandits with two of her best friends. Patry was younger, but if not better, and was just as good as the boys on her team. She soon found out that being on a boys team wasn't so bad after all.

"At first yes," Patry recalled when asked about the intimidation factor. "But once you realize that you can play with, if not be better than them, that intimidation factor that was once there goes away."

Throughout her entire life Patry was always the youngest one. Because of her older brother Matt and the endless encouragement of her parents, she started playing soccer and from there it didn't take long for her to excel at the sport.

"As a young kid, I was constantly playing all different kinds of sports with him and his friends," Patry said. "That definitely helped create my competitive side."

Her "competitive side" as she describes it isn't really what you may think it is. Unlike most of the so-called competitive athletes, Patry isn't vocal. You won't go to a Minutewomen soccer match on Saturday and hear her yelling, but you will see her be competitive in her own way. You'll see her guide the players on the field, fight for the ball and put her all out on the field. Perhaps it's that competition from her youth that has made her into the Massachusetts women's soccer team's lead scorer.

She also gained that competitive edge while playing with boys when she was a young girl.

"I feel that at a young age playing with boys gives you a certain aggression, that fight," Patry said. "I loved playing on that team because opponents would think 'yes, they have girls,' and then when we played them, it was a shock that we could actually play with, if not beat them."

Now, Patry isn't the youngest on the team anymore. As a senior and a captain it's her time to do the teaching.

"I like leading by example," Patry said. "But a big part of being a captain in my mind is making sure the girls are getting along, because chemistry is the key for doing well."

Maybe it's this chemistry, or the leadership the Minutewomen have, that is leading them to success this season.

Aside from the hectic lifestyle Patry lives on and off the field, the double major in biology and neuroscience would like nothing more than a year off to grab a simple job at home and then maybe, just maybe, return to school to continue her education.

Senior captain Vanessa Patry averages two shots a game for the Minutewomen. Patry has scored five goals and three assists, good for 13 points.

Defense, physical play key to success for UM

have had time to heal and the rest of the offense has improved. Its biggest challenge is to keep La Salle's offense to a minimum.

The Minutewomen have not won a game this season with opponents scoring more than one goal. The closest it came to a comeback win was Sept. 4 against New Hampshire where the game ended in a 2-2 tie.

La Salle leads the conference in fouls (220) and yellow cards (18). In other words, the Minutewomen know what they're in for.

"They play a very phonetic Philly ball style," Rudy said.

In order to stay with La Salle, UMass will have to not overreact to excessive fouling, even if they aren't called.

"We have to have the mental commitment that we did in responding to everything they give us like we did with Dayton," Rudy said. "It's going to be a wild affair."

The Rams (8-4-2, 5-1-1 A-10) don't do anything exceptional, but they still find ways to win. Fordham lost to No. 9 Duke, 2-0, and No. 3 North Carolina, 6-0, in the Adidas Classic on Sept. 19 and Sept. 21, but have made the most of its experience.

The Rams opened up A-10 play with a 3-2 win at George Washington before shutting out the Billikens, 2-0, and St. Bonaventure, 3-0.

Recently, Fordham has run into a little bit of trouble with a narrow 1-0 victory over Temple on Oct. 19 and a 2-2 tie against the Hawks on Oct. 17.

They generally don't do very well against the Minutewomen, as they have gone 11-1 against the Rams. In their last meeting, UMass pulled out a 1-0 victory at home. However, with the road woes it has faced this season, no victory can be taken for granted.

"We look at this one as its own entity and we're going for points here," Rudy said of his team's urgency for winning this weekend.

to her credit. Also a danger on the forward line is junior Hannah Brehm.

Brehm has five goals and five assists. With a team-leading 28 shots, Brehm will be a player to watch as the Minutewomen are on the other side of the rivalry between these two programs.

UMass leads the all-time series 28-9 but the last time the two teams met, the Owls came away with a 2-1 victory.

The Minutewomen are undefeated this season in overtime games, one on the road and one at home.

This game comes on a special day for the Minutewomen, Senior Day. The two squads will play in UMass' final home game of the regular season. Seniors Orlando, Parker and Mary Shea will play on Garber Field this weekend for the last time.

"[There's] definitely a lot of emotion going into the weekend," Shea said of her departing class of teammates. "Us seniors just need to try to put that aside and just focus on what we have this weekend and what we have ahead of us and try not to think about [the fact that] it's our last game … on this turf anyways … and just try to focus on what we have to do and what's after that."

UMass teams picked high in preseason

By Kyle Predki
Collegian Staff

The Atlantic 10 conference released its annual season predictions this week, and the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving stand on top. Even though UMass graduated some of the conference's best last year, the predictions show the Minutemen aren't going anywhere. The UMass women's swimming and diving team, who placed fourth at the A-10 Championships last year, is now predicted to finish second this year. Richmond will finish first, according to the poll.

In its first strides towards these finishing spots, Massachusetts will host Army at Boyden Gym on Saturday. Last year, the two teams split the matchup, Army winning the men's, 165-135, and UMass winning the women's, 164-136. The two teams have developed a rivalry between one another with an all time 2-1 record against Army.

"[Army] has been a good rivalry over the years," Massachusetts women's swimming and diving coach Bob Newcomb said. "And it's our first home meet, so I expect a lot of emotion."

The Minutewomen got the best of the Black Knights last year and hope to repeat the performance this year. Winning her two individual events and assisting in a medley relay win, captain Christa Narus will lead the charge against Army. Narus, who holds two school records, guided UMass last year against Army and will look to continue her success in this week's meet.

The Black Knights will also test the women's diving team. Last week against Boston University, UMass flooded the top spots in diving but couldn't clinch the No. 1 slot. This week, Massachusetts' top divers will face one of the best in the Patriot League Conference.

For the men's team, Juan Moliere will look to lead for UMass. In last year's meet with Army, Moliere put up a first and second place in his individual events and a second place in the 400 freestyle relay. In last week's performance versus BU, Moliere finished in the top spot in both of his two individual events, 50 freestyle and 100 freestyle, and also assisted in the second place 400 freestyle relay team. Mohere will continue to keep his solid performances and gain points in the sprinting events.

Senior captain Nate Bromage should also race at the top as he did last year against Army. Bromage claimed first in his individual event, the 100 butterfly, and was the final leg of the 400 freestyle relay. Bromage also took third in the 50 freestyle, right behind Moliere.

Another standout performance to expect will come from freshman, Joey Sbordon. In his first collegiate meet, Sbordon finished first in both of his events, 500 and 1000 freestyle, and was also on the second place 400 freestyle team. Sbordon will definately be put to another test this weekend as Army sports strong distance swimmers.

This weekend's meet will be highly contested all the way to the end. The swimming and diving dual meet will begin at 2 p.m. at the Joseph Rogers Pool in Boyden Gymnasium on Saturday.

Senior Day brings emotion, memories

Postseason position rests on weekend

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

Amidst one of their best seasons in years, the Massachusetts field hockey team is now prepared to hit the home stretch as the 2008 regular season is nearing its conclusion. It'll be Senior Day for the Minutewomen on Sunday, as they host Saint Joseph's and Temple this weekend for their last two home games of the regular season.

The No. 17 Minutewomen (12-3, 4-0 A-10) now sit alone atop the Atlantic 10 standings after Saint Joseph's and Temple both lost their first conference games of the season last weekend. Despite the losses, the two teams are still threats for the conference title and will have their best shot to show it this weekend against UMass.

With two conference foes coming to Amherst, the matchups are vital in determining how UMass will look entering the A-10. However, these games will be particularly important to the team's three seniors as the see their careers begin to wind down.

"It's kind of bittersweet," senior forward Katelyn Orlando said. "It's been a long four years but at the same time, I don't want it to be over, because there are so many little things about being on this team and field hockey that you just can't live without."

Even though the team boasts only three seniors, the Minutewomen have received enormous contributions from each of them.

Team captain Mary Shea has only scored two goals this season, but is a leader in the team's defense and outletting. Offensive captain Erin Parker leads the team with seven assists and has notched two game-winning goals this season. Finally, Orlando is the team's offensive leader with 11 goals so far, which is also tops in the conference.

"Each of them really brings something powerful to the program," coach Justine Sowry said. "They are just wonderful leaders and role models. Not just for their teammates, but for young women in sports."

Adding to the emotion leading into the seniors' last weekend at Garber Field was former teammate Nicole Phelan, who joined the team in practice on Wednesday. The former midfielder reflected upon her Senior Day experience a year ago.

"It's just an achievement, looking back at four years. It takes over a part of your life and you're starting to taper off to the end of your career," Phelan said. "We've had some low times in our program and to see where it is now is really a great experience."

The emotion of this weekend, combined with two of the toughest teams in the conference, will be a tough test for UMass this weekend as they look to hold on to the top spot in the conference.

"Each game is tough, even the teams that aren't high up in the rankings," Sowry said. "Field hockey's a strange game and anyone can win on the day. So, we have to learn to play against whatever opponent we go up against."

If the Minutewomen have been most impressive in one aspect this season, it has been their consistency. UMass played well in its three losses, all towards ranked opponents, and have beaten the teams they were expected to beat. According to Shea, the team's focus has not been an issue all season.

"This year, we've definitely stayed focused and we've had a lot of fun," Shea said. "Our team chemistry is great. We listen to what the coaches tell us and just try to stick to our game plan the best that we can. I think that's how we've been so consistent this year."

Coach Sowry is proud of her team's progress so far this season in terms of their growth and does not expect her players to let up anytime soon.

"We're learning how to win every game, even though we're young and inexperienced in some areas," Sowry said. "This weekend they'll require no motivation and they love playing here. It'll be hard for them, but also to gain to top seed in the A-10 tournament."

Conference play guides road to playoffs

Minutewomen travel to take on foes La Salle, Fordham this weekend

By David Branch
Collegian Staff

With just four games remaining in the regular season, the Massachusetts women's soccer team currently sits in sixth place in the Atlantic 10 with 10 points, and is slotted in the final spot in the A-10 tournament.

Within the conference, there are six teams, including the Minutewomen, that are within two points of each other entering the second to last weekend of A-10 play.

This weekend's two-game road series against La Salle and Fordham as well as next weekend's contests against visiting Saint Louis and Charlotte could significantly impact the Minutewomen's chances of making its first postseason since 2004.

"We face LaSalle, who is behind us in points, by one. They need points the rest of the way through," UMass coach Jim Rudy said.

The Explorers have eight points in the A-10, registering six wins, seven losses and three ties. A victory over the Minutewomen would put them in front of UMass for the final spot in the tournament.

The Explorers will face a Rhode Island team Sunday that defeated the Minutewomen last weekend, 1-0, before taking on last-place Xavier on Oct. 31.

"Rhode Island is a very dangerous opponent that you wouldn't know with a 2-5 record in the conference," Rudy said.

If URI is able to beat La Salle, UMass could be in good shape for postseason play, with just one game remaining in two weeks.

The Explorers will travel to Dayton for its final game of the 2008 campaign, a team which the Minutewomen defeated on Oct. 12.

UMass snapped a nine-game losing streak against the Flyers, getting a victory for the first time since the 1998 season, and giving the Flyers its only conference loss of the season.

The Flyers sit in second place in the A-10 with 16 points and an 11-4-1 conference record, just behind powerhouse Charlotte.

The Minutewomen will host the 49ers in its final game of the season Nov. 2. Charlotte sits atop the A-10 with an undefeated conference record and 21 points and is a lock to make the tournament, if not get the number one seed.

Statistically, the 49ers could lose out the rest of their season and still make the tournament. But this is not likely to happen with games against the Musketeers and URI before traveling to Amherst to close out their season.

Charlotte will take on Dayton today, which will easily be the biggest match-up in the A-10 this season.

If the Flyers are able to upset the 49ers, they would gain three points, bringing their total to 19. This means that they would be out of a second-place tie with Fordham, who also have 16 points.

The Rams and Flyers both have 5-1-1 conference records, while Dayton has three more wins in its overall record.

Fordham will face URI today, and will travel to Dayton and Xavier next weekend to finish up its campaign.

If UMass is able to win its final four games, they'll earn 12 points and will automatically earn a birth into the A-10 tournament.

But the Minutewomen have not been successful on the visiting side, with each of its five defeats coming on the road. With two games on the road this weekend, UMass must win at least one if not both games along with at least one game at home next weekend to be in good shape for the A-10 tournament.

Despite the thought of the Minutewomen extending its season, Rudy has only one thing on his mind as the season winds down.

"It's all about points," he said.

David Branch can be reached at dbranch@student umass.edu

Freshman forward Natalie Muka has 16 shots so far this season for the Minutewomen. Muka looks to score her first collegiate goal in this weekend's matches.

Defender midfielder Meghan Collins and the Minutewomen hold the last playoff spot in the Atlantic 10 tournament. This weekend's games significantly impact their postseason aspirations.

UMPD reassigned

Holub's move more representive of campuses

BY EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Chancellor Robert Holub recently sent an e-mail to the students of the University of Massachusetts outlining four changes in the organization of the school. One proposal was to move the UMass Police Department from the Office of Student Affairs to the Office of Administration and Finance, a move repeatedly suggested by students over the past four years.

Chancellor Holub said the move will restructure the department to reflect other schools' models.

"I am reassigning the UMass Amherst Police Department to the Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance," Holub wrote. "Its current placement under Student Affairs suggests erroneously that the police department is chiefly involved with students and their activities. As a unit of A & F the UMAPD will now be aligned with similar units concerned with the welfare of the entire campus."

While Holub raised valid concerns, the move of the UMPD from one department to another was also brought up last year during the student strike and was one of the proposals that the Student Government Association talked to the administration about during last semester's negotiations.

The fourth section of the General Student Strike Proposal stated that they wanted the UMPD out of the Office of Student Affairs and instead put into the Administration and Finance Department.

"The UMPD serves the entire campus, including faculty, staff, administration and others," said the proposal. "Placing UMPD under the Administration and Finance department will help to ensure that the department is accountable to the entirety of the campus community."

Although this was one of the requests from the General Student Strike, Holub has said that it was done without pressure from students but instead is more in line with other universities.

"This was done independently of any student request," said Holub. "It is fairly standard for the

M.H.C. revisits sexuality

BY JESSICA SACCO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Mount Holyoke College will host an interactive session on transgender issues in their Gamble Auditorium on Monday, Oct. 27 at 7:30 p.m.

The event, which is presented by Sam Lurie of Transgender Training and Advocacy, will examine basic terminology, issues in access to health resources and distinctions between gender identity and sexual orientation.

Advising sexual health educators will be able to attend a training session the following night, which will allow them to obtain skills that will be beneficial not only to themselves, but to transgender students in the area as well.

A student organization known as in*TOUCH Sexual Health Educators brought Lurie to Mt. Holyoke, with the help of the college's Health Services department and the Inclusive Initiatives Fund (III).

IIF grants funds to support innovative ideas for furthering the agenda of the Diverse Community Commission (DCC) report. As stated on the Mt. Holyoke Web site, a total of $30,000 is awarded per academic year, with each reward ranging between $300-3,000.

"This is a great opportunity for us to sponsor an event to talk about transgender students," said Mt. Holyoke senior and co-chair of in*TOUCH Barbara McCall. "Students think they're very informed and open, but everyone still has stigmas. It's always good to go back to the beginning and talk about changing terminology."

Lurie's meeting is just one of the many activities the college has brought to campus to raise awareness about transgender students. Karen Jacobus, coordinator of Health Education at Mt. Holyoke and advisor to in*TOUCH, emphasizes that it is important to continuously add to the ongoing dialogue.

Other events that have occurred over the past few years include stimulating conversations such as, "Voices Speak: Transgender Students and Alumni Share Their Stories," "Transgender Students and Women's Colleges: A Conversation" and a discussion with the on campus committee, Multicultural Community

Walk hosted for potential, progress

A banner flies high above N. Pleasent street for the A.B.C. Foliage Walk. The event aims to raise money to help local students get "A Better Chance" to succeed academically.

BY GISH SADLANT

University of Massachusetts students "walked the walk" this past Saturday with the Amherst community, as they participated in the 40th annual Fall Foliage Walk for the A Better Chance House in Amherst.

The Amherst town common was awake early, as participants registered at 10 a.m. for the 5k walk along the sidewalk on the west side of Route 116 and into the Norwottuck Rail Trail.

According to the program's Web site, the mission of the ABC house is to prepare academically talented and highly motivated African American, Latino, Asian and Native American students from educationally underserved school districts for college and future leadership roles in the broader community. Since the program began, over 100 of it's participants have graduated from Amherst Regional High School and have attended more than 50 colleges and universities.

Before the walk "kick-off," Michael Hawkins, president and alumnus of the ABC program took the stage, thanked the sponsors and introduced Senator Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst.) Rosenberg started the walk with a citation from the Massachusetts legislature. Senator Rosenberg spoke briefly on the community's support to the program, the high value placed on it's events in the community and the importance of the "walk the walk" part of community service.

"We are going to start the walk the walk part, the community values diversity and values coming a community in which all people can feel welcome, to a goal, we strive for each day. I hope we make progress each day in creating that," Rosenberg said.

He presented the current and former staff members with a recognition citation that congratulated their "great work … for the 40 years of outstanding and dedicated service to the community."

After the participants finished the walk, the common was filled with activities like a silent auction, a concert, a barbecue and a public art project.

"Remember the community art project. I've heard some good memories from this event. Participate in putting your own artistic touch on the celebration of community."

UMass clinches A-10 crown

The seniors on the No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey game could not have asked for a better ending.

Led by their three seniors, the Minutewomen captured the Atlantic 10 regular season title outright after a thrilling 2-1 victory over Temple on Senior Day, Sunday afternoon at Garber Field.

The three UMass seniors all scored goals in a stroke-off after two overtime periods couldn't decide it. Katelyn Orlando, Mary Shea and Erin Parker all had big weekends, each also scoring a goal in Friday's 4-0 win over Saint Joseph's.

On a weekend where the spotlight was focused directly on the team's seniors, the Minutewomen received no bigger contributions than that of Orlando, Shea and Parker.

"It's terrific that they're getting the rewards," UMass coach Justine Sowry said. "Our scoring has been spread across the board this season and the three have been fabulous contributors to the program. They're terrific leaders and terrific role models."

While the Minutewomen (14-3, 6-0 A-10) scored on three of their first four penalty strokes against Temple goalkeeper Sarah Dalrymple, it was freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdall that stopped Temple cold.

Widdall, who had not played in a game that went to penalty strokes since high school, blocked three out of the four Temple attempts. The only stroke to get past Widdall was an off-speed shot that caught her off-guard.

"I try not to think at all. I try just to focus on the ball and just completely react to the ball." Widdall said of defending the penalty strokes.

Sowry was proud of her goalkeep-

Pressure amounts for Minutewomen

Weekend matches key to postseason

By Adam Miller

The Massachusetts women's soccer team is no stranger to the challenges that accompany ending the season, especially when it's the Atlantic 10 schedule.

UMass (6-5-3, 3-3-1 A-10) had several days off between the loss to La Salle on Oct. 21, 2007 and the weekend matches at Charlotte and Saint Louis. However, a weekend road trip eliminated the Minutewomen from the A-10 Championships.

UMass hopes to avoid this from happening again this weekend coming off of eight days rest when facing La Salle today and Fordham on Sunday. The Explorers (6-7-3, 2-3-2 A-10) are coming off two double-overtime games against Temple and Saint Joseph's.

La Salle gained some ground on the Minutewomen this week, picking up four points with a win and a tie, putting it two points behind UMass. Today's match-up carries tremendous implications to both teams as a victory for the Minutewomen would bury the Explorers in the standings, while a loss would allow them to jump UMass in the standings.

Historically, the teams are pretty close to even with the Minutewomen possessing a 6-5 record over the Explorers. La Salle won the last meeting on Oct. 21, 2007 2-1, and also won the 2006 match.

The Explorers are the fourth best offensive team in the A-10 (25 goals) while also the fourth-worst when it comes to keeping the ball out of the net, allowing 27 goals. Meanwhile, the Minutewomen have established themselves as the best defensive team in the A-10. They are tied with SLU allowing 12 goals all season.

"We don't give up a lot, but they found ways to score on us in games the last few years," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "They've got a bunch of [players] that are scoring, it's not just one."

The team's leading scorer is freshman Dana O'Brien. The forward has started five of La Salle's 16 games, but she has not shied away from taking the ball to the net as she leads the team with 34 shots.

UMass would like to exploit the Explorers' defense, now that forwards Vanessa Patry and Vanessa Lima

Undefeated conference record on line

By Mike Grumbster

As the end of the regular season nears, the No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team is coming close to clinching the No. 1 seed in the Atlantic 10 Conference Tournament.

The Minutewomen (12-2, 4-0 A-10) host conference foes Saint Joseph's and Temple, today and Sunday, respectively.

The Hawks (11-5, 3-1 A-10) travel to Garber Field to try and avenge their loss to UMass last season in Philadelphia. St. Joe's only has three victories in the 24-game all-time series, dating back to 1986.

The Minutewomen are the only undefeated team in A-10 conference play. This game will be a rematch of last year's conference championship game – in which the Maroon and White won the 10th conference title in the history of the program.

In last season's matchup, senior midfielder Erin Parker scored the only two goals for the Minutewomen, sending them to NCAA Tournament play.

"Both teams are bothered Philadelphia teams," UMass Coach Justine Sowry said of the team's opponents this weekend. "They're very physical, and each time you play against them you know you've played a game of field hockey. They're competitors, they don't like to lose and [I m] expecting it to be quite a physical contest."

This will be an important game for the Minutewomen, not only for the top seed in the conference tournament, but history shows that when UMass had the win in the regular season and played the same team in the conference championship, the Minutewomen have beaten that team for the championship nine times.

Senior forward Katelyn Orlando led Parker the past for the first goal in last year's conference championship game and she's been equally as productive all season for the Maroon and White.

Orlando has played in 15 games for the Minutewomen, starting every one of them. She's been especially productive against conference opponents. In four games against A-10 opponents Orlando amassed five total goals for 10 points, including two multi-goal games.

In the Owls' (3-9, 3-1 A-10) UMass will see a team that outlets the ball well and can have multiple scoring threats. Forward Charise Young leads Temple in goals with eight and also has seven assists

Republican candidates pay top dollar to put faces on

By Mary Ann Akers
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — John McCain's makeup is right out of "American Idol." Running mate Sarah Palin's is so "No You Think You Can Dance" — but much more expensive.

McCain's September payments of $8,672.55 to "American Idol" make-up artist Tifanie White, who has also worked on the reality dance show "So You Think You Can Dance," are a drop in the bucket on the campaign's beautification front compared to the GOP vice presidential nominee.

Palin's traveling make-up artist is Amy Strozzi, who was nominated for an Emmy Award for her work as head of makeup on "So You Think You Can Dance." Strozzi was paid $13,200 by the McCain-Palin campaign last month alone, according to the campaign's latest financial disclosure report filed this week.

That's $4,527.45 more than McCain's make-up artist made last month. The 72-year-old Arizona senator, who has prominent scars from battling cancer, requires more work than does the more naturally telegenic 44-year-old Palin.

Strozzi, whose first name is misspelled as "Ami" in the campaign's financial report, is listed as doing "communications consulting" work. But two sources close to the campaign tell washington-post.com's Sleuth columnist that Strozzi is Palin's make-up artist.

They also describe Strozzi as "Goth" and "punk."

Politico has reported that the Republican Party shelled out $150,000 at luxury stores like Neiman Marcus and Saks Fifth Avenue to clothe and accessorize the vice presidential nominee.

The McCain campaign isn't skimping on make-up for public appearances. It reportedly hired top notch make-up artists for the candidates.

Concert mourns students lost in blaze last October

By Josh Dawsey
The Daily Gamecock (U. South Carolina)

One year following the Ocean Isle Beach fire that tragically killed seven South Carolinians, members of the University of South Carolina and Clemson University families came together for a concert at Five Points in Columbia, S.C., Thursday night to remember, grieve and most importantly, to celebrate the lives of brothers and sisters lost in the fire.

Ellison Neese, the president of Sigma Alpha Epsilon, said it's good to reflect a year later.

"A year after the tragedy, its time to celebrate how great these people truly were," the third-year biology student said. "If they were here, they'd be here with us celebrating."

University President Harris Pastides said the concert hit just the right note.

"I looked upon the crowd of students tonight and saw deep respect in their eyes," Pastides said. "I know everyone is here for the right reason, and that's to remember the seven students that were lost in the fire."

Through the tragedy, students resiliently made the best of the situation, Neese said.

Last year, more than $34,000 was raised for a scholarship fund to honor the victims, and prior to this year's concert, students raised almost $15,000 by selling remembrance T-shirts. The concert also raised more money for the fund.

"Our students came together better than I could have ever imagined," Neese said.

Keith Griffin, the first recipient of the remembrance scholarship, said the lasting legacy of the members would live on through him and others.

"I am more than humbled to receive this scholarship in their honor," Griffin said.

Trying to shake their sadness, many friends and family members of the lost students shared their best memories.

Lauren Mahon's best friend, Amanda Palacio, joined many of her other friends at the concert to remember the many memories they shared with her.

"She had a broken door on her car one time, and I remember her driving down I-385 holding her door on the car with one hand while driving with another," the second-year international business student said. "We shared so many good times."

Cassidy Pendley's friend, Brittany Bowers, said Pendley's spirit made playing soccer and taking classes with her always pleasurable.

"She would always have a funny story to tell about her weekend," the second-year civil engineering student said. "She always lightened everyone's mood."

But for the families of the students lost, it was hard to celebrate.

"This is so hard for me," Frank Dielaski, the grandfather of Justin Anderson, said. "He was my best buddy."

Pam Brennan, a Charlotte resident, was a family friend of Travis Cale. Her memories of Cale date back to his early childhood.

"We've known him forever," Brennan said. "He went to all the football games with us. It was a family affair."

Hot cups to heat couples

Drinks said to warm

By Denise Gellene
Los Angeles Times

Hot cups of coffee are said to warm more than the belly according to a recent study.

Looking to improve your romantic odds? Get your date a cup of steaming coffee.

That's the implication of a new study from researchers who wanted to see if there's any connection between physical and emotional heat.

To their surprise, they found that people who held a cup of hot coffee for 10 to 25 seconds warmed up to a perfect stranger. Holding a cup of iced coffee had the opposite effect.

If you want to make a good impression, advised University of Colorado psychologist and study author Lawrence E. Williams, a cup of fresh coffee "may bias the situation in your favor."

The study, published Friday in the journal Science, is the latest to show how physical properties such as distance or temperature can unconsciously influence emotional reactions. In a previous experiment, for example, people who were asked to plot remote points on a graph expressed distant feelings about relatives afterward.

"Our mental processes are not separate and detached from the body," said John A. Bargh, a Yale University psychologist and co-author of the current study.

The study raises the potential for manipulation beyond matters of the heart. Williams said it was not hard to envision marketers using warm cookies to make connections with customers — and prime them to buy.

By the same token, Bargh said, shoppers who want to resist pushy salespeople could improve their chances by carrying an icy can of soda in their pocket.

But when it comes to personal relationships, researchers said, a hot beverage can't always overcome awkward habits and distasteful traits.

"If I had a nice warm cup of coffee with Adolf Hitler, I'm still not going to like him," Bargh said.

In the latest study, a lab worker asked each of 41 subjects to hold a cup of warm coffee or iced coffee. They were then asked to rate the personality of an unidentified person whom researchers described as "skillful, industrious, determined, practical and cautious."

People who had held warm coffee gave the stranger an average score of 4.7 on a 7-point scale, warmer than the average score of 4.3 from people who had held iced coffee.

In a second experiment, a lab worker asked 53 participants to evaluate either a heated or a frozen therapeutic pad. After completing that task, the subjects were told they could choose as a reward either a cold drink for themselves or ice cream they could share with someone or visa versa. Of the people who handled the hot pad, 54 percent chose the gift to share with a friend and 46 percent picked a reward for themselves. Among those who touched the cold pad, 25 percent selected the gift to share, and 75 percent chose the item for themselves.

"Physical warmth can make us see others as warmer people, but can also cause us to be warmer — more generous and trusting — as well," Bargh said.

Researchers said the association between temperature and emotional warmth begins in infancy, when the physical warmth of being held is connected to food, safety and love. Later in life, a cup of hot coffee or a warm bath might activate memories of those feelings, they said.

and College Life (MCCL).

"Transgender people are beginning to get the recognition they haven't in the past," said Jacobus. "In the last five years we've seen more awareness, yet we're still in the beginning stages of informing people of the challenges that transgender students face."

At an all-female school like Mt. Holyoke, the change from one gender to another is more challenging than for those who attend a co-ed school, stated Jacobus.

However, she said, "Mt. Holyoke still views people who make the transition from female to male on campus as a Mt. Holyoke student."

McCall, along with senior and co-chair of in* TOUCH Emily Myer, believes that having Lurie on campus will show the importance of the issue of transgender students. Both are not looking to alter the views of any students on campus about transgender individuals, only to provide people with new information and a better understanding of what transgender and transsexual mean.

"I don't think it [the session] will necessarily affect the views of anyone. It might, however, solidify some already based knowledge on the subject and push people in Mt. Holyoke to think about issues they have not previously thought about," said Myer.

"This isn't to sway people or change people's views," said McCall. "It's just to let people know there are transgender students on campus and what it's like to be transgender. This is not a political event, it's more of an educational event."

Lurie's interactive session is free and open to the public. All are encouraged to attend.

Amherst Club members pose at the ABC House's walk recently. It was the 40th anniversary of the event.

Hawkins said.

Since it was the 40th anniversary of the event, the current ABC house board gave historical context by introducing Frank W. Anderson, one of the founders of the program that started in 1968 in Amherst. Anderson gave vivid details of the conversations, meetings and initial idea of the fundraiser walk that lead to the founding and continual success of the ABC.

Anderson talked about a conversation that he had with Rev. David King about creating a community outreach program for the church. A seven-member board wanted to bring the ABC program to Amherst, so they visited Dartmouth, N.H., where the program was running since 1965. According to Robinson, this program was too big for the church to take on, so they made it a community-wide program.

"That's how ABC started. I was the first treasurer, very easy job because we had no money," Anderson said.

Anderson connected hiking activities he had with his children to the fundraising walk.

"Walk for raising money and teaching our youngsters more about nature and the outdoors. You may thank me for the walk you just had because that's where it was started," Anderson said.

Jonathan Urena, a UMass junior and member of the Sigma Lambda Beta Fraternity Inc., said the group enjoyed itself and is looking forward to next year's walk.

Shaiana Nuñez, a junior and vice president of Boricuas Unidos, said, "I enjoyed the walk; the turn out was pretty good. I like it because I feel like everything is geared to helping girls out, but this one is good to see that they are doing things for boys."

police department to be under finance and administration on university campuses. Being under Student Affairs gives the impressions that they are there for the protection and policing of one group."

Holub took the UMPD into consideration as well, though he has not heard any praises or complaints yet.

"When I spoke to the chief, she said that she thought it was a good move," said Holub, "but I haven't heard from any individual police officers."

As for the UMPD, the move has not affected anyone just yet.

"I know very little about our move to Administration and Finance to be quite frank," said Patrick Archbald, Deputy Chief of Administration. "It is so early in the process."

A larger concern might be how the move will be taken by the Office of Administration and Finance, and Holub thinks that the transition will go smoothly.

"It will be an additional responsibility for that unit, but they will get the additional funding," said Holub. "That part should be clean because the UMPD is a self-contained unit."

The move of the UMPD is expected to be an easy one, and there should be no additional costs. It addresses both the students who asked for the move in the General Student Strike last fall and the administration that wants UMass to be competitive with other institutions by organizing departments in a similar way.

Google helps users stanch drunk e-mails

By Jash Adams
The Post (Athens, Ohio)

ATHENS, Ohio — In a world where communication is 24/7 and a drunken message can turn into a social war, one e-mail provider is trying to stop the late night e-oops.

The new feature added to Google's Gmail on Oct. 6, was named Mail Goggles after beer goggles, which simulate the way things appear to someone intoxicated. The feature is intended to stop drunk or tired messaging late at night.

When activated, Mail Goggles asks five math questions which must be answered correctly within 60 seconds. The difficulty level of the questions is adjustable and can be set to levels one through five.

Jacqueline Jones, an Ohio University sophomore studying journalism, said although she's never sent or received e-mails while drunk, she often receives late night text messages from her ex-boyfriend.

"I send a lot of text messages (when drinking), but I have a spell checker so people think I'm in the perfect state of mind, she said. "So that feature for my cell phone would definitely be nice."

Like all experimental Gmail Lab features, Mail Goggles was created because of customer requests and the personal experiences of Google staff.

"Sometimes I send messages I shouldn't send. Gmail can't always prevent you from sending messages you might later regret, but ... Mail Goggles may help," said Jon Perlow, the Google engineer who created Mail Goggles, on the Official Gmail Blog.

Drunk e-mailing is not something Kiersten Bonifant, a sophomore studying visual communication, turns to when she wants to communicate.

"I have probably IMed or Facebooked, but I have never e-mailed," Bonifant said. "I can't imagine signing into my e-mail and drunk e-mailing."

Adrienne Haparowicz, a sophomore studying visual communications, said the consequences of drunken e-mailing, Facebook messaging or texting are normally easily resolved.

"It's all right in the morning. It's usually embarrassing, but fixable," she said.

But e-mail lacks many clues people gain from face-to-face or voice-to-voice communication such as tone, inflection and gestures, which can lead to conflict, said Tom Daniels, a communications professor at OU.

"We have some pretty good evidence that e-mail exchanges make it easier for conflicts to emerge and those conflicts are harder to manage in that environment," Daniels said.

He added that a feature like Mail Goggles isn't capable of solving all the conflicts instant communication can cause.

"There's a point at which it's time to log out of the email and have a face-to-face conversation," Daniels said. "E-mail is not the place to deal with complex problems, yet many of us use the medium to do precisely that."

UMass quiet on One

Nick O'Malley

If the past activities of students on campus have shown anything, it's that students oppose the raising of fees above all other things. The University can crack down on security and spend our money as it pleases, just as long as it doesn't delve deeper into our wallets.

College students hate spending money, especially when it's more than they used to spend. However, one particular financial issue has not garnered much attention on campus. That is, of course, is Question 1 on the Massachusetts ballot this November.

For those who don't know, Question 1 is a proposal to eliminate the state income tax in Massachusetts. At first, this seems like a great idea. Everyone loves fewer taxes.

However, the issue of Question 1 goes far beyond what the residents of Massachusetts pay — particularly those who attend college. The state income tax is one of the states most significant pipelines for funding. Without the income tax, the state budget takes an enormous hit.

From that state budget comes a number of things. Police and fire departments, and healthcare and public education are just a few of the things that will take enormous hits if Question 1 is passed.

At first glance, the state income tax would not seem to be a large issue with college students, as few students have substantial incomes. This may be true, but, upon close observation, the implications of Question 1 are far greater for the students at the University of Massachusetts than anywhere else.

UMass is a public school. Regardless of how prestigious our administration attempts to make it appear, the school draws much of its funding from the state. Therefore, with the cut of the income tax in Massachusetts, UMass would take an enormous cut in funding. And with a cut in funding, the school's revenue source would become none other than students.

University's life is at stake with this question, but no one is talking about it.

Although budget cuts are not out of the ordinary, this period in American history is. We are in the middle of one of the worst economic crises this country has seen in decades. UMass has recently gone through a multi-million dollar budget cut and the role of public education at the college level seems to be dwindling.

The University's life is at stake with this question, but no one is talking about it.

UMass is the very school that was host to a student strike because of, above other things, the rising cost of going to school here. Yet, in the face of a potential fee raise, the response has been non-existent.

There is a good deal of buzz on campus on the topic of Question 2, the decriminalization of marijuana, and the presidential election. However, this campus has much more at stake in this election than in any other.

UMass is subject to the whims of the Massachusetts state budget. We live and die by what the state treasury deems us worths of taking. With a cut in public funding, combined with the current cuts, the cost of going to school in Amherst would skyrocket.

In the current economic situation, going to college is hard enough. I am an in-state student who gets financial aid and I am still ravaged by this school's fees every year. The issue is only amplified when out of state students are taken into consideration. With rates the way they are, a number of students would need to drop out of school due to financial reasons. This is a school that wants to improve its image, and the only way UMass has been able to attract the nation's top students is with the low cost of a public school. If UMass' rates are raised to that of the rest of the pack, our school loses its edge in the admissions department.

We're already paying an arm and a leg to attend college, but with Question 1, there remains a possibility that could be paying more. The real question is, why isn't anyone noticing?

The (un)Christian right

Ben Moriarty

I feel like such an idiot, and for someone who feels like an idiot a lot, this shouldn't be affecting me so much. But it is. I have wasted the past couple years of my life.

There are many things I have wasted in that time, like opportunities to be proactive regarding my future, doing my schoolwork and making friends, but something even worse happened. I have been wrong in my religious beliefs.

To think that it took me years to come to the right conclusion makes me miserable. It makes me even more miserable when I realize I could have had it so much easier being part of the religious right.

I would have been free from a lot of stress. No longer would I have been frustrated that people thought poor communities could miraculously rid themselves of their poverty, noting they'd never get a dollar from me or my taxes. No longer would I have had to worry about not having life's necessities, and I wouldn't have minded that Iraqis were being killed.

Why? Well, for the Iraqis, it's God's will. Just ask Sarah Palin. She understands that the Iraq War is a task from God.

"Blessed are the peacemakers."

That means we Americans are blessed. If it weren't for us, there would be thousands more human beings and thousands more Iraqi women and children alive, trying to kill us because of our freedom. Now, we don't have to worry about that. It's a more peaceful world without these children. We have fulfilled the latter part of the verse: being peacemakers, we are now "the children of God."

We can only thank the brave men and women currently in the armed forces, for without them, we wouldn't have the freedom and peace we have. We should have been attacked by Mexico or Canada, or someone like that. Maybe even Dubai. Maybe we even would have had to break the Proverb stating God hates "hands that shed innocent blood." Luckily, we haven't had to because these patriots only bomb those who are trying to kill us and our freedoms — no innocents. In fact, because of what these brave men and women have done to ensure our peace via bullets and bravery, God gave us a gift, of A bot of a Aud a lot of really original bumper-stickers.

Needless to say, I now fully hate (social) ists. And communists. And anyone that's not a capitalist. I know I'm not supposed to hate, but I have a feeling that if God is on my side for war, he must be in this case as well.

Socialism is full of non-Christian evils. Like providing for everyone, not having homeless people, making sure everyone has a doctor …

I wonder what would happen if our Christian nation went to war with the Orthodox Christian nation of Russia? God Bless America, but God Don't Bless Them.

Socialism is full of non-Christian evils like providing for everyone, not having homeless people, making sure everyone has a doctor … making sure there aren't starving children – God, if God wanted that, wouldn't he have made it clear?

Did you know that Jesus was the son of a lowly carpenter? He, despite being God, became a carpenter himself, making it a point that we should strive to serve and give to others instead of seeking riches for ourselves by removing all earthly passions, and said "what you do unto the least of them, you do unto me," clarifying that everyone, even the poorest or the worst, is still the image of God. So, by lacking love and shrugging them off, you shrug off God.

Obama and his 'Robin-Hood' taxes. He's the most un-Christian sounding politician I've ever seen! How dare he tell the rich, who got what they got earnestly, that they can't live lavishly? This is a Christian nation. Why, in Hell's name, should I pay taxes to support wasteful social programs like welfare? Living on welfare is a dream.

This is a Christian nation!

It's not. Not because the founding fathers weren't, but because the religious right Christians we have aren't Christian at all. It's not too hard to notice that self-idolatrous ideology, seeking worldly honor and respect rather than humility and love, is not Christian. Christ's love, the love that says even if you know someone put themselves in the worst situation, you should still help them, is not the love the religious right has. Their love is 'tough luck, shouldn't have made mistakes. Why should I pay for your help? Fix it yourself!'

I'm not advocating subscribing to this worldview, but I am advocating not saying you're a Christian if you don't.

Go on, keep saying "God Bless America." Hopefully it helps.

Politics at the dinner table

Paul Payer

Mark your calendars. In a months' time, most of us will be settling down at a crowded table of food and family members to celebrate our thanks and gratefulness for the advent of the Christmas shopping season.

The process will be the same as each year past, somebody will complain that the turkey is too dry, you will field equally dry questions about your semester at the University of Massachusetts, and of course the family's outspoken political activist uncle or cousin will usher in some variety of uncomfortable political conversation. Given the fresh taste of defeat or victory from the results of the presidential election, the normal political rancor will be more evident than in past years.

It shouldn't be surprising. Political polarization always reaches new heights during election seasons, and it seems this cycle has been no exception. News reports have been flooded by allegations of negative campaigning and underhanded tactics by the McCain campaign, and the Obama campaign would likely have been guilty of engaging in similar attacks had they not enjoyed such a sizable lead in the polls throughout the campaign (the last count has Obama leading in every battleground state, and by eight points overall in the national polls.) These attacks are no different than previous efforts during past campaigns, but continuity is not an antidote for disgust.

And frankly, I'm disgusted with the constant partisan racket on both sides of the aisle.

When the McCain campaign attempts to portray their opponent as "palling around with terrorists," it does no good for America as a whole. Conversely, although Obama has largely been able to avoid negative campaigning due to his position as frontrunner, he has been guilty of warping on quick sound bytes made by McCain for political points and promoting a McCain victory as an endorsement of a Bush third term (which in reality is a bit unfair.)

Personal attacks and overgeneralizations based on sound bytes do nothing but dilute the issues and importance of this election. Politicians understand this, and they continue these actions because they are politically profitable. Simplifying the issues and providing media sound bytes gets votes. Analytical and comprehensive discussion of issues get digested as overly complicated intellectual nonsense. Just search YouTube for John Kerry's 2004 presidential foreign policy debate against George W. Bush for clear evidence of that phenomenon.

All this partisanship goes far beyond the candidates and talking heads on cable news; it invades our campus, friendships and family life.

Polarization gets out the vote. It gets people motivated, excited and mobilized. In small quantities it may not be a bad thing, as it is an effective tool to rally the base, but it has become a large scale tool to rally the entire country behind a political party or individual candidate. In this regard, it has only succeeded at dividing Americans on pivotal issues which would likely have been resolved through consensus and bipartisanship.

Take the issue of abortion. Republicans have long used the issue as a perennial electoral rallying cry against the evil liberal establishment which seeks only to conquer power in Washington D.C. and mandate that Planned Parenthood centers be placed in every middle school nationwide. Republicans have a vested political interest in maintaining outrage over the issue, and potential for actual progress on the issue is set aside in favor of political grandstanding. Productive measures could be reached to reduce the need for abortion by improving education resources, contraception availability, services to young single mothers, etc., but a sense of bipartisanship and collective effort would have to be present for such progress to be made. Unfortunately, those sentiments are clearly absent within the current political landscape.

All this partisanship goes far beyond the candidates and talking heads on cable news; it invades our campus, friendships and family life. As a political science major, I love to discuss politics and current events, but whenever the topic arises I have to bite my tongue and look around to see who I'm talking to. It's not much of an enjoyable sight to watch friendly conversations turn to arguments over why somebody's friend is now a communist seeking socialist revolution because they find Obama's tax plan appealing.

I once had a college professor spend about 15 minutes in class discussing how to approach and discuss the issue of global warming when sitting down for Thanksgiving dinner. The advice centered upon essentially explaining to the uneducated (read: conservative) members of the family the enlightening concepts of environmentalism.

The suggestions reeked of partisan language and a philosophy of "you are completely wrong and must completely adopt my view." One must ask themselves what benefit this type of politics really serves. Political expression and discourse is a cornerstone of our democracy, but when it devolves to partisan bickering and arguing, it only serves to undermine the values of democracy and free thought.

For voters, back to basics

Eric Magazu

For many people who engage in a discussion of public policy as a hobby or even as a field of study, the topic of the day is certainly the upcoming presidential election. Everyone is busily debating whether Barack Obama has a secret connection to a terrorist cell, or whether John McCain is going to lower taxes across the board. However, it seems that most of us miss what is truly important. We fail to see the essential issues that impact our communities and our nation.

Aspiring politicians often talk about social issues. The concept that there is a distinct list of platform points that should be considered social issues originated with political pundits. This idea is not so unreasonable, because pundits view these ethical issues as containing a subset of other issues.

Commentators perhaps understand social issues to consist of the discussion of the value of life in the womb, the question as to whether society ought to preserve natural marriage and other policy topics similar to these. In reality, our first principles and the moral code that shapes our view of the world lie at the heart of every issue.

Followers of politics place a lot of emphasis on achieving an electoral victory for their candidate or political party. They may see an upcoming election as the critical one that will shape whether things go right or wrong in the next four years. However, I will assert that they do not seek these things rightly.

In America, we have a government that we earned for ourselves. When we look around at the way things are in our day, it is clear that it is not a new election that is needed. The problem is in each one of us and in each of our localities. It is in the loss of not only the connectedness of our local communities, but also in the warmth of our neighborhoods, in the importance of our families and in the preservation of our civic institutions and assemblies of worship.

When we look around toward the way things are in our day, it is not a new election that is needed, but the problem is in each one of us and in each of our localities.

Traditions that used to be passed down from generation to generation are no longer the norm. The wisdom that parents of the past taught diligently to their children in the home, and to those children as they grew older, is no longer taken seriously. The ethos of questioning authority at all turns has become casual and acceptable.

Barring recent financial woes, we have quite a bit of prosperity as nation, but our soul is lacking. It is in the fundamentals of family, tradition and community that we find what is most essential to restoring a proper order. If our principles are lacking, elections will carry little meaning. There are indeed external factors that do contribute to the unfortunate aspects of the world of today, but it is up to us to redeem these factors.

The cultural values taught by the show business industry, which come into our homes through our television sets, need to go. Hollywood teaches that pleasure is the fundamental aim of man, but reality shows that if man makes pleasure his central aim in life, the end is chaos. In a time and place of television values, we need to look to our forefathers and seek the wisdom that has been gained in past years. We need to stick to these principles instead of the principles of Hollywood and hold fast to them.

We need to restore the primary of faith and morals in our public schools. Our ancestors knew that a moral code is the central pillar in the education of both children and adults. Today we seem to think education is about savoir faire. "Know-how" – but this is not right. If we seek to be a materialistic people, then we would make the teaching of useful skills central to the education of children. However, we do this with the knowledge that this path only leads to destruction.

Parents need to assume a central role in the affairs of their children. It is not safe to rely upon other people to care rightly for them. Parents must consistently convey and reinforce the values they wish to teach. To aid in this effort, local communities must not fear enforcing the shared values of the society, in order to ensure that one problem area does not spread and subsequently undermine the entire integrity of community life.

We must look first and foremost at ourselves, because the evil that we see in the outside has its roots within ourselves. When we are able to defeat the tendency toward evil, it almost matters little what the remainder of world is doing. We will simply fail to be affected by it. It is then that we will be ready to covenant with God and up to each other to uphold these laws.

If we follow this just path, it can be well assured that in the future we will see many excellent candidates elected to higher office. The suspense of Election Day will be mitigated because we will know that, come what may, we'll have a strong leadership that shares our values.

The Winterpills played their newest album, "Central Chambers," in its entirety on Saturday night, while throwing in a few older songs, to a packed crowd.

Winterpills bang out new tunes in NoHo

Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON – Playing to a sold out crowd, the Winterpills captured the hearts and ears of the Iron Horse Music Hall this past Saturday, as they premiered their newest album "Central Chambers."

The awning for "Central Chambers Reality Trust" presided over a line of loyal listeners, who came out in spite of the rain to support their favorite local act. The business, which is located next to the Iron Horse, served to further root the band in their hometown.

Opening the show was folk rock duo KaiserCartel, made up of Brooklyn musicians Courtney Kaiser and Benjamin Cartel.

Their nine-song set was filled with delicately woven harmonies, presented amidst Cartel's controlled but expressive drumming and Kaiser's tender strums.

Each song required a slight change in instrumentation, with Cartel often switching between drums and acoustic guitar, and Kaiser alternating between her guitar and a series of small, percussive instruments. Many of the songs were taken from the album "March Forth," released earlier this year.

They completed the set with a wandering serenade, delivered to the audience for a more intimate performance.

Before leaving the stage, Kaiser professed her adoration for the Winterpills, admitting, "We've had two of their CDs in our car stereo since we've know them. And it's been a long time."

Phillip Price, followed by Flora Reed and the rest of the Winterpills, took the stage and opened their performance with "Everything," the first song off of "Central Chambers."

"This is our hometown show," said Price with a genuine grin, proceeding to perform several songs from their two previous albums. The audience showed its approval with a rowdy round of cheers and shouts of native pride.

Krueger's history and future explored

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Staff

It's face launched a thousand nightmares.

Freddy Krueger, the cackling, demonic, razor-gloved stalker of the "Nightmare on Elm Street" franchise, has kept busy over the last two decades preying on the dreams of hapless teens. For nine films and one brief television series, he struck terror in the hearts of audiences and insomniacs alike.

Freddy first appeared in Wes Craven's 1984 film, "A Nightmare on Elm Street." Already notorious for cult films like "The Last House on the Left" and "The Hills Have Eyes," Craven was inspired to write "Nightmare" by a series of articles featured in the Los Angeles Times.

The articles described the deaths of three young Cambodian men. Before dying, each had complained of having terrible nightmares. Although urged to rest, the men resisted for days, claiming there was something unnatural about their dreams. The men finally capitulated, only to die in their sleep.

"It struck me as such an incredibly dramatic story," said Craven in a recent interview with HollywoodGothique.com. "I was intrigued by it for a year, at least, before I finally thought I should write something about this kind of situation."

Craven also drew inspiration from his childhood. An elementary school bully would lend Krueger his name. Freddy's dirty brown fedora was selected because it reminded Craven of a wino who had frightened him as a child.

Freddy terrorizes the fictional town of Springwood, Ohio, murdering local children inside his boiler room. He's eventually brought to trial but the case is thrown out.

Enraged, the parents of Springwood set fire to the boiler room with Freddy trapped inside. He carries out his revenge from beyond the grave, returning post-mortem in the nightmares of their children to stalk and prey again.

Heather Langenkamp stars as the original heroine of the series. Her nightmares take her to the site of an old boiler room. There, between the steaming pipes, lurks a man. He's cloaked in darkness, save for the glimmer of his razor claws. Panic fills the air as he scrapes them against the walls, calling her name, edging closer and closer. She wakes in a cold sweat nightly. It's only a dream, she assures herself, until her friends start dying.

Johnny Depp makes his silver screen debut in the original "Nightmare." He's eaten by a bed. The bed later erupts, his blood spewing out by the gallons. Actress Amanda Wyss is dragged across a bedroom ceiling, the first character in the Kruegerscape to be slashed apart on-screen by that infamous glove. Both Depp and Wyss' scenes were shot in a rotating room.

Craven would later step away from the series, handing over the reins of the franchise to New Line Cinema. Although Craven returned in 1987 for "Dream Warriors," and again in 1994 for "New Nightmare," successive films pulled away from the macabre origins of the original. Under New Line's creative direction, Freddy morphed from grisly killer to comic antihero, badly punning his way through each and every massacre.

"Here's your big break in TV!" he exclaims, before offing a wannabe actress in the common room of her hospital dwellings. Fans have long argued that the original "Nightmare" is the best of the franchise. Others may have more fun watching the third installment, "Dream Warriors."

The film hones in on the last of the "Elm Street children," the offspring of those who torched Krueger in the boiler room all those years ago. Now committed to a psychiatric ward ("what do you mean there's some guy in your dreams trying to kill you? You're nuts!"), the teens ban together in order to fend off Krueger for good.

"Dream Warriors" keeps terror potent by holding Freddy captive on the sidelines as a malevolent force, still maiming and terrorizing for horror's sake. An ex-junkie meets a notably nasty end, her track marks morphing into hungry mouths as Freddy administers a lethal injection. A puppeteer has tendons torn from his limbs, and is then led through the halls and up the stairs of the hospital, to a balcony ledge. For these reasons – and for its killer Dokken soundtrack – "Dream Warriors" is a franchise stand out.

Other entries fail to deliver greater scares. "Freddy's Revenge," the 1985 follow-up to the original, is forgettable fodder, interesting only for a scene where Freddy rips his way through the body of a human host. "Dream Master" (1988) and "Dream Child" (1989) are heavily formulaic, Freddy now the rapping, jesting, washed-up demon comedian of nightmares.

In "Freddy's Dead: The Final Nightmare" (1991) Freddy has bigger problems to worry about. He's become a virulent figure in Springwood, no longer bound in consecrated ground or reined in by the efforts of an all-powerful dream master. But over the years, his dream world rampages have bled the teen population dry. Now only one teen remains. What's Freddy to do?

"Final Nightmare" is an interesting idea, but fans are advised to skip ahead to Wes Craven's "New Nightmare." The 1994 sequel isn't canon to the original series, set in "real world" Hollywood as opposed to familiar Springwood. But Freddy gets an eerie, Hans Christian Andersen type re-imagining that's worth checking out. In a throwback to the original film, a girl gets slashed while being dragged across a ceiling. Langenkamp also returns.

Several years mark the difference between the release of "New Nightmare" and 2003's "Freddy vs. Jason." The latter is a face-off between slasher titans. Jason Voorhees, the hockey-faced madman of the "Friday the 13th" series, squares off against Freddy in a no-holds-barred showdown that leaps from the nightmare realm to Jason's Camp Crystal Lake stomping grounds. Made about a decade too late, "Freddy vs. Jason" is a blood-splattered carnival ride of thrills and chills.

Plans to return Freddy to the silver screen have been set in motion again. Platinum Dunes, the great recycler of the horror movie industry, is currently at work on a remake of the original "Nightmare on Elm Street." Dunes, which is also owned by Michael Bay ("Transformers") has the film slated for theatrical release in 2010.

In a bout of controversial casting, Billy Bob Thornton edged out Robert Englund to gain the part of Freddy in the new release. Scary? Maybe. Scarier still is the idea that Michael Bay will be on hand to help ensemble the "Nightmare" remake.

Cure for consumer economy

By David Lazarus
Los Angeles Times

It's a statistic we hear time and again: Consumer spending accounts for more than two-thirds of the U.S. economy. It was the reason President Bush famously (or infamously) urged Americans shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to keep shopping and "get down to Disney World in Florida."

Take that, Osama!

"Our whole economy is designed to convince people that they want more," said David Colander, an economics professor at Middlebury College in Vermont. "Nobody is asking the big question: How much of a consumer society do we really want to be?"

Since the end of World War II, consumer spending consistently has represented more than 60 percent of U.S. gross domestic product, according to the Commerce Department. That measure reached 70 percent in 2002 and is now almost 71 percent.

U.S. retail sales fell in September for the third straight month -- the first time this has happened since the government started tracking such data in 1992. The holiday shopping season is expected to be the worst in years. But some forecasters are predicting that spending will pick up by the middle of next year as consumers shake off the recession blues.

Colander said Americans' buy-buy-buy mentality wouldn't be troubling if it were accompanied by a higher savings rate and lower borrowing. But that's not the case.

We set aside precious little -- the savings rate is now almost 3 percent after sticking close to 1 percent for the last three years -- and we're carrying nearly $2.6 trillion in nonmortgage consumer debt.

Meanwhile, much of what we buy comes from other countries, while those nations lend not to buy as much of our stuff. The U.S. trade deficit topped $700 billion last year.

Weinstein execs heading out the door

BY PATRICK GOLDSTEIN
L.A. TIMES

HOLLYWOOD — It's gotten to the point where if you have a movie with the Weinstein Co., you need to have your agent phoning Exhibitor Relations every morning to see if your film's still coming out.

Even worse, you can't be sure who'll be handling the company's acquisition, marketing or production either. As the Hollywood Reporter noted Wednesday, a host of top Weinstein execs are jumping ship. The company's co-heads of acquisitions and production left recently. They will now be joined by the company's production president, a senior vice president of production and a top marketing executive, who are either heading out the door or leaving shortly.

Now there's a movie exodus as well, at least from the company's end-of-year slate of pictures. The Viggo Mortensen-starring adaptation of "The Road" has been bumped into next year. Our sources say a number of other movies are suffering the same fate, led by "Crossing Over," a Harrison Ford-starring drama that was expecting to contend for award-season plaudits. It's been pushed out of 2008, much to the dismay of its star. The company has also once again bumped "Killshot," a Mickey Rourke-starring film that has had as many release dates as there are colleges attended by Gov. Sarah Palin.

The company has also backed off from December release dates for "Fanboys" and "Shanghai," a John Cusack-starring drama that had been slated for a Christmas release in New York and L.A.

So what is going on? The movies only reinforce the rampant speculation inside the industry that the Weinstein Co. is running low, low, low on money. Weinstein execs have been informing talent reps that its end-of-the-year schedule was too crowded to release all the films, but now that any possible logjam has been cleared, you have to wonder what the latest explanation will be.

Luckily, I managed to get Harvey Weinstein on the phone, and he had an answer for everything. He contends that all the late-breaking moves are simply ways for the company to take advantage of various marketing, promotion and scheduling opportunities. Here's his take:

"Fanboys": Weinstein says the movie has been moved to January "so we can do a major promotion with Comcast, who's arranging for a big advertising tie-in for us on the film."

"Crossing Over": "We're moving it to January," Weinstein says. "The market is just too crowded. Every week there are five more movies coming out. It's too crazy. Spring is much better — there are a lot more wide-open dates. The most important thing is to do well by the movie. Having it out in January gives us the opportunity to play the film at the Sundance and Berlin film festivals, which will be a big help to the movie."

"Killshot": "Everyone has said that Mickey Rourke is amazing in 'The Wrestler' and will be up for all sorts of awards, so we decided to move 'Killshot' to a date a few weeks before the Oscars," Weinstein says. "That way we can capitalize on all the heat that's going to be around Mickey."

"Shanghai": "It just couldn't be ready in time. The movie wasn't finished shooting until August, and the director, Mikael Hafstrom, doesn't even deliver his cut until early November. He doesn't want it out now, and neither do we. He needs time to make it as great as possible."

That means that after "Zack and Miri Make a Porno" hits theaters next weekend, the Weinstein brothers aren't distributing another film themselves until "The Reader" at year's end. Harvey Weinstein insists it will be worth the wait. He believes that all the buzz about his money woes will blow over after people see how some of these pictures perform in the marketplace.

I hope he's right. There's no one I'd rather talk movie talk with than Harvey. But there's no getting around the fact that his credibility in Hollywood today is at an all-time low. As one agent said to me recently, "Whenever I'm tempted to take a project to Harvey, I lie down and take a nap and hope that when I wake up I'm sober again."

"Zach and Miri Make a Porno" looks to be the last film that the Weinstein Company releases until "The Reader" in December.

What people want and need

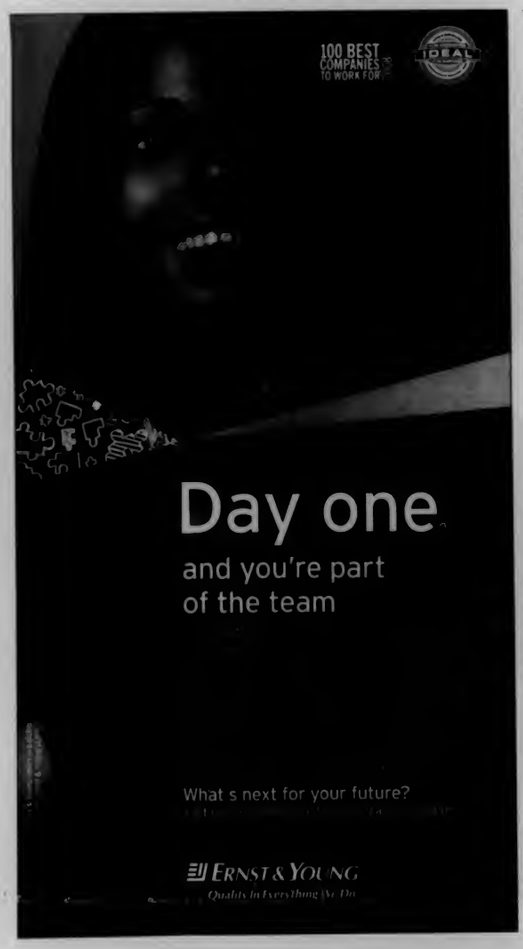
an economist at Iowa State University who focuses on consumer behavior. "It's in our culture to spend a lot, and it has been for a long time. It would be a significant change if Americans suddenly decided all that spending was bad."

Such a cultural shift would entail a wholesale reinvention of how we do business, and almost certainly would result in numerous companies either cutting back or folding. Millions of people could be thrown out of work.

"It would be like a perfect storm for the retail industry," O'Brien said.

A more likely scenario, she said, is a gradual shift of values, with Americans putting greater emphasis on "green" products and businesses, and on no longer spending what we don't have. This transition would favor companies that make things people genuinely need as opposed to what people want. It would entail a newfound emphasis on long-term satisfaction rather than instant gratification.



"Can a green economy be America's next driving force?" O'Brien asked. "The potential is there, but it requires a complete change in how we look at money."

The greening of the U.S. economy won't happen any time soon, and not ever if the private sector has anything to say about it. Businesses have a lot invested in our chronic materialism.

Maybe they should embrace the current slump as an opportunity for strengthening the country's long-term health rather than a short-term hit to their bottom lines.

"We need to get the percentage lower," said Colander of Middlebury College. "Consumer spending shouldn't be this much of the economy. But it won't be easy. It will be like an addict going through withdrawal."

Many addicts embarking on recovery programs begin with the Serenity Prayer: "God, grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference."

Special teams decide match

First-period power play provides only offense in N.H.

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

DURHAM, N.H. — Two goals were scored, both on the same power play, in the Massachusetts hockey team's 1-1 overtime tie against No. 4 New Hampshire.

The teams combined for 16 penalties, totaling 11 power plays, which led to special teams determining the result of the Friday nights' game.

The Minutemen (2-1-1, 0-0-1 Hockey East) scored their goal on their first power play of the game. The play came after New Hampshire's Danny Dries was called for hitting UMass junior Will Ortiz from behind and was given a game misconduct on top his 5-minute major.

"That line was playing pretty well until Dries gets thrown out. You've got to change it up, you use three and a half lines and you use different people centering them," UNH coach Dick Umile said. "What was interesting is we did a lot of penalty killing in the second period, so you use that line with [Steve] Moses on that line as a fourth line so we kind of got through it."

Less than a minute after Dries was thrown out of the game, UNH's Thomas Fortney was called for hooking, leading to a two-man advantage for UMass. Fewer than 20 seconds later, sophomore Chase Langeraap tallied his first goal of the season.

Langeraap's goal was the second power-play goal allowed by UNH this season on 32 attempts through the end of Friday's game.

But, on the same power play, James vanRiemsdyk scored for UNH to tie the game. From that point on, neither team was able to capitalize on special teams, although there wasn't a lack of opportunity.

UMass took nine shots on its six power-play opportunities, while UNH took eight shots on its five power plays. UNH spent 29 minutes playing a man down, compared to UMass' 14 minutes on the penalty kill.

"Special teams moved the puck and had chances, but didn't really do us a lot," UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

The Minutemen have killed off the last eight of their opponent's power-play chances, but couldn't seem to capitalize on the remainder of their man-up opportunities.

"[The amount of penalties UNH is getting is] not good. We're not thrilled with it," Umile said. "I know we got too many, especially in the second period."

In the second period alone the Wildcats had four penalties, spending 8 minutes playing a man down, allowing the Minutemen to take six shots.

The Minutemen hope for more success with their special teams when they play Providence in their home opener on Halloween.

Junior goaltender Dan Meyers stopped 31 shots in Friday's 1-1 tie against No. 4 New Hampshire at the Whittemore Center in Durham, N.H. Meyers has started all four games this season for the Minutemen, recording a .948 save percentage and a 2-1-1 record.

the puck behind the net, skated back and slid it into a wide-open net uncontested.

Langeraap's power-play goal was his first of the season in only his second game back from an injury.

The UMass lead would last only minutes. At the end of Dries' 5-minute penalty, Wildcat James vanRiemsdyk deked by two UMass defenders, skated to the middle of the ice and fired a wrist shot that beat Meyers high stick side. The sophomore would also get the crowd on its feet later in the game, forcing a UMass penalty with 1:15 left in the third period.

For the next two periods the team would trade shots, penalties and shoves. The physical play started to intensify midway through the second period. Between the two teams they amounted 11 penalties, six of them coming in the second period when the physical play and frustration started to amount on both sides.

Men, women sweep Army in home meet

BY HOLLY J. GALVIN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In a first-ever dual meet sweep of Army, the Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams won their home openers 174-126 and 187-94, respectively, to even both teams' records at 1-1.

Bolstered by dominant performances from freshman Joey Shordon, an intense Minutemen squad secured the program's first victory over the Black Knights.

Often hearing pre-race chants of "Jo-ey" from teammates and onlookers, Shordon did not disappoint. He individually took home the 1,000-yard freestyle (9 minutes, 45.40 seconds), 200-yard freestyle (1:42.39) and 500-yard freestyle (4:40.68).

In a meet that saw multiple close finishes, UMass coach Russ Yarworth was happy to see Shordon step up early.

"Joey gave us a great bump to start off the day with that [1,000 free and 200 free] double," Yarworth said of the freshman's back-to-back victories. "That's honestly, in my career, one of best dual meet performances I've ever seen."

Minuteman captain Nate Bromage stressed the importance of swimming as a numbers game, summarizing the early meet as a collaborative team effort.

"Everybody got pumped up," Bromage said. "If they couldn't win the event, they were going for the seconds, the thirds, the fourths to get the points on the board."

Bromage also lauded the performances of Juan Moliere and Mike Berthaume, who teamed up to capture first place in the 200-yard medley relay with a time of 1:34.47.

Saturday's return to Joseph R. Rogers pool marked the third win in a row over Army for UMass coach Bob Newcomb's Minutewomen. Newcomb acknowledged the meet as a work in progress but commended his team's improvements.

"I'm impressed," Newcomb admitted, highlighting solid medley relay combinations in particular. "[The whole team's] performances this week were significantly better than last. We had a lot of improvement in time, race technique, walls, underwater swimming. You name it, I think we did things better."

Senior Christa Natus continued her early-season successes, placing first in the 200 freestyle (1:55.19), 200-yard butterfly (2:06.84) and on the winning 200-yard medley relay team (1:50.01).

Chelsea Downing's first collegiate meet illustrated the Minutewomen's depth as the freshman placed in two events, while sophomores Elizabeth Walsh and Meghan Nowak were also top contributors. Walsh clocked in at exactly 1 minute to capture the 100-yard backstroke, before winning the 200-yard backstroke later in the day with a time of 2:10.03.

Emotion seemed high for both squads, but Newcomb appreciated his team's ability to stay loose in a budding season.

"I commented right before the meet, I was real impressed with how loose and relaxed they were with a great warm-up," Newcomb said. "I think this team, the leadership right from the top down we've got a lot of really good things going. They just have to keep realizing that it's [only a third of the way through the season]."

On the diving board, senior Karen Epperci (227.80 1-meter dive and 248.16 3-meter dive) and Anne Fogarty (252.22 1-meter dive and 241.27 3-meter diver again split first- and second-place finishes in the 1- and 3-meter events, while senior Sarah Hortsmann placed third (221.31) in the 3-meter.

For the Minutemen, freshman Jason Cook swept the board for the second week in a row, notching first-place dives in both events (294.96 1-meter dive, 297.83 3-meter diver). UMass dominated the second and third-place slots as well, with contributions from Byron Johnson and Adam Duffield.

Both head coaches noted that heading into an upcoming two-week road trip in New York training will intensify. Newcomb stressed consistency in a work-out system that has been seeing results.

"This week we stay on track," Newcomb promised, citing past experiences where dual meet victories unintentionally encouraged slacking the next Monday. "We're not varying what we do. You can't back down."

Road losses hurt UM playoff hopes

W. SOCCER from page 10

These injuries to key players for the Minutewomen have had a direct effect on the offensive production and UMass' ability to score.

"We couldn't manufacture the goals or enough offense," Rudy said.

UMass' offensive game continued to struggle Sunday, as the Rams (10-4-2, 7-1-1 A-10) held UMass to four shots in its final road game of the season.

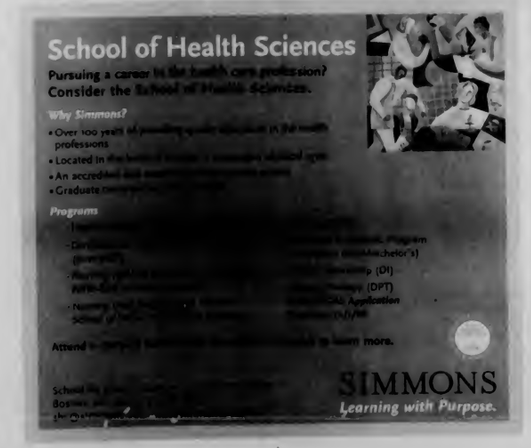
The UMass defense played to a scoreless first half, but the Rams scored three goals to get the victory.

"Fordham is a direct, physical team that has a lot of skill, and they have some kids who can crack the heck out of the ball," Rudy said.

The Rams scored two goals in six minutes, with both tallies coming from outside the box.

Rhose Island held a 5-2 advantage in corner kicks, with one being bent in the far corner of the goal past Luckey by midfielder Alexis Ribadeneyra for the second goal of the game.

"We played with them at times, but we didn't have enough fire power to keep them at bay," Rudy said.



Fordham currently sits in second place with 22 points behind a dominant Charlotte team, that will travel to Rudd Field for the Minutewomen's season finale on Nov. 2.

UMass is tied with St. Joseph's for ninth place with 10 points in the A-10. The top six qualify for the postseason tournament.

Senior Day perfect for UM

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

Although the game began with a ceremony in their honor, it was the end of Sunday's contest against Temple that the seniors on the Massachusetts field hockey team will always remember.

For the first time in their careers, seniors Katelyn Orlando, Mary Shea and Erin Parker entered a stroke-off after their match against the Owls remained tied at 1-1 after double overtime.

Going into the stroke-off, UMass coach Justine Sowry had all of the players that wanted to take one of the penalty strokes write their names down on a board.

Parker, Shea and Orlando were all on the board. And even though they had never been in this situation before, all three of them knew that they wanted to take a shot.

"We looked at each other with a little excitement," Orlando said of the seniors before they took their penalty strokes.

"It's really an individual thing, going into [the penalty stroke]," Shea said.

The two teams approached the south goal and lined up on a single line — except for Temple junior Charise Young and UMass freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdall. Young tired the first shot of the stroke-off to the right of Widdall, who rejected the shot with ease.

"When the first girl missed [her shot] I thought 'you're all right, because even if you miss you're equal to the other team at this point,'" Orlando said. "We're told to pick a spot and go for it and have it be your stroke and be used to going there."

In the second round of shots, both Temple's Kate Stewart and UMass' Jackie Iait saw their shots blocked. However, in the third round, both Parker and Temple's Kimmi Hanshue connected on their shots.

"You're supposed to have a routine, sort of like a foul shot," Parker said. "I just got up there and once I got into my motion, I just tried to push the ball into the corner as hard as I could."

After Hanshue's goal, the Owls did not find the back of the net again. Sophomore Allison Kelly's shot was blocked by Widdall and Shea's shot was sent high above Temple goalkeeper Sarah Dalrymple.

With Shea's goal, the Minutewomen clinched the stroke-off, resolving a game that was unchanged after two overtime periods. However, the win meant much more for the team's seniors on their last regular season home game.

"We've always been a team that's fought hard," Parker said. "That's what we had to do today. Temple is a tough team and it's great that we fought our way all the way to the A-10 title."

The Minutewomen have been in a number of tight games this season, but they have either lost those games or had failed to put away opponents early. Against Temple, however, UMass faced a team that had brought its best game to Amherst and produced a game that forced both teams to fight to the very end.

Before the game, the seniors were honored by their teammates and families for their contributions to the program. The emotional atmosphere of the game was evident when the seniors put the game into perspective.

"We all came in to a program that wasn't a powerhouse in the A-10 by any means, so we had to fight for every game," Orlando said. "We still need to fight, obviously, but it's nice to be the team that people worry about."

"If we can get [Horne] vertically on people in man-to-man situations, he is the guy we want to get it to," Brown said.

UMass continued the success it had offensively against the and then found Cruz deep three plays later on a 37-yard touchdown reception.

On the completion to Horne, Coen passed the 10,000 passing yard mark for his career and finished the game at 10,300 yards.

After the Minutemen's defense forced a three-and-out by Bryant, Coen needed just one play to give

The reception was Silvers' first career touchdown and the longest for the Minutemen since Coen completed an 89-yard pass to Rasheed Rancher on Sept. 23, 2006.

Bryant would score on its next possession on a 15 play, 75-yard drive to make the score 21-7, before UMass would score another 21-unanswered points.

The UMass offense was efficient the entire day, needing an average of just over 1:15 on each of its six scoring drives.

Coen finished the day 11-of-18 for 189 yards and five touchdowns. He and his wide receivers averaged over 35 yards per completion.

"We've kind of lived on big plays," Coen said.

"They ran their man packages, and we were praying for it. That's what you pray for as a quarterback-wideout tandem."

On the day, seven of Coen's 11 completions were for over 20 yards.

The success of the offense had a lot to do with the play of its offensive line; the unit held the Bryant defensive line without a sack.

"I knew we would have some big plays but I wanted to make sure [Coen] made it through the game healthy," Brown said. "These kinds of teams concern you when they are blitzing all the time because all you need is one protection error and your quarterback is down for the rest of the game."

The victory did come with a price as UMass lost cornerback Sean Smalls in the first quarter. Smalls injured his ankle as he was tripped up heading into the end zone on a punt return. The return was nullified because of a block in the back.

Smalls returned on the next Bryant drive but left the game for good after reaggravating the injury. The status of the injury was unknown.

Brown was pleased with the way his team responded after their loss last weekend, but was ready to put this game behind him as soon as it was done as well.

"I thought it was a good response and it showed a lot of maturity and now we have to get ready to go to Rhode Island," Brown said. "We didn't play well there a year ago and we have to go down there and play the best game of the year."

Sowry was proud of her goalkeeper who, late in her freshman season, is maturing and developing into one of the best goalies in the country.

"She's not really a freshman, in terms of her experience, steadiness and composure. She sees the field well and she doesn't get nervous, or she at least doesn't appear to," Sowry said. "She just has this confident stature and very she's very composed and balanced when the shots come her way."

UMass' hopes for a win seemed to be dashed with a little over a minute remaining in regulation, when Temple put the ball in the back of the net on an apparent goal. The goal was put up on the scoreboard as Temple celebrated. However, the referees had never counted the goal because of a goalie obstruction call against the Owls.

Temple tied the game minutes earlier. The Owls, off of a penalty corner, brought the ball in on a slow-developing play and senior Jaime Adams took the shot. The shot was deflected by junior Kristen Wanner as the ball went up and over a diving Widdall for the score.

With 6 minutes left in regulation, the goal turned the tide of the game and put the Minutewomen in a vulnerable position.

"It's disappointing to get scored on that late in the game because you kind of think you have the win and then they score on you," Shea said. "But we definitely stayed confident and we did a lot of things after that to hold the tie and get us into overtime."

Orlando put UMass on the board first with a goal 26 minutes, 36 seconds into the first half, setting the trend of senior contributions for the day. On a corner play, Parker pushed the ball into Shea, who then passed the ball off. Sophomores Makaela Potts and Jackie Tait both faked shots, before Jaime Bourazeris finally fired off a shot that was tipped in by Orlando for the goal.

After her team responded to a late surge by the Owls, Sowry, who was given a Gatorade shower at the end of the game, was proud of her team's play.

"It was just an incredible battle and we expect that from Temple," Sowry said. "They play hard, tough [field] hockey and we weren't making the right adjustments. But we kept persisting and that's the beautiful thing about this team."

spurts, but as he learned the system and improved his play, he captured UMass coach Sam Koch's notice and earned a starting spot this weekend.

"Obviously I was very disappointed in him that's why I started him. I wanted him as far away as possible, I didn't want him near me," Koch joked. "Seriously though, he's played very well, he's worked hard in training, he deserved the start and he has taken it and has done a great job."

Thomson scored his first official career goal yesterday, on a corner kick 16 minutes into the game. On the corner from Ben Arikian, Thomson jumped over everyone and headed the ball into the net, to give UMass a 1-0 lead over the Colonials. Koch felt it was just a matter of time before Thomson converted on a set piece.

"I think he's always been dangerous, I don't know if it's necessarily improvement by him as much as finally putting the chance in. I think he should have had two [goals] but he put one over the crossbar," Koch said.

Thomson played a major role against George Washington, as he not only gave the Minutemen the lead, but helped protect it by frustrating the Colonials whenever they got the ball in UMass' zone.

This is Thomson's first year as a starter, and after a slightly rocky start to the season, he began to emerge as a dependable player for the Minutemen.

"He's been solid, he's been getting more composed each game, whereas in the beginning I think he was a bit rattled, so he's certainly been solid [on defense]," Koch said.

into the game.

"Hopefully it's the start of some good things," Thomson said about their recent success against A-10 opponents.

The win moves UMass into second place in the A-10 standings. The Minutemen have 10 points, tied with Temple (7-4-3, 3-1-1 A-10), and are six points behind Dayton (11-2-2, 5-0-1 A-10).

Game notes

Sunday's win over George Washington was Koch's 250th career win. His 200th career win was also against GW on Oct. 3, 2003 ... Chris Brown and Mike DeSantis tied the career record for most career games at 79. It was also Brown's 79th career start ... Ofosu's goal returns him to the leading point earner (nine) and goal scorer (four) for the Minutemen ... Hogan's assist on Ofosu's goal was his first point of the season. Last season, he led the team in goals (eight) and points (18) ... Arikian's assist on Thomson's goal on Sunday was his third of the season. He leads the team in assists ... UMass' overtime win on Friday was the first time the Minutemen have ended a game in a single overtime.

UMass backup running back Jonathan Hernandez was one of 67 different players that saw action in the 42-7 victory for the Minutemen over Bryant Saturday afternoon at McGuirk Stadium. Nine different players carried the ball for a total of 148 yards.

Coen, Horne connect for three touchdowns in victory

The Massachusetts football team put last weekend's loss to No. 9 Richmond behind them really quickly.

It only took 1 minute, 39 seconds for senior quarterback Liam Coen and UMass' offense to respond in its 42-7 win over Bryant on Saturday.

"I was concerned after last week's tough home loss how we would respond. I think the guys took care of that, showing great maturity," UMass coach Don Brown said. "We did not try to candy coat it, come up with fake motivation; there was none of that stuff. It was all about us this week. Just coming back and playing the game that we were capable of [playing]."

After a 30-yard kickoff return by Courtney Robinson that started the No. 17 Minutemen off at their own 37-yard line, Coen found Victor Cruz deep down the middle of the field for a 35-yard completion.

On the next play, Coen found Cruz again on a crossing pattern across the middle of the field that ended as a 21-yard gain and put the ball at Bryant's 6-yard line. After a holding penalty on UMass, Coen completed his third pass of the drive to Jeremy Horne.

Horne, who turned 22 Saturday, took the short pass from Coen and ran up the right side of the field, making tacklers miss and hurdling another to get into the end zone. Horne was penalized for unsportsmanlike conduct after celebrating the touchdown.

"He told me before the game [that it was his birthday]," Brown said after the game. "But I still yelled at him after he got the celebration penalty."

Horne had a lot more to celebrate later in the game, but held his emotions in check. The wideout finished the day with five catches, three for touchdowns, and 182 yards, the fourth-most receiving yards in a game in No. 17 UMass (5-3, 2-2 Colonial Athletic Association) history.

The defense that Bryant (4-4) played enabled Horne to have the success that he had, according to Brown.

Roswess, Thomson score special goals

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When a soccer player scores his first career goal it's a cause for celebration.

If it happens twice in a two-day span? Well, that becomes a special weekend indeed.

That's what happened this past weekend for the Massachusetts men's soccer team as freshman forward Chris Roswess and junior defender Stuart Thomson each scored their first career goals in victories over Richmond, 2-1, on Friday and George Washington, 2-0, on Sunday. Both were game winners for the Minutemen (5-6-3, 3-1-1 Atlantic 10).

"It feels great. I've had a lot of chances this season but I wasn't able to bury any, but [Friday] I got the one that counts," Roswess said.

It was especially gratifying for Thomson, who accidentally put the ball in his own net, nearly costing UMass the game against the Spiders.

"Technically, I scored against my team, so that could have been my first collegiate goal, but this one was for my team so I'm excited about it," Thomson said.

Both players scored their goals off corner kicks by deflecting a well-kicked cross past the keeper into the net. Before this weekend, the Minutemen have had a great deal of difficulty converting chances off of set pieces. They worked to improve that aspect of their game all week in practice and it appears to have paid off.

"We've been working [on set pieces] more during the end of practice, coming out on our own sometimes and clearly it's been beneficial," Thomson said.

Roswess' goal came at a key point in the season for the Minutemen. In overtime, having just rallied to tie the game against Richmond with 3 minutes left, UMass earned a corner kick from the right sideline with 1 minute remaining. Mark DeSantis sent the ball in and Roswess headed the ball between the goalkeeper's legs for the golden goal, earning the Minutemen's second conference win of the season.

UMass outshot Richmond 24-7 up to that point in the game, yet the Minutemen were worried that all their work would go unrewarded.

"It was so frustrating. We had so many shots and I don't know we just couldn't score in the first 80 [minutes]," Roswess said.

Roswess started the season coming off the bench playing

Minutemen get two key wins, conference stock going up

BY MELISSA TERTINIS

The two game-winning goals this weekend for the Massachusetts men's soccer team were also career firsts for two of its players.

Junior Stuart Thomson headed in the first goal on Sunday in UMass' 2-0 win against George Washington (6-5-3, 2-2-2 Atlantic 10) for his first career goal, and freshman Chris Roswess knocked in his in overtime for the Minutemen's 2-1 win over Richmond (6-5-3, 1-2-3 A-10) on Friday. With the two wins, the Minutemen (5-6-3, 3-1-1 A-10) extended their unbeaten streak to four games.

"Good game [on Sunday]. [Sunday] was the key game of the two. I think we struggled a little bit on Friday, but we were able to get it done when we had to, the hard way, and then today I thought we played a consistent 90 minutes and defended very well and created a lot of chances. We didn't finish as many as I would have liked to, but we were still able to put them under and we did a pretty good job," UMass coach Sam Koch said.

Thomson's goal came off of a corner kick by Ben Arikian. Arikian took the kick from the left side and Thomson was there to head the ball to the right side of the goal, past GW goalkeeper Matt Scheer.

"I stand on the front post, and what happens is I take a two or three yard run out and I got up and the ball was played straight to my head and I put it in the back of the net," Thomson said. "It had a good chance [of going in], I didn't know if it was going to beat the keeper, but I knew it was on frame and when I hit the back of the net I was really just pumped."

UMass secured its lead at the end of the first half when Prince Ofosu received a pass from Chris Vaccaro. Ofosu carried the ball down the right side of the field and it looked like he was going to cross the ball, but he shot it into the left side of the goal. Junior Bryan Hogan was also credited on the assist with his pass to Vaccaro.

"[On Sunday], we worked hard, we worked as a unit. We didn't give too many opportunities up in the back and we took it to them, it was good," Thomson said.

On Friday, UMass scored three goals, but only two of them in the correct net. Thomson accidentally knocked the ball in UMass' goal to put Richmond in the lead, but with just a few minutes remaining in regulation, junior Mark DeSantis scored his third goal of the season to send the game into overtime.

Sophomore midfielder Stuart Amick and the Minutemen swept the weekend against conference opponents at Rudd Field.

Roswess came through for the Minutemen and scored the game-winning goal off of Mark DeSantis's corner kick, 98 minutes, 15 seconds

Mass Attack, Wildcats play to tie, Meyers solid in net

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

DURHAM, N.H. — A power-play goal, a short-handed goal, 11 penalties and 71 shots were all crunched into Friday night's 1-1 tie between No. 4 New Hampshire and the Massachusetts hockey team.

Both teams had their chances and both coaches agreed; they're happy they escaped the game with a point.

"There were points in the game where we were in control," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "And there were other points where we were hanging on for dear life.

|---|---|
| UNH | 1 |

"You know, you're always disappointed because you always play to win," Cahoon added. "But with games like that you can walk away from it saying both teams left it on the ice."

Special teams and goaltending were the stories of the game. The UMass penalty-killing unit held the Wildcats (3-0-1, 1-0-1 Hockey East) to eight shots on five power plays. Dating back to UMass' last game, it has killed its last eight power plays.

Brett Watson, who is featured on UMass's first penalty-killing line, won 15-of-20 on face-offs, giving the Minutemen (2-1-1, 0-0-1 Hockey East) a chance to secure the puck, waste time and then clear it down the ice.

UNH goaltender Brian Foster (39 saves) and his opposite Dan Meyers (32 saves) were the first and second stars of the game, respectively.

Both net minders made saves when pressure was mounting in their own ends. Meyers' biggest save occurred with 20 seconds left in overtime.

The junior robbed a Wildcat attacker extending his blocker to knock the puck away, allowing time for UMass defenders to clear the zone.

In overtime, both goalies were tested often but stopped all shots.

At the 13 minute, 41 second mark, UNH forward Danny Dries was assessed a 5-minute major for hitting from behind — resulting in a game misconduct.

The Minutemen scored their lone goal on that power play.

Offense not there in shutouts against Fordham, La Salle

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's soccer team took a few steps back this weekend from attempting to reach its first Atlantic 10 tournament since 2004.

The Minutewomen couldn't generate enough offense this weekend on the road, falling to La Salle, 2-0, Friday and Fordham, 3-0, Sunday.

"We have to be disappointed dropping those two games, but I can't fault the effort of our players," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "We worked extremely hard both games."

UMass hasn't scored in its past three games, and is currently in the middle of a three-game losing streak while dropping four of its last six contests.

The Minutewomen (6-7-4, 3-5-1 A-10) allowed a season-high 24 shots against the Explorers, while the Rams held a 17-4 advantage in shots.

"We are discovering that you can't hold the ball in the opposing teams attacking third," Rudy said. "You are going to be vulnerable at the other end, and that's what happened."

|---|---|
| Fordham | 3 |
| UMass | 0 |
| La Salle | 2 |
| UMass | 0 |

On Friday, junior goalkeeper Lauren Luckey tied her season high with nine saves, but the Explorers (8-7-3, 4-3-2 A-10) scored two goals in the first half within a 9-minute span to pull away early.

In the 25th minute, forward Dana O'Brien collected a shot by midfielder Traci Depasquale that was deflected off of a UMass defender and scored, recording her seventh goal of the season.

Depasquale earned her second assist of the game with a pass to midfielder Heather Steadman who then passed to midfielder Melanie Gamble for the goal to give the Explorers a two-goal lead.

UMass couldn't come from behind in the second half, despite getting some offensive opportunities.

In the middle of the second half, sophomore midfielder Therese Smith suffered a deep bone bruise and left the game. The Minutewomen are still hanged up on the offensive side of the ball, with senior forward Vanessa Patry continuing to struggle with an ankle injury and redshirt senior midfielder Vanessa Lima with a hamstring injury.

UM construction head replaced

Robert K. Sheridan was elected to lead the UMass Building Authority.

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Building Authority officially has a new leader.

Robert K. Sheridan, the president and CEO of the Savings Bank Life Insurance Company of Massachusetts and a former University trustee, was elected at the Oct. 1 UMass Building Authority meeting. Sheridan replaces chair William E. Giblin, who is retiring from the board of trustees, according to a statement.

The UMass Building Authority, a public authority of the commonwealth established by the Massachusetts legislature in 1960, is responsible for providing new academic, athletic and residential facilities on the five UMass campuses and for the renovation of existing buildings. Construction is funded mostly through tax-exempt bonds issued by the Authority.

Sheridan, who was a member of the board from 2002 to 2007, serving in multiple positions including vice chairman, said he is pleased to serve the University in his new position.

"We have an important role to play as our public research University continues its plans to expand and upgrade facilities, plans that rely on the Building Authority's ability to borrow funds and manage complex projects," Sheridan said in a statement. "I look forward to working with my fellow Authority members and senior UMass leaders as the Authority's projects provide UMass students, faculty and staff with the state-of-the-art facilities that they need."

David MacKenzie, executive director of the Authority, said Sheridan's wisdom, experience and leadership are important assets to his new role.

He went on to praise Giblin, president and CEO of Tweave, Inc. in Norton, for his 12 years of service to the Authority, including four years as chairman.

MacKenzie acknowledged "the significant progress that has been achieved during this last decade, when the University completed $1.7 billion in capital projects across all of the UMass campuses."

At the same Building Authority meeting, trustee Richard J. Lawton was elected vice chairman.

UMass alumnus Paul J. Carney will remain the secretary-treasurer.

The statement said that Sheridan was a member of the UMass board of trustees from 2002 through 2007 and he served on the Building Authority during his tenure. At various times he held the positions of vice chairman of the board, vice chairman of the Administration and Finance Committee, chairman of the Athletics Committee and vice chairman of the Committee on Academics and Student Affairs.

Sheridan is a member of the Massachusetts Bar, as Chairman of the board of directors for the Life Insurance Association of Massachusetts and chairman of the Massachusetts Affordable Housing Alliance Capital Campaign.

Sheridan lives in Hingham with his wife, Jean O'Hara.

The Sheridans were recently honored by the Massachusetts Affordable Housing Alliance, which dedicated its new home ownership center in Dorchester to them.

"Bob Sheridan's leadership of the Building Authority will be invaluable to the University as we continue to move forward our plans to invest in 21st century facilities across all five UMass campuses," said President Jack M. Wilson said in a statement. "His considerable experience in the insurance and banking industries, together with his longstanding service to the University, make him extremely well-suited for this important position."

Study says younger generation less educated than parents'

BY KIMIA HEDAYAT-ZADEH
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

A recent study conducted by the American Council of Education (ACE) showed the younger generation of American adults is less educated than the older generation. The results of the study deviate from the typical increase in educational attainment experienced from generation to generation, a trend that has existed since World War II.

The study, which included the Minorities in Higher Education 2008 Twenty-Third Status Report, also indicated that while the amount of minorities attending college rose 50 percent from 1995 to 2005, the gap between minorities represented on college campuses has widened. Only Asian Americans and whites are more educated than the previous generation, with 61 percent of Asian Americans, 44 percent of whites, 32 percent of blacks and 25 percent of Hispanics and American-Indian age 18-24 enrolled in an institution of higher education in 2006.

During the 2007-08 academic year at the University of Massachusetts, 2,764 whites, 396 Asian-Pacific Islanders, 172 Blacks/African-Americans, 170 Hispanics/Latinos, 18 American Indians/Alaska Natives, and 15 Cape Verdeans entered the University as first-year undergraduate students.

Disparity between the education of women and men was also noted in the report: except for Asian-Americans, young men are less educated than their parents, and except for American Indians, young women are more educated than their parents. UMass statistics are in general consensus with this trend also, showing 3,078 female graduates compared to 2,972 male graduates in the 2007-08 academic year.

The study's results come at a time when more jobs are requiring a higher level of education and a broader range of skills, said ACE President Molly Corbett Broad.

"The alarm bell should be going off. We clearly need to redouble our efforts to raise educational achievement and aspiration across our entire school-age population," Broad said.

Yet with the global financial crisis downsizing the budget for educational institutions, particularly for state-funded schools like UMass, and the potential elimination of the income tax in Massachusetts, institutions are struggling to find a way to combat these statistics in the coming years.

"The Massachusetts Taxpayer Foundation estimates that the University's state support would be reduced by 71 percent of our budget [if the income tax is repealed] This will cause a significant restricting of University operations," deputy provost and dean of undergraduate education, John Cunningham, said.

"We don't have a big endowment to fall back on. Right now [because of the global financial crisis] we will have a 5.6 percent budget cut, or about $12 million, and we are having a lot of difficulty deciding how we are going to do that," said Cunningham. "So imagine if the income tax was repealed and it was over $100 million that needed to be cut from the budget. UMass would basically have to become a private university somehow, and we would have to start looking at charging private university fees for students to

Allen to parse energy policy

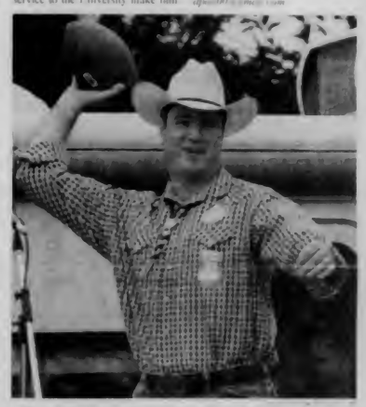
BY MICHAEL PHILLIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Former Senator and Virginia Gov. George Allen will speak tonight at 7 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium about Senator John McCain's plan for energy independence and the importance of using America's own natural resources.

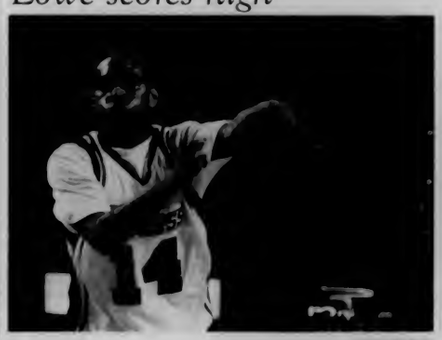
In an event sponsored by the Republican Club, Allen's speech will be entitled, "McCain, Obama and America's Energy Security: Why Obama's Energy Plan Will Undermine America."



Allen has stressed the importance of offshore drilling, clean coal and advanced nuclear technologies, as well as tax incentives for alternative energy initiatives.

"We are the Saudi Arabia of the world when it comes to coal, we ought to be using it more cleanly and efficiently," said Allen.

In early 2005 Allen was a rising star in Republican circles. According to a National Journal survey, Allen was the frontrunner for the 2008 Republican Presidential nomination. In 2006, Allen lost his Senate seat to Jim Webb.



The summer before the election, Allen received national attention for the use of the word "macaca" – a word some considered a racial slur – in reference to a videographer working for his opponent who was filming his

Silvio Torres-Saillant, associate professor of English and director of the Latino/Latin American Studies program at Syracuse University, spoke at the University of Massachusetts to honor Latino Heritage Month.

His lecture on Oct. 15, titled "Latinos: Pluralities, Ways to Imagine the Community," took place in the Campus Center.

He began by discussing the objective of the lecture, which was to examine how the Latino culture is essentially bulked into one ethnicity despite its great diversity.

Torres-Saillant then went on to discuss how the category Latino/Hispanic came to exist in the U.S. consensus.

Due to the success of the civil rights movement, certain laws pertaining to racial equality needed to be established and the U.S. government in turn felt that a structure needed to be set up, accord

Outage leaves campus 'in the dark,' again

Lights go out on consecutive weekends

BY MATT ROCHELEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On consecutive weekends, the University of Massachusetts campus was left in the dark in what officials called the second "major" power outage, in addition to several other isolated outages, this semester.

"We have received some calls with people concerned over the number of outages compared to past years," said Larry Snyder, associate director of the UMass Physical Plant.

According to University spokesman Daniel Fitzgibbons, director of Physical Plant, Patrick Daly, said that there have been about four power outages on campus since the start of the semester, which Snyder said is more frequent than in years past.

The latest outage turned the lights out across about half of the campus, Snyder said.

Power went out at around 9 p.m. on last Saturday, and was caused by a weather-related service interruption from the Western Massachusetts Electric Company, Daly said.

Without power from off-campus, said Daly, the Central Heating Plant tripped off-line and it took about an hour to get the systems running again after power was restored.

Another major outage on Oct. 18, during homecoming weekend activities, was caused by a "malfunction of the electric load-shed program at the Central Heating Plant," Snyder said.

He said work is being done to troubleshoot the program at the campus' new heating plant, though he was not sure when the malfunctions will be corrected.

"Once we have that [program] fixed, these type of incidents should not occur," said Snyder.

The heating plant is in its start-up phase and operational issues are still being worked out, Daly said.

Homecoming weekend's outage lasted from around noon until 1 p.m. Numerous on-campus buildings lost power, including the Campus Center, the Student Union, and the west side of the Mullins Center, lost power, including the Campus Center, Student Union and the west side where the Mullins Center is located, according to University spokesman Patrick J. Callahan.

The School of Education and the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics, were holding presentations for homecoming

'Ethnic labels' debated by speaker, students

ing to Torres-Saillant.

As a result, in 1977 there were five main categories established consisting of four races: American Indian/Alaskan Native, Asian-Pacific Islander, Black/African-American, White, and Latino.

Torres-Saillant questioned these categories, especially that of the Latino ethnicity, by asking how one categorizes people and assumes that it was done accurately.

He added that during the 1990s various groups strongly protested to the categories established and wished them to be changed.

He then proceeded to talk about the instances where these protests occurred throughout the country.

The National Coalition of Asian Pacific Americans requested that the peoples of Laos and Cambodia be included under the Asian Pacific Islander. The Arab-American institute argued that the Middle Eastern category should be removed under the White category and be under its own "protected" entity. Sen. Daniel Kahikina Akaka (D-Hawaii) suggested that the native Hawaiian be moved from the Asian/Pacific Islander category to American Indian/Alaskan Native.

In response, it became acceptable, starting in 2000, to pick more than one category. It has been determined that since then, only 2.6 percent of the U.S. population fits into more than one category.

Torres-Saillant then began to explain that the Latino/Hispanic category lumps many different cultures and peoples who have lots of variation in ancestry due to numerous migration movements throughout history.

Torres-Saillant asked, "Where is the commonality?"

He added that contrary to initial thoughts, Latino/Hispanic culture isn't necessarily Spanish because, depending on the country, there are indigenous peoples with native languages that are not Spanish. For example, Brazil's native language is Portuguese.

He proposed the idea that since the U.S. government needed to categorize people solely to implement a particular policy, this ethnic label should be used only when needed.

But then another question came up: "What is the term good for?" Torres-Saillant made it clear that just because the term isn't accurate, that doesn't mean that it should be completely eliminated, but rather seen as a "common set of socio-political aspirations."

He also talked about how Latinos are not portrayed in the media, like most minorities, in the best light.

According to Torres-Saillant, there is not much diversity, in American. media and in Latin American media as well, most of the people are, or at least look, white. And, Torres-Saillant said, with what diversity there is, there is still a "lack of depth" and the media often resorts to showing only brief, easy stereotypes, making the youth more vulnerable to the media's perceptions of their identity.

Calling Barack Obama and Joe Biden's energy initiatives "vague," Allen has repeatedly praised McCain for his stances on clean coal and advanced nuclear energy while stressing his belief that Obama's policies will undermine America's interests.

According to Obama's campaign Web site, both clean coal initiatives and safe nuclear energy would be part of his presidential initiatives. Allen acknowledged this but questioned how much an Obama presidency would make clean coal and nuclear power a priority.

"[Allen] is a well-vetted politician and I will be curious to hear his viewpoints," Said Emma Einhorn, President of University Democrats.

Greg Collins, President of the Republican Club said Allen is a "respected voice on national energy issues."

The key difference between McCain and Obama's energy plans, according to Collins, is the level of government's involvement in alternative energy.

According to Allen, offshore drilling during is an important issue this election season.

"McCain wants to allow states, if they so desire, to explore off their coast," he said.

Allen served on the Energy and Natural Resources Committee in the U.S. Senate during his term.

A graduate of the University of Virginia School of Law, Allen broke onto the national scene with his successful bid for governor of Virginia. Allen came back from a 29-point deficit against Mary Sue Terry in 1993. Allen ran on a theme of being tough on crime with his proposal to stop granting parole, which eventually won him the election by 17 points.

"American needs to start their creative engines," said Allen. "I'm going to be pointing out differences [between McCain and Obama], I want to be talking about positive constructive ideas."

Allen said he believes that this new energy literacy will allow more people, including UMass students, to take initiative on energy issues.

"The young leaders there at UMass can be part of the solution," Allen said.

visitors in the Campus Center and the Student Union Ballroom when power was lost.

Campus residents and visitors were directed to eat at the Franklin Dining Commons, which had power, instead of at the Blue Wall in the Campus Center or The Hatch in the Student Union.

Jenna Dellert, a sophomore sociology major, said she was frustrated by a similar situation during the most recent power loss where food choices at the dining halls on campus were limited.

In the Northeast Residential Area, the Worcester Convenience Store and Pita Pit were both closed from around 9:30 p.m. to 11 p.m. due to this past Saturday's outage, said convenience store employee Ken Dewar, a senior majoring in Japanese and political science.

"I think UMass has some serious electrical problems," Dewar said.

Other students were also concerned.

"I was just wondering why there weren't some backup generators to keep at least some power on during the storm," said on-campus resident and sophomore Kevin Whalen, a sports management and finance major.

Distractions, unpreparedness cited as educational obstacles

come here. It would be devastating to the University and undergraduate students."

If the University has a budget problem and decides to raise fees for undergraduate students in the next academic year, students with the most financial need would have to receive a proportional increase in financial aid, according to Cunningham.

"That would mean that we would have to raise the fee for other students," he said.

Already, added Cunningham, the current generation is working more hours while pursuing a college education than ever before, and an increase in fees would lead to students' education becoming even more of a financial burden.

"The other side [of the issue] is the quality of education for minority students in high school," said Cunningham. "When you look at inner-city students and the quality of options that are available, it falls short of the preparation needed to succeed at a four-year degree program."

Organizations such as Pipeline Programs, where faculty are organized to work with and tutor middle school and high school students in the area, (Springfield and Holyoke for UMass) exist to provide supplementary preparation for colleges. Student Bridges, a registered student organization also provides tutoring for middle school and high school students in Springfield and Holyoke.

UMass associate professor of anthropology Enoch H. Page, however, believes that more should be done to assist minority students on campus.

"There has been a severe diminution of services for students of color on this campus," said Page. "There is a tremendous pressure on students of color to identify with others rather than to build their support teams within their own groups that also would be working collaboratively with other support teams."

Specifically, Page said that all minority students should be enrolled and funded by their colleges in The Institute for Teaching and Learning, which occurs each year to expose students to mentoring that they may not be receiving at their own schools.

"This is the theoretical reason why we have the MCAS test, so that we make sure high schools are reaching a certain academic level," said Cunningham. "The level needed to pass the MCAS test is a 10th grade education, not very ambitious. But that's where we are in the attempt to hold high schools accountable for educated students."

Page disagreed as to whether the affects of the MCAS tests are positive on educational institutions.

"First, the lack of preparedness is far from only being a minority problem," Page said. "One difficulty of teaching today is that even in an all white classroom there is such a wide range of skills represented. These skills range from not knowing how to read well or write a paper to knowing very well how to do these things."

"So one wonders why some students are not learning these basics that I learned in high school and one starts to believe it is due partly to distractions (iPods, video games, etc.), but more importantly it is due to how teachers are now required to teach to the state test rather than to truly involve students with different learning styles in skills development appropriate to each one of them," she added.

The U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics for August 2008 showed that the national unemployment rate is 2.7 percent for adults age 25 and older with at least a bachelor's degree, 4.8 percent for those with some college, 5.7 percent for people with a high school diploma, and 9.6 percent for those without a diploma.

Letter from the Editor

Dear reader,

When you arrived at one of the newsstands on the University of Massachusetts campus or in the greater Amherst area yesterday, I imagine you were surprised not to find Tuesday's issue of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian awaiting you. Though we had completed the production of Tuesday's edition, there were circumstances beyond our control that prevented the paper from being printed and delivered; our printing company experienced a malfunction with its press. The Daily Collegian has been printing daily since 1967, and we hope to continue that streak well into the foreseeable future.

On behalf of The Daily Collegian staff, we sincerely apologize and we hope that you enjoy today's extended issue. Thank you for your continued readership and support.

Sincerely,

Michael King

UMPD Crime Log, Oct. 20 – 26

Monday

Matthew D. Benson, 19, of 95 L St. Haverhill, Mass., was arrested on University Drive at 4:36 p.m. and charged with assault and battery on a person 60-years old and over/disabled with injury, disorderly conduct and malicious destruction of property over $250.

Thursday

Corey Eason, 19, of 660 Massachusetts Ave. 324 UMass/Amherst, Mass., was arrested in James dormitory at 1:55 a.m. and charged with a warrant –WMS. "The warrant was for receiving stolen property over $250," said UMass Police Department Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald. "Officers became aware of the warrant and went to James Hall dormitory because they believed he would be there," he added. Warrant Management Service (WMS,) is a centralized computer database of all Massachusetts warrants. This system allows officers to check if an individual is wanted by another police department in the country. "Its common practice for police departments that if a warrant is outstanding in your jurisdiction, you'll follow through," said Archbald.

Friday

Daniel Bracho-Lopez, 18, of 7 Crown Shield St. Usbridge, Mass., and Sara Beith, 18, of 28 Canterbury Lane, Longmeadow, Mass. were arrested as a result of a traffic stop on University Drive at 2:10 a.m. Bracho-Lopez is charged with unlicensed operation of a motor vehicle; failure to stop/yield, motor vehicle lights violation, possession of marijuana, possession of liquor while under the age of 21, possession of a motor vehicle and possession use of a false-stolen RMV document. Beith is charged with possession of a Class D drug.

Kyle Greer, 18, of 485 Barnes Road, Oak Bluffs, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Massachusetts Ave. at 3:55 p.m. and charged with possession of liquor/transporting while under the age of 21.

Saturday

Todd Knights, 19, of 27 Elmwood Road, Wellesley, Mass., was arrested in Lot 22 at 12:32 a.m. after a suspicious vehicle call to police, and charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21 and unlawful possession of fireworks.

Yesser Cabrera-Vazquez, 21, of 567 West St., Amherst, Mass. and Stephen JL. Larochelle, 19, of 159 Old Belchertown Road, Amherst, Mass. were arrested as a result of a traffic stop on North Pleasant Street at 2:30 a.m. and both charged with offenses. The car was pulled over after officers discovered through a license plate query that the car's inspection was invalid. "The officer approached the car and alcohol and a plastic baggy was observed, which later was determined to contain marijuana," said Archbald. Cabrera-Vasquez is charged with possession of a Class D drug, possession of an open container of alcohol in a motor vehicle, possession of a Class C drug, possession of a Class F drug and no inspection sticker. Larochelle is charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21, possession of a Class D drug, possession of a Class C drug and possession of an open container of alcohol in a motor vehicle.

Renee White, 17, of 46 Harvest Hill Drive, Somers, Conn., was arrested in Lot 11, which is north of Alumni Stadium, at 2:39 a.m. and charged with possession of a Class D drug.

David Neil Gray, 21, of 31 Douglas Ave., Burlington, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue at 3:23 a.m. and charged with OUI liquor and one way street violation.

Evan S. Aldrich, 19, of 20 Walker Road, Manchester, Mass. and Michael A. Longcor, 20, of 1 Greenbrier Road, Manchester, Mass. were arrested as a result of a warrant served in Gorman dormitory at 8:39 a.m. and both face drug offenses. "As a result of the search warrant we confiscated some paraphernalia, marijuana, cash, pipes, and such as that would be associated with drug use and distribution," said Archbald. Aldrich is charged with possession of a Class D drug and possession to distribute a Class D drug. Longcor is also charged with possession of Class D drug and possession to distribute a Class D drug. "This was done with officers and detectives working hand in hand," said Archbald.

Sunday

Sagel Madeline Friendsmith, 21, of 135 Highland Ave., Somerville, Mass., was arrested in Lot 44 at 2:16 a.m. after a suspicious vehicle call to police and charged with possession of a Class D drug, possession of a Class E drug and two counts of possession of a Class B drug.

Univ. Wyoming class writes to serial killers

By Kendall Hickman
Branding Iron (U. Wyoming)

LARAMIE, Wyo. — Everyone has seen the movies full of dark alleys and blood splatter on the shower curtain. But few have had the experience of actually talking with the people on the murderous side of the knife.

For University of Wyoming students in Dr. Scott Culhane's criminal justice course, Serial Killers, that's exactly the case. By writing letters, they are corresponding with willing convicted serial killers, serving time in U.S. prisons across the country.

"It's a criminal justice class, so it's not a profiling class," Culhane said. "We're studying the crime aspect. At first, [the students] look at aspects of what causes crimes and then we look at case studies."

The crimes of Charles Manson, Jeffrey Dahmer and John Wayne Gacy are examined in the course.

The correspondence between students and convicts is part of a semester-long project that outlines the history and crimes of a single murderer.

The students use pseudonyms when contacting the killers.

"The project itself is a case study of the individual," Culhane said. "The student is taking a single serial killer or suspected serial killer, and writing up a history on them and categorizing their crimes."

By "categorizing," the students specify the nature of the wrongdoings, such as torture and post-mortem activity.

Culhane, who joined the Criminal Justice Department in 2005, stressed the importance of understanding serial killers, especially by talking with them.

"I want people to see how they are different from each other," Culhane said. "You can't just lump them into a category. You hear it all the time when they're being interviewed, they seem so normal. That's how people become successful serial killers, by not sticking out. I want people to see how seemingly normal they are."

Exemplifying the differences in the condemned, Culhane explained the varying written responses the class is receiving.

"What's coming back is interesting," Culhane said. "We've got people who are sort of pleading for help, some people who proclaim their innocence, some people who want to make alterations [and] some people who are bragging about what they've done."

Sometimes, Culhane added it's not just letters coming back. He said people have been sent pictures of the killers. In the early stages of integrating this activity into class, Culhane was sent a painting by a local Wyoming killer, Keith Jespersen. The convict, who killed a woman in Cheyenne, created an image of a wave crashing into the shore in his downtime in prison.

The project of writing letters to killers is a recent one. Culhane started the correspondence in the fall of 2006, and he said this is the second largest group of letters to be sent.

"I came across [the idea] as I was researching the crimes," Culhane said. "I started seeing some of the things regular people were sent by serial killers. I started reading about how [the serial killers] had been written about. I thought we could take a shot at it."

About 17 letters were sent the first time the class was taught. Recipients included serial killers Ted Bundy, Charles "Tex" Watson, a Manson family member, and one of the D.C. snipers, Lee Malvo.

"Watson said he was sorry, but I don't know what else he could say to me," Culhane said. "Malvo said his attorneys advised him not to, [but] at first he was writing. That was kind of disappointing."

The disappointment has since lifted. Now after New York's most prolific killer, Joel Rifkin, put pen to paper.

"He wrote a lot," Culhane said. Rifkin was sort of the first big disappointment for the letters, and he was sad and wasn't going to do crimes."

Phil Jablonski was another who responded.

"He was very proud of his crimes," Culhane said of the California-born killer. "He liked to brag about them and [said] how he would love to kill again."

Getting a valid response from these two fueled the fire, and the flames have only gotten bigger since then.

The thing about serial killers is they get lumped into this [stereotype]," Culhane said. "They're very different from each other, and I learned that from the first go-around."

The current batch of students has introduced themselves to the killers and questions of their childhoods are the first step. After cooperation has been established, the discussion moves on to their crimes and their thoughts on their situation.

"I've got a few guys who claim they were railroaded by the justice system," Culhane said of his present group of serial killers. "I've got a guy who's had psychiatric evaluation and claims he's mentally ill and he should have had a different kind of trial. There are a lot of different questions people get. It's been pretty interesting from his perspective to see what they're saying."

The letters don't really get much out of the correspondence, Culhane said.

"Prison is all about monotony," he said. "You do the same think over and over. [Writing letters] gives them something else to do. That's a big extent of the benefits to them."

The optional correspondence can be severed at the end of the semester, but Culhane said if students wish to continue writing, the letters most still go through jail.

Culhane said he hopes this experimental class will help shatter the stereotype surrounding serial killers in society.

"There are hundreds of incarcerated serial killers in the country right now, and they're unknown," Culhane said.

Culhane and his students are looking to change that.

Reckless Question 1

On Oct. 15, Chancellor Robert C. Holub released a statement announcing that the Commonwealth is having serious financial difficulties – difficulties that have direct implications for our campus community at UMass-Amherst. Gov. Deval Patrick also announced his mid-year budget cuts totaling 5 percent. UMass must make cuts of more than $11 million to its budget cuts, which will directly affect students, staff and faculty. These cuts will make managing the University more difficult and possibly increase student fees and reduce student financial aid.

Ben Thompson

Even more disconcerting, is the hiring freeze that Chancellor Holub has imposed for the spring semester. According to a report by the Faculty Senate, UMass Amherst has lost 300 professors over the last 15 years – approximately 26 percent of the faculty – while the size of the undergraduate and graduate populations have remained largely unchanged.

The loss of these professors can be directly attributed to the massive budget cuts enforced by Gov. Romney in the early 2000s. Under Romney, UMass was slammed with an 18 percent budget cut, and UMass lost over 100 professors between 2002 and 2005 alone. Ultimately, this has resulted in a higher student-faculty ratio. In an attempt to curb the devastating loss of professors, the "Amherst 250 Plan" was implemented three years ago.

The "Amherst 250 Plan" was implemented to hire 250 new professors over five years. However, the plan has consistently fallen short of its hiring quota and – as a result of the new budget cuts – it is unlikely that any more professors will be hired through this initiative or any other hiring initiative this year. These circumstances have had – and will continue to have – a profoundly negative impact on our UMass education.

In light of this new information, imagine more budget cuts to come – with an increased likelihood should Question 1 pass. Question 1 involves eliminating the state income tax, which would force dramatic cuts in the state's budget.

Voting 'No' on Question 1 would constitute no change in the state income tax laws. A 'Yes' vote would decimate the state budget – reducing the state income tax to 2.65 percent for fiscal year 2009, and eliminate the state income tax for fiscal year 2010.

Question 1 is a reckless proposal considering the fragile state of the economy and job market today.

It would mean drastic reductions in state funding for local public schools, and would be devastating for public higher education in this state. Because the income tax provides about 40 percent of the state's budget, and some budget items cannot be cut, funding for our public campuses could be cut as much as 65 percent. This could result in fewer and larger classes, the elimination of whole programs, and more layoffs of faculty and staff.

Eliminating the income tax would make it harder for the state as a whole. It would result in the elimination and reduction of vital services that combat issues of health care, homelessness, domestic violence and hunger.

The governor has already told us to expect longer waits at the RMV, expect less community policing patrols and to expect less frequent maintenance of our parks and open spaces. Fire and police protection, health care, environmental protection, state parks, services for people with special needs and services for aging roads and bridges would be crippled if Question 1 passes – increasing the pressure on cities and towns to raise local property taxes. The cuts would also devastate education from kindergarten to Grade 12 in most towns, leading to mass layoffs of teachers and possible school closures.

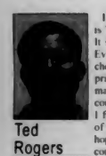
Even the state leaders strongly disagree with the proposal and are seriously worried.

According to The New York Times, Gov. Patrick, a Democrat, has called the ballot measure "just a dumb idea." Brook Padgett, chairman of the Board of Selectmen in Grafton, said the town would lose 25 percent of its budget because of state cuts.

"It would affect everybody – schools, police, municipal services, snow plowing. I couldn't begin to tell you what we would do," she said.

In addition to drastic cuts in services, many people stand to lose their job if Question 1 passes. The Massachusetts Turnpike Authority is already so strapped for cash as a result of Big Dig debt, it is forced to borrow millions of dollars for employee payroll.

State employees are not the only group to be at risk for layoff, however. Many people will likely suffer the ripple effects of mass lay-offs. If, for example, more than 45,000 state employees lose their jobs, local merchants, real estate agents, bankers, and service providers will feel the pinch.



Question 1 is a reckless proposal considering the fragile state of the economy and job market today.

The sad truth is that our economy is going through a difficult slump and it would be foolish to respond by weakening the state's infrastructure. Supporters of Question 1 say the average taxpayer will save money each year on taxes. But new college graduates will face an even harsher job market than they otherwise would. Who cares how much you save on income taxes when you don't have a job?

Moreover, as a student at a public university in Massachusetts, you should be concerned about the effect that Question 1 will have on your education. Do yourself a big favor and do the Commonwealth a big favor – vote 'NO' on Question 1.

Pre-election political blues

Ted Rogers

Hello, everybody. My name is Ted and I have a problem. It started innocently enough. Every few days, I would just check CNN to see what the primary results were and maybe see what the delegate count was. Nine months later, I find myself sitting in front of the computer, late at night, hoping for one more poll to come out before I go to bed.

I know it's bad. I've become one of the saddest things on Earth – a political junkie.

Luckily, I can see the light at the end of the tunnel.

One week from today, I'm going to cast my vote, turn on the TV and watch the news for as long as necessary. After that, I'm kissing my interest in politics goodbye for a long, long time. If there is one thing I've noticed because of the election, it's that politics is just too negative. Coming from an unrepentant pessimist like myself, that's saying something.

The negativity starts at the bottom. Because you're reading this at a university in blue Massachusetts, you're an elitist. You probably drink too many lattes. And worst of all, you probably don't even love America like real, God-fearing, patriotic Americans do.

At least, this is what some political campaigns have been saying.

"Liberals hate real Americans that work and achieve and believe in God," said Rep. Robin Hayes in North Carolina last week.

In addition, Rep. Michele Bachmann of Minnesota gave a little speech about how Barack Obama and congressmen with anti-American views should be outed by the press.

"[I] believe that the best of America is in these small towns that we get to visit, and in these wonderful little pockets of what I call the real America, being here with all of you – hardworking, very patriotic, very pro-America areas of this great nation," said Gov. Sarah Palin to the media.

Basically, what they're trying to tell you is there are two types of Americans.

There are the self-absorbed, anti-American chumps who don't even go to church, and then there are the people who live in red states. This is disgusting. It's one thing to go after the opposition's opponent, but it's another thing to question his morals and patriotism.

When you cross that line, start insulting his supporters and start questioning millions of Americans' morals and patriotism, you've gone too far to turn back.

Is there really so little that is positive about Democrats that Republicans need us to picture some Hawaiian dude as the next Stalin?

Incidentally, I'm aware the people I mentioned are Republicans, and I realize that Democrats aren't clean in this respect either. I was shocked that Obama could be stupid enough to editorialize on the folks in Pennsylvania who cling to guns and God. Although I will say I'm glad he didn't make it part of his stump speech, the divisiveness on both sides is starting to turn me off.

The negativity just doesn't extend to Joe Sixpack and Larry the Liberal. The candidates are also busy predicting the End Times if their opponent is elected.

Palin was heard by media sources last Saturday saying if Obama was elected, we would enter a collectivist, nanny state where "people are not free." In saying that we're looking at a new, communist empire if Obama is elected really the only choice left for Republicans? Is there really so little that is positive about Democrats that Republicans need us to picture some Hawaiian dude as the next Stalin?

Of course, if the shoe were on the other foot and Democrats were down in the polls, we'd being hearing about how a vote for Sen. McCain would be a vote for fascism. I'm sure we'd be seeing Al Gore chaining himself to a polar bear to protest global warming. Obama has the poll numbers and the money to stay mostly positive, but that doesn't mean his campaign hasn't indulged in a couple of nasty smears. Again, it serves as a turn-off from participating in politics.

The best reason I can think of for leaving politics to the politicians is the realization that things aren't about to get better.

I'm willing to bet cash if Obama is elected and the problems of terrorism, energy independence and the economy don't get fixed immediately, we're going to be looking at a combative Republican Congress itching to impeach Obama in a couple years. If McCain manages to pull a victory from some unidentified place, we'll see four years of saddened liberals claiming voter fraud and threatening to move to Canada.

I could be wrong. Maybe this has just been a long campaign and I'm getting hung up on negativity. Maybe the next four years will see a boom in the economy, a decisive blow to terror and good feelings all around.

Even if it happens, I'm going to try not to think about it too much. Covering the election has taken a lot out of me and I'm looking forward to writing about something where I can be a little more positive.

You know, anything but the election.

Morality versus social status

The short-sightedness of conservative views on abortion is alarming. The GOP still thinks the trickle-down theory is a viable solution to our economic woes. It wins votes by oversimplifying politics into "[the opposition] wants to take more of your money!" and proposes to spend only what is necessary when most of its middle, lower-middle class constituency could use some extra help. And the GOP wants to ban abortion. This is absurdity par excellence.

Michael Toomey

Republicans don't want to pay for social services, but they are comfortable increasing the number of people who will require governmental support. Based on a value judgment, that an embryo has a soul or some abstract "right to live," the GOP hopes to legislate morality, such that a parent unwilling or unable to properly raise a child is forced to give birth. Is it better to have a child who is unable to be adequately cared for by his parents, either economically or emotionally?

The effects of both emotional and financial poverty are well-documented. These people do not turn out well. Imagine how well the child of a 16-year-old mother who brings home abusive boyfriend after abusive boyfriend will turn out?

If the poor were given absolutely no support, crime would not only propagate, but completely boil over into literal class warfare.

Imagine the chip on the shoulder of the kid who has absolutely no resources growing up in a world that tells him he needs to goose-chase success, which is very rigidly defined for him. Chances are many of these unwanted children are going to require institutional support – from welfare, to public schooling resources, to correctional programs.

Moreover, chances are these people are going to have difficult, painful lives.

The dichotomy in the party platform – the absurdity of it – is very clear. If we had a working government completely aligned to the GOP's core values, we'd see the poor and unhappy multiply, while bitter workers grasp their mediocre paychecks, putting nothing into the pot for social services.

This is the recipe for disaster. The idea behind it is that the poor aren't working hard enough. They aren't willing or able to merge with the working class, get a job at the factory, work overtime just to get by, and live that harsh life.

"Get with the program," says the GOP, "or else you're on your own." This is the very recipe for violent revolution.

People will resort to violence before they wither away. If the poor were given absolutely no support, crime would not only propagate, but completely boil over into literal class warfare.

Morality dictates all of this, or perhaps an idealistic at-all-costs morality simply sticks to principle even when it causes the distinctly un-Christian suffering of others. Christianity is the real basis of the pro-life ethos.

Putting aside for the moment the issue of secular government, the mythology of the Christian soul is something that cannot be proven. The fact that an embryo or fetus suffers in away we can related to hasn't been proven.

What can be proven is the common lot of poor and emotionally impoverished children.

Ask any sociologist to point for some hard statistical evidence. Staunch pro-lifers want to enforce their faith in something that can't be proven at the expense of causing real harm to real people.

A word on faith: true faith doesn't need enforcement. If you believe abortion a sin and you trust in God, then won't God ultimately take care of it? Aren't sinners ultimately responsible to God? Doesn't Christ preach tolerance, empathy and acts of kindness?

The drill on energy independence

Greg Collins

"Drill, baby, drill" means that we should use whatever domestic energy reserves we currently have to become energy independent, according to Former Republican presidential frontrunner George Allen. It also suggests implicitly that the Unites States should explore other alternatives to become self-sufficient – but only when the time is necessary.

However, that does not mean the federal government should lead this growth. It certainly does not mean that we need to explore all other options at breakneck speeds right now.

Both Barack Obama and John McCain believe the public sector should play some role in spurring energy innovation and developing technologies for clean coal and nuclear, wind, hydro and solar power.

For instance, McCain wants to invest $2 billion in clean coal technologies. He also wants to establish a cap-and-trade system to encourage businesses and consumers to find different ways to reduce emissions for carbon-based fuels.

Obama wants to invest $150 billion to create 5 million new green jobs and predicts that 1 million plug-in hybrid cars will be used on roads in seven years.

But like many other aspects of public policy, the federal government has a shady record of achieving its stated intentions of energy reform.

For instance, the establishment of the Synthetic Fuels Corporation (SFC) in 1980 by President Jimmy Carter was intended to create lucrative incentives for private research of synthetic fuels which would ultimately lead to energy independence.

Yet, the SFC did not accomplish its goal. It did not allow for flexibility in the private market of synthetic fuels because it concentrated primarily on meeting certain production levels. It did not allow for innovation and entrepreneurship to meet market demands of energy needs, such as fluctuating gas prices.

In addition, there were constant squabbles among politicians and bureaucrats concerning where to allocate federal funding for synthetic fuel research. For example, fuel cell projects were provided to every state even though some states had more resources for research than others.

Other federal government intervention has consistently led to similarly inefficient results and higher energy costs. The windfall profits tax in the 1980s increased oil imports and reduced domestic production. Price controls of gas prices in the 1970s led to gas shortages. Ethanol has been subsidized since 1978, yet it is still very expensive. Federal subsidies for alternative fuels in the 1980s have not made America energy independent.

These examples highlight one of the central problems with federally-directed allocations. It empowers politicians to direct money to where they deem fit without being held directly accountable for inefficient allocations. They are guaranteed to stay in office – at least until the next election.

The recent reduction in gas prices shows that we still have more than enough oil to meet our needs, as long as oil companies are allowed to have the freedom to explore and drill.

On the other hand, private energy businesses feel the effects of poor financial decision-making instantly because their success relies exclusively on meeting the needs and demands of people for the immediate and long-term future.

This leads us to Obama's claim that drilling now is not the be-all, end-all solution to providing long-term relief for families.

He is right.

Off-shore drilling is just one important aspect of various changing circumstance in American industries which will lower the cost of energy, when all energy options are considered, through free market adjustments. Clean coal and solar power will naturally develop as people realize that traditional energy sources are running out.

But this simple supply-and-demand reality has continually been ignored the past 30 years. Like many other sensationalist pronouncements, predictions from best-selling books and magazines in the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s that America was about to run out of oil have not matched up to real-world results. Our continued reliance on oil during these years, and the subsequent discovery of more oil reserves, has proven these predictions to be flat wrong.

How will we know when America is really running out of all of our domestic oil reserves?

The price of oil will rise substantially and stay high, as demand for oil will far exceed supply. The recent reduction in gas prices shows that we still have more than enough oil to meet our needs, as long as oil companies are allowed to have the freedom to explore and drill.

When we actually do start running out of oil, people will be forced inevitably to explore alternative energy sources, such as nuclear energy and clean coal. This will come about not because politicians like Obama or McCain subjectively direct billions of dollars toward what they think are necessary energy projects.

Rather, energy independence will occur because market conditions will force Americans to discover or develop nontraditional energy sources and will direct the right resources and technology to where they are needed the most.

But contrary to Obama's and McCain's campaign proposals, the fastest way to achieve independence from oil is not to become strangled by government mandates directing how energy sources should be used.

Questoning green motives

Katherine Marr

Face it. Ours is the era of "An Inconvenient Truth." We live in a time of rising sea levels, cancerous ultraviolet rays, intensified natural disasters and – what always gets to me the most – polar bears drowning because the ice is melting in the Arctic.

The only good to come of these frightening scenarios is that they've spurred so many people to join the movement against global warming. Americans have officially "gone green," by equipping themselves with recycling bins, installing solar panels galore and dusting off their old bicycles. So, too, is there a newfound popularity of public transportation and eco-friendly, fuel-efficient vehicles.

But wait: Did drivers really develop a pro-environment conscience, or did they base their choices on the skyrocketing cost of oil prices over the past year? Now, as costs fall at the pumps, there is talk of drivers resuming their gas-guzzling, polluting habits – which makes me wonder if people put preserving their own economic wellbeing under the guise of protecting Mother Earth.

Taking into account social desirability, most people would claim that environmental concern plays some role in their lifestyle decisions, whether or not it's true. This makes it difficult to discern motives for change.

For example, at the end of last school year, the slogan "Cool the world. Ride the bus." appeared on the sides of University of Massachusetts buses. At the same time, gas prices were climbing. Fast-forward to this September, when the number of UMass parking passes sold for 2008-2009 decreased by 10 percent. What got to UMass drivers: the catchy plea on the buses or costly fuel? It's hard to know.

I would like to say for certain that environmental concern sparked students to forgo their cars in favor of public transportation. But if the deciding factor was the cost of gas – astronomically-priced for all drivers, especially notoriously broke college students – the recent decrease in gas prices does not bode well for the environment.

What got to UMass drivers: the catchy plea on the buses or costly fuel? It's hard to know.

In the past couple of weeks, the cost of gas has fallen drastically. Many pumps are sporting prices that look significantly less daunting than the $4 per gallon that became commonplace over the summer. In fact, current prices look so much less intimidating that drivers may resume old habits of opting for their own cars over public transit, driving further and more often.

Not only might low gas prices increase the number of cars on the road, but also affect the types of cars. A recent article in The Republican, with the headline "Plummeting gas prices could revive SUV sales" is enough to make car dealers cheer and environmentalists cry. It seems to describe a common trend – people resort to smaller cars when fuel cost is high, but return to larger models once gas becomes more affordable. This logic, as opposed to environmental concern, may largely account for why SUV sales have dropped since last May, while smaller model cars have risen in popularity.

The lack of demand for large cars, though, has led to a decrease in the cost of some SUVs. Combine that with today's low price of gas, and the stage has been set for an SUV comeback.

Recently, Jesse Toprak, the executive director of industry analysis for Edmunds.com, told MSNBC, "The data from the last few months show consumers are shallow – they'll go and buy a large SUV when gas prices go down." The sad thing is, this is probably true.

In today's world, how can people pick the SUV? If its reputation for rollovers isn't enough to deter drivers, it clearly isn't doing wonders for the environment. What is ironic is that SUVs have always been promoted in connection with the very same "great outdoors" that they essentially destroy. Television commercials show the monstrous cars zooming over mountains and charging through rivers, easily tackling terrain that would leave the average car's tires spinning in the mud. In actuality, though, the SUV is responsible for polluted water and mountain tops sans snow.

According to the Sierra Club's SUV Report, SUVs release 43 percent more global warming pollution and 47 percent more air pollution than the average car. To put this into perspective, driving an SUV (versus an average car) for one year is the equivalent of leaving a refrigerator door open for six years, a television playing for 28 years or a light bulb on for 30 years.

Kids grow up with parents pounding into their heads: "Don't leave the refrigerator door open, or turn the light off when you leave the room." Maybe parents should add "Don't grow up to drive an SUV" to the list.

As Americans living in a crucial time in global history, we need to rethink our priorities. There is something wrong when people opt for eco-friendly transportation only when paying for gas is leaving their wallets empty, but maintain a cavalier attitude when their driving habits are burning a hole in the ozone layer.

ELECTION COUNTDOWN

6 DAYS

Some real straight-talk on ACORN

Steven Hoeschele

The recent Republican roasting of the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, more commonly known as ACORN, is not only an attempt to discredit the liberal, non-partisan advocacy group; it's a propaganda tactic called "obtaining disapproval" by tenuously tying these non-profit "bad guys" to the Democratic candidate for president.

John McCain and his surrogates have raised the hullabaloo over ACORN's filing of falsified voter registration cards in several key swing states. Yes, contracted workers have illegally filled out bogus forms, much to the ire of ACORN leadership.

Listen: ACORN is required by law to file these forms that their workers turn in, even if they're questionable. Further, The Washington Post notes that "ACORN says it phones those who sign voter registration cards to verify that the applications are valid and flags the questionable registrations for election officials." As an organization, ACORN's hands are tied when sham contractors try to pull a fast one.

I've worked for ACORN twice. The first time, I led crews of college kids to help gut flooded homes in New Orleans. Several hundred students I worked with directly would tell you that ACORN is doing good work on urban renewal in the Lower Ninth Ward and New Orleans East. They're revitalizing not just homes, but also the lives of an entire class of displaced people – a Southern urban Diaspora.

The second time, I worked in the most "bombed out" parts of West Philadelphia, as a co-worker described the slums. This is where I encountered the ACORN of recent GOP talking points.

In a get-out-the-vote operation for the mayoral race, the organization paid a lot of people – mostly poor and some unemployed – to door-knock. And a handful of them scammed ACORN, shirking their work and drafting bogus paperwork. I personally had to deal with some of these professional swindlers.

This is hardly an uncommon phenomenon in electoral politics. And I'm sure on Nov. 4, some Republican get-out-the-vote coordinator in a small town will be shaking her head at a meth-addicted, paid canvasser who tried to pull one over on her. It happens to everybody who plays the game of grassroots organizing.

My point here is that ACORN itself is not the perpetrator of a voter fraud crime, but the victim of a few paid day-laborers who have cheated the organization. ACORN lost money to these hack con-artists. They lost credibility.

As for ACORN, registering "Mickey Mouse" to vote doesn't equal out to a ballot cast on Election Day.

And Republicans seized on it. Perhaps they thought of their last two presidential election victories and the Democrats who cried foul between their gritted teeth. Now, with their top dog trailing the front-runner in the race, the Republican machine needs a good excuse in the event of a loss. Don't be shocked to hear ACORN, the Republican machine needs a good excuse in the event of a loss. Don't be shocked to hear ACORN like we've heard Democrats' whining comments about "butterfly ballots" since 2000.

Though both sides are justifiable to call-out possible fraud – and I would go so far as to say they're required, as participants in democracy – this is a new rally for the right-wing. While liberals like Robert F. Kennedy, Jr. had been on the stump for a generation decrying institutional election fraud, conservatives have more quietly lambasted a more general voter corruption.

The irony behind all this is that the Left is supposed to believe in the power of government to do the job right, while conservatives allegedly believe that individuals will do the right thing without government snooping over their shoulder.

Concerning themselves with potential rogue double-voters, the conservative base is taking on a witch-hunt for a single sleeper-cell that rears its head every other November – a crusade much like their War on Terror, one that is never truly won.

The fact of the matter is that voter fraud is extremely rare. Brennan Center experts on voting note that "evidence from the microscopically scrutinized 2004 gubernatorial election in Washington State actually reveals just the opposite: though voter fraud does happen, it happens approximately 0.0009 percent of the time." The voter fraud rate in Ohio's contentious 2004 election was four in 10 million. It was hardly a conspiracy and hardly enough to swing the race.

Contrast these statistics with institutional fraud of the last two centuries: poll taxes, grandfather clauses, stripping ex-felons of the franchise, fewer election booths provided in urban precincts, police blockades of polls in majority black neighborhoods, the stuffed ballot boxes of old and their modern incarnation, missing votes from electronic machines. It's easier for one registrar or clerk to corrupt an election than even an organized group of people casting ballots under the names of deceased voters.

Democracy is sloppy. Sometimes we get it wrong by accident, and other times those in power exercise flagrant mal-intent. This go around, we've already seen swing state voter rolls illegally purged, and plenty more fouls are sure to come before the tallies roll in next week. As for ACORN: registering "Mickey Mouse" to vote doesn't equal out to a ballot cast on Election Day.

In the U.S., lots of talk and no intellect

Adam McGillen

Do not shun your intellectuals.

Too often, people avoid expressing their deep thoughts for fear of sounding elitist or condescending, inviting the ridicule of peers. Wisdom is only valuable when we share it for the common good of everyone. Intellectuals only become elitists when they hoard their knowledge, and condescend to others by refusing to share what they have learned. Yet, people find it challenging to open an intellectual dialogue in a society that shuns deep thinking from the mainstream.

Intellectuality has come under attack. How often have you brought up your readings amongst friends, outside of the classroom? How often have you discussed the ideas rooted deep within yourself? How often have you debated your strongest feelings and the underlying reasons you have for those feelings?

Critical thinking has become uncool. Sit down at a table in the Dining Commons and bring up the likes of Thoreau and you will likely be greeted with an onslaught of character insults and the conversation will shift back to the most recent happenings on reality television, or whoever just changed their relationship status on Facebook.

This is not to say that critical thinking does not happen or that intellectuals have gone extinct. Everyone has their deep thoughts and private moments of enlightenment, but we no longer openly share these thoughts and moments with others.

With so many horrific possibilities on the horizon (global warming, terrorism, economic collapse) now, more than ever, deep critical thinking is necessary. Yet, all the issues have been dumbed down for a society now held in contempt, seen as incapable of thinking hard about anything other than fantasy sports.

People find it challenging to open an intellectual dialogue in a society that shuns deep thinking from the mainstream.

Advertisements appeal to primal desires, aiming directly for the brain-stem, skipping past that annoying frontal lobe where you might actually begin to consider the necessity or quality of a product being sold to you.

The majority of news broadcasts consist mainly of weather, traffic and sports, marginalizing anything of intellectual value to bits and bytes buried beneath entertainment value.

Reality television has never dealt with any real element of the ordinary American life.

Is it any surprise that politicians avoid appealing to cognitive discussion? They resort to pointing fingers and calling names, expecting the Americans they feel are too inept to think for themselves to circle round and choose a side, as if every election were a schoolyard fight.

It is truly insulting how many aspects of American society belittle citizens by treating Americans as if they were children. Therefore, it only makes sense for Presidential candidates to pander to voters by ignoring issues that require critical thinking in favor of appealing to emotions, which need no attachment to rationality. Much like advertisements, it is easier to win over a voter by prodding their brain stem into making a snap decision than to make the effort to convince the more complex parts of the brain that you are suited for office.

Slogans, chants, catch-phrases, talking points – they all serve to push out any creative or critical thoughts you may have, replacing your intellectuality with the droning repetition of "Drill baby drill!" or "Yes we can!"

It's offensive that our leaders think so little of us, but can we blame them? We give them no reason to invite intellectuality into public discourse when we bury it and shun it from our private discourse.

In a society that marginalizes the intellectual, people have begun to repress their own intellectuality. No wonder it is a common phenomenon for drunks to get philosophical – the depth of thought is there, the false inhibitions just need to be loosened. Once we recognize our own repression of intellectuality, we can eliminate the silly need for any artificial courage, like liquor, to inspire us to share the individual wisdom we have.

A democracy like ours is made up of the sum of its constituent parts. As a result, the government's ability to make wise decisions depends entirely on the shared wisdom of each individual the government represents. When our country fails to act in a wise manner, it is the result of the diminishment of intellectuality. The shunning of critical thinking diminishes America's ability to produce wise decision-makers. If our society continues to shun the intellectuality of others and we each continue to shun our personal intellectuality, we have little hope of conquering the many challenges we face.

So invite intellectuality, because listening to the wisdom of others serves you, and to share your wisdom with others serves all humanity.

In lieu of tragedy, a plea for safety

Matt Kushi

With less than a week before the Presidential election, many people are getting tired of hearing of the forefront issues. One of those concerns guns. Before gun lovers and gun haters start getting hot under the collar, read this. This is about gun safety, not the Constitutional right to bear arms.

On Sunday, Oct. 26, an 8-year old Connecticut boy was pronounced dead after accidentally shooting himself in the head with a Micro Uzi machine gun at the Westfield Sportsman's Show.

The boy was legally allowed to use the weapon, as he had permission from his father and there was a certified instructor present watching. Despite the proper permission being given and despite the certified instructor monitoring, the end result was still the death of Christopher Bizili.

What happened was that Bizili was firing the gun at his target. A Micro Uzi is an automatic machine gun, smaller than the full size Uzi. However, since it is an automatic machine gun there is a certain amount of recoil when the gun is fired.

Since the gun was being fired in this manner, the gun never has a chance to reset to its starting position until after the trigger has been released. This causes inaccuracy in the gunner's aim. For a small kid, this recoil can become too much and cause the gun to rotate on the recoil more than it would for an adult. This is what happened to Bizili. He lost control of his aim and ended up shooting himself in the head.

This was a needless death. The father deserves some blame. While it is true that his son had fired guns before, none of them were sub-machine guns. The father should have had more common sense to judge that a machine gun would be too much for his son. The law also deserves some blame. The father stated that the reason why he let his son try and shoot the gun was because it was legal. Before I read that fact, I was thinking, "Why in the world was an 8-year old kid allowed to shoot a machine gun?" At the age of 8, I was having enough trouble trying to fire a BB gun without hurting myself.

Why should a kid in elementary school fire a gun that can be used by a SWAT team?

I believe that the law that led to Bizili's death needs to be amended. If the kid is firing a .22 rifle, that is one thing. A machine gun at that age? No, it doesn't make sense.

I do not have a problem with a kid firing a .22 rifle, which is a hunting rifle if he is competent enough to use it and is supervised. What I have a problem with is having a kid 'experiment' with a machine gun. A .22 rifle, with its 22 LR caliber bullets, has relatively light recoil. An Uzi, on the other hand, is a machine gun with rapid, hard recoil. I don't know many 8-year olds who can handle that at such a young age.

Most kids are just getting used to a BB gun recoil, which is almost non-existent, of a .22 rifle recoil if they are competent enough to use it on hunting trips with their family. A machine gun, however, should not be used by an 8-year old. I don't care how certified the instructor was or how skilled the kid was with guns, he should not have been allowed to fire an Uzi. Why should a child in elementary school fire a gun that can be used by a SWAT team?

What I would propose to amend this law is fairly simple and straightforward. Keep most of the laws the same, but prohibit kids of certain ages from firing certain guns. A 22-year old with a gun license wanting to fire an Uzi for fun at a shoot is a bit different than an 8-year old kid with BB gun experience wanting to shoot one.

Bizili's story and those similar to it, should raise this question to Americans: what is the proper age for a kid to fire a gun? We don't live in the days of the American Revolution or in the days of the Wild West. Teaching your kids how to fire a gun by the age of 8 is not as important as it once was.

If you want to teach a kid to fire a hunting rifle, air gun, or BB gun, that is fine as long as there is competent instruction and ability. If it doesn't seem safe, hold off for a bit. What is not necessary is allowing a kid to fire a machine gun at such a young age. The kid is just not strong enough yet to handle the gun's recoil.

Local poet returns

University of Massachusetts graduate 'comes full circle'

By Rivka Barrett
Collegian Correspondent

Kristin Bock read several poems from her newly published book, "Cloisters," while audience members listened intently, snacking on cheese and drinking wine.

Last Friday's reading at Amherst Books, set up in an area next to the bookstore entrance, was intimate but well-attended. Bock extended her gratitude to the audience, as well as Amherst Books, for allowing her to read.

A woman of multiple careers, Bock also teaches at the Isenberg School of Management at the University of Massachusetts, and restores liturgical paintings and statuary in local churches with her husband, muralist Geoffrey Kostecki. She received her M.F.A. in poetry from UMass in 1999.

"Everything, everywhere, especially nature, has this drama continually unfolding from it, which I hope my poetry allows me to capture from time to time," Bock said when asked where she derives inspiration from her work.

Much of the poetry in "Cloisters" is dark and centers on quiet reflection and solitude.

"The architecture of the book attempts to document a year of estrangement resulting from a betrayal," Bock said.

Indeed, the poems are arranged to represent the five stages of grief: denial, bargaining, anger, depression, and acceptance or forgiveness.

"The narrative also follows the four seasons which are marked by an arc of prayer of reflection, of abandonment, and of redemption," Bock said.

In her poem, "Restoring the Fourteen Stations of the Cross," the speaker looks down on the planet and observes human suffering. The tone of the poem is morbid, yet accepting. "He stumbled / He bled over stones / Everything was as it should be."

This poem was inspired by Bock's experience resturing 14 liturgical statuaries in bas-relief with her husband.

"I had the sensation of literally being the hand that created them," Bock said. "Thus, the speaker emerged as the voice of God."

"I am courted by the big ideas of God, art, language, death, and love in all of their complexities," she said. "I like the combination of beauty and discord, something potentially lethal smoldering over the next hill."

Bock also read "Portrait of the Artist with Rosetti's Sister," which was influenced by the real-life story of artist Dante Gabriel Rosetti, who buried his poetry with his dead wife, and later exhumed her body to retrieve it.

"We bury poems on their breasts, hoping they'll rise from the purgative dark of our waking dreams ... but in the end ... we dig and dig and dig because we have to take it all back," reads the poem.

"I can't say I consciously choose to write poetry," Bock said. "It chooses me. Even when I sit down and write a story, somehow it will turn into a poem."

As a graduate student, Bock gave her first poetry reading at Wootton's Bookstore, an independent business owned by Mark Wootton, who currently runs Amherst Books with partner Nat Herald.

"Reading at Amherst Books 10 years later was like coming full circle for me," Bock said. "Our local writers owe a debt of gratitude to Mark Wootton and Nat Herald for being an indefatigable force in our artistic community."

Bock has also read at the Forbes Library in Northampton, The Bookmill in Montague and the Rendez-Vous in Turners Falls.

"Poetry is an oral tradition when I'm writing a poem, I'm constantly reading it out loud ... listening to the music of the lines, the sound of the words and the silence in between," she said.

At Friday's reading, Bock was poised and cracked jokes, adding anecdotes to go along with her poetry. She also made herself available at the conclusion of the reading to mingle and answer questions from audience members.

She is a 2006 Massachusetts Cultural Council Fellow and her poems have appeared in several literary publications. She is also a contributing editor to the literary magazine "Bateau."

Bock hopes to do more readings at local bookstores in the future, and is also planning a New York City tour for the spring.

Bock will be reading at the Rendez-Vous on Dec. 8.

Collective to showcase gay films

Food for Thought welcomes all in series

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Staff

It is a poorly-kept secret that the Pioneer Valley has become something of a hotbed of gay/lesbian culture.

Its liberal attitude and large college presence have made the area a haven for many youth – especially those who feel cast out and alone in today's society.

This Thursday, several student organizations from the Valley will make their voices heard. Food for Thought Books will hold an evening of "queer films," and will screen three short films on the topic of fairness and tolerance for gays, lesbians, bisexuals, transgenders, and questioning youth (GLBTQ).

The headlining film of the evening is entitled "SUPA-FRIENDS: The Movie," and focuses on the lives and personalities of the members of the titular group.

Having little to do with the comic book alliance from which they take their name, "SUPA-FRIENDS" is an off-shoot of the Global Action Project, a worldwide organization dedicated to fighting injustice.

While there are dozens – if not hundreds – of equality groups in this country, what sets G.A.P. apart is their specific means of bringing social injustices to light.

While progressive social awareness is on the rise in this country much of what we see and hear is shown to us through the lens of Hollywood. It rarely comes from the source of the problem, and can be distorted for the purposes of entertainment and profit.

G.A.P. works to bring about a change in this system by providing young people, especially those directly affected by injustices, with the tools, know-how, and connections to produce thought-provoking media.

The organization believes that by allowing the people at the center of the social inequities to share their experiences with the world, they can help build solidarity and community power.

"SUPA-FRIENDS," in particular, focuses on GLBTQ. Currently in its fourth year, the group helps to build communities and encourages discussion on GLBTQ issues. Their film will focus on the "multiple identities" of each of its members.

The following two films of the evening will be shorter and a bit more lighthearted.

First off, Project Qwest will present "Three Queer Mice," a modern spin on the classic nursery rhyme.

The three-minute short, "Letting Go and Rising Up," will be shown next, which comments of the importance of gender-neutral-bathrooms.

These shorts have been produced by OutNow, a social action group involved with gay rights and awareness. Centered in Springfield, Mass., Project Qwest is an offshoot project, encouraging students to develop progressive media much like G.A.P. does.

"We have had a continuing relationship with the Qwest project" said Tanya Karakashian, a member of the Food for Thought collective, remarking on their past collaborations. "We had a series in the past called 'Film for Thought', but this event is independent."

Food for Thought Books, located at 106 N. Pleasant St. in Amherst center, is an employee-owned collective. Focusing on multicultural and socially-forward literature, the collective shares many goals with G.A.P. and OutNow.

"We specialize in radical and progressive faces and voices that have been silenced by the mainstream media," said Karakashian. "Ultimately we want people to come through and see the work, but the work and the conversation are both important. We want people to be able to talk about these issues."

The evening of youth made media will take place on Thursday, October 30, at 7 p.m. at Food for Thought Books in Amherst Center. After the screenings, attendees are encouraged to stay for further discussion and an information session provided by the creators of the films.

Classic Halloween movies still hold gore factor, laughs

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Staff

"Basketcase" (1982)

What could be scarier than a misshapen blob of teeth and flesh, stored inside an oversized basket? Frank Henenlotter ("Frankenhooker") directs this tale of Siamese twins – one ordinary, the other hideously deformed – out for revenge against the doctors who so callously separated them.

The brothers hit the Big Apple with bloodlust. Belial, the molten meatball of horrors, does the dirty work, leaving a trail of dead doctors and mangled hamburgers behind him. His brother Duane (Kevin van Hentenryck) does the heavy lifting, literally. "What's in the basket?" ask fellow boarders at the Hotel Broslin – nothing but the goriest, grossest, most gleefully demented schlock film of the early 1980s.

"I Spit on Your Grave" (1978)

Feminists beware. This lowrent exploitation film, originally released as "Day of the Woman," stunned viewers when it first hit theaters. Thirty years later, it's not hard to see why. Camille Keaton stars as Jennifer, a young writer on vacation in her country home in the hills. She hopes to get a little work done.

Instead, she's viciously and systematically brutalized by a pack of local men. Ravaged and left for dead, Jennifer recovers but isn't through with the men just yet. "I Spit on Your Grave" takes many cues from "Deliverance," crafting a tale of bloody revenge sick enough to turn the stomach of any viewer.

"Black Christmas" (1974)

Before she was Lois Lane, Margot Kidder co-starred in this oft-forgotten slasher classic, which inspired a string of imitators, including "Halloween" (1978) and "Friday the 13th" (1980).

Terror begins when a strange man enters the attic of a snow-covered sorority house, where a group of its sisters are spending Christmas. Strange phone calls begin to plague the girls, the caller breathing and moaning heavily into the phone. They joke at first, but soon realize that the calls carry deadly tidings. The image of Lynn Griffin in a rocking chair – a plastic bag wrapped around her lifeless, gasping face – makes for one of the most unsettling climaxes in horror movie history.

"Phantasm" (1979)

A mortuary undertaker terrorizes a sleepy town in the surrealistic, original "Phantasm." Pallid and silent, The Tall Man (Angus Scrimm) lurks the halls of the Morningside Funeral Home; an army of cloaked dwarves wait at his beck and call. What are they made of? The mismatched, rotting limbs of the recently deceased.

A set of flying silver orbs patrol the halls of the mortuary, drilling into the foreheads, sucking out brain matter of unwanted guests. The orbs are so bizarre and gruesome that they almost garnered an unheard of X-rating for the film upon theatrical release. Michael Baldwin and Bill Thornbury star as two locals who begin to suspect something is amiss at the funeral home.

"Zombi 2" (1979)

George Romero may be the master of zombie gore in America, but in Italy during the 1980s, Lucio Fulci commanded that prestige. Originally devised as a sequel to Romero's "Dawn of the Dead," Fulci's zombie masterwork is anything but a shameless duplicate. The slow-ambling zombies first appear on a cargo ship to New York. Pulled into the harbor by strong gales, the almost empty ship leads a pair of intrepid travelers to an island.

Mysteriously, the island has yielded scores of the living dead – putrid, decomposing, ravenous creatures whose hunger for flesh must be quenched. The New Yorkers don't stand a chance, and neither, do the remaining human inhabitants of the island.

"Zombi 2" has some pretty incredible scenes, from an eye being gouged out by a wooden splinter, to an underwater showdown between a tiger shark and zombie. If you have to guess who wins, you haven't been watching enough zombie movies.

"Whatever Happened to Baby Jane?" (1962)

It's hard to believe there was ever a soul in doubt of the incredible acting talents possessed by Joan Crawford and Bette Davis. But thanks to studio delusions, both actresses were considered has-beens by the early 1960s. In order to keep working, they were forced to accept acting jobs which, 20 years prior, would have been beneath them. Luckily for viewers, one such film became legend.

Burton classic survives

By Haley Navarro
Collegian Correspondent

Say what you must about Tim Burton – the man is a creative genius.

Though he didn't direct the stop-motion "The Nightmare Before Christmas," he produced it, based off of a poem he had written.

The film was released in 1993, yet it still is relevant today.

Disney decided to bank more money in 2006 and 2007 when they released the film in theaters for a second and third time, showing it in 3-D. The film made about $50 million in 1993, and it made another $24 million in 2006 and 2007.

"The Nightmare Before Christmas" is a faint look into the different seasons. The narrator starts the film by introducing the audience to a circle of trees that enter into the different towns of the seasons. It mostly focuses on Halloween Town, where the main character, Jack Skellington, lives.

Jack is the "Pumpkin King" and the plot begins by showing Jack's boredom with Halloween. He then discovers a circle of trees and accidentally stumbles upon Christmas Town, therefore deciding to take over Santa Claus' position and distribute toys on Christmas Eve.

Other notable characters include Jack's love interest, Sally (a ragdoll), the bipolar Mayor of Halloween Town, and the antagonist Oogie Boogie, who is comprised of bugs and enjoys gambling.

However, this movie additionally serves as musical entertainment. Danny Elfman scored the entire film, as well as serving as Jack's singing voice.

While some songs have lyrics and others are completely instrumental and the soundtrack was released in two different formats.

The first, which was released in 2006, contains all the songs in the movie, plus five covers performed by artists such as Marilyn Manson and Fiona Apple.

"Nightmare Revisited," the second soundtrack to accompany the movie, is a complete cover album with artists such as RJD2, Amy Lee and Shiny Toy Guns.

With the success of these albums, as well as the movie sales each autumn, it seems like more artists will jump on the bandwagon to recreate the classic songs.

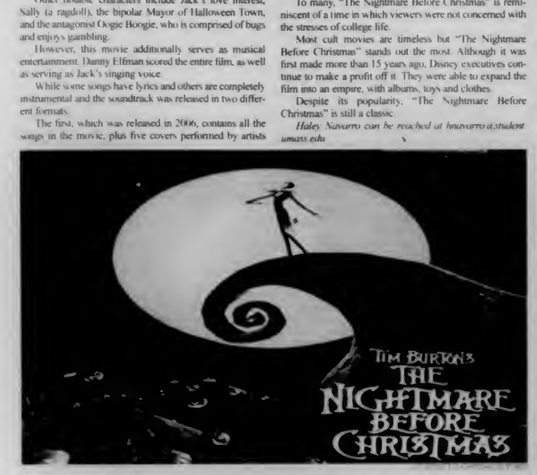
Since its release, "The Nightmare Before Christmas" has become somewhat of a cult movie.

'Nightmare' merchandise is sold at stores like Hot Topic, alongside spike bracelets and parachute pants and the film's characters are often the focus of tattoos. Furthermore, mainstream bands are being paid to sing Danny Elfman's songs.

What does this say about our culture?

After so many years, children still hold "The Nightmare Before Christmas" in high regard.

Sweatshirts with Jack's skull embroidered on them are often seen on campus, proving that even college students are partial to reliving their childhood memories by watching this movie.



"I've been watching it every year since I was six, from October until December," said University of Massachusetts junior, Laura Nichols. "I can sing the entire soundtrack. It's a childhood staple for me."

To many, "The Nightmare Before Christmas" is reminiscent of a time in which viewers were not concerned with the stresses of college life.

Most cult movies are timeless but "The Nightmare Before Christmas" stands out the most. Although it was first made more than 15 years ago, Disney executives continue to make a profit off it. They were able to expand the film into an empire, with albums, toys and clothes.

Despite its popularity, "The Nightmare Before Christmas" is still a classic.

Tim Burton's "The Nightmare Before Christmas" proves to be an annual classic for all ages, despite the fact that it was originally released over a decade ago.

Vacant terrain for 'Thunder' writer

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

Justin Theroux's movie, "Tropic Thunder," will be shown on campus this Halloween weekend.

After some theater work, the up-and-coming actor-turned-director-turned-screenwriter made his cinematic debut in Marry Harron's "I Shot Andy Warhol," and soon began popping up on television and other big screen films.

His resume is impressive, spanning more than 20 feature films, including "Mulholland Drive" and "American Psycho."

He's tried his hand in directing ("Dedication") and screenwriting ("Tropic Thunder"), but now has his sights set "Iron Man 2," which he is trying to finish up before the end of November.

Between meetings in L.A., Justin took a break from his jam-packed schedule to talk with The Daily Collegian.

Daily Collegian: So how did you get interested in the subject of film? Early on, were there inspirations, certain movies or directors that really influenced your affinity with cinema?

Justin Theroux: I guess you could say that there were different influences for each discipline. I didn't really have a sophisticated taste in high school or anything like that. I think I saw "Eraserhead" pretty early, and only until college was I exposed to movies like "Blue Velvet" and David Lynch's other stuff. I remember seeing the [advertisement] poster for the first time. It was almost overwhelming. But I mean, there's always "The Simpsons," too. That show has the ability to cut right to it, on whatever subject they're addressing. Whatever joke they make, it cuts to the heart of it. And that's just brilliant.

DC: I know that you used to love to graffiti. Do you find time to still do things like that? Any art to speak of?

JT: (laughs) Well, I still doodle every once in awhile. But no, not really anything substantial. I find myself pretty busy, but I do keep a sketchbook. Sometimes I'll paint something on my wall.

DC: How did you make the jump from actor to director to screenwriter? Mostly coincidences, or was it always a direction you envisioned?

JT: It certainly wasn't the direction I envisioned; it just seemed the most logical. I found myself wanting more control over the product I was making. I guess you could say it was coincidence, but it wasn't too difficult. I knew many producers, and it was an easy road, more or less, to switch roles.

DC: I would imagine living in New York City is pretty inspirational. Do you like living in the city? You're in L.A. now, right?

JT: Yeah, I've been working out here for a bit. And these cities are really different. In New York, you have a lot of face time with strangers, and I love that. But in L.A., it's like you're living in a bubble. It seems like a cyclical atmosphere, people are in their own world over here. You're always in a car, or in someone's apartment, or on the phone.

DC: Deerhoof played here last Friday night, and I know they were a huge part of "Dedication," your directorial debut. What was it like working with them?

JT: Oh, awesome. Yeah, they're great. I've known them for a while, and they were just really great. Their music seemed to fit perfectly the movie, the story in general. They are really so gifted, and the music for the soundtrack was fantastic.

DC: Should we expect Deerhoof to be featured in the "Iron Man 2" soundtrack?

JT: (laughs) I don't know about that. I don't know if we could afford them now.

DC: So, regarding the publicity of "Tropic Thunder," were you surprised? With the blackface issue and the "going full retard," I'm guessing that the negative responses were at least a little expected.

JT: Well we were conscious of what we were doing, obviously. But honestly, they were not expected. When we first previewed the movie, there was virtually no negative reaction to [Robert] Downey's character. And while I care deeply about groups who give aid to the mentally challenged, I don't understand the argument. The movie was meant as a joke on actors and Hollywood in general. People certainly got offended, but I think they just didn't understand the joke.

DC: Since the movie really rips apart Hollywood, does that signify your personal attitude? As an actor and director, you've managed to maintain an image that's very toned-down. Do you oppose the idea of celebrity at all?

JT: I guess you can say it is just good credo of mine. I've had no career plan for myself; I just do what I do. I've said "no" wisely a lot of times, but I certainly have made some bad decisions. I'm pretty lucky to have remained under the radar, in all the good ways. Concerning ["Tropic Thunder"], the biggest joke is on power and money and all that. It's a world that exists in Hollywood. It's funny, some characters are heavily inspired by specific people, celebrities, but no one really thinks the joke is on them.

DC: You've appeared on "Air America" a few times, with Janeane Garofalo, and have done a few spotlights with PETA. Do you find time to do this?

JT: I mean, I've only been on that radio show a handful of times. I think three or four times? But Janeane is a good friend, and she's fun, but I'm just a sidekick. The service announcement for PETA was a great experience, too, and now I'm into Farm Sanctuary, a rehabilitation center for all animals. They're based out of New York.

DC: Now for a fun question: What are you riding?

JT: (laughs) A Ducati, actually. The Ducati Hypermotard to be specific. It's great, it goes fast.

DC: And just one last question. What have you been listening to?

JT: Um, let's see. A lot of Lynyrd Skynyrd, actually. And the Raconteurs. Beck, too, I saw him play not too long ago. I guess the Luna Chicks, some Dead Milk Men, oh, and the Streets. The new album is really good.

DC: Alright, thanks so much. Do you want to end with any advice?

JT: Uh… well, I barely follow my own advice, so I guess not.

Crawford is Blanche, a successful actress, now confined to a wheelchair and under Jane's care. Jane slowly tortures her sister, starving and siphoning off her cash supply, all the while harboring hopes of becoming a famous star again.

"NIGHT OF THE DEMONS" (1988)

Angela (Amelia Kinkade) is hosting a Halloween party, and she desperately wants you to come. She and a group of friends sneak into an abandoned mortuary with plans to party hard enough to wake the dead.

After a fun-filled séance, the teens do just that: awakening a demonic force that then proceeds to possess their souls. Cute teens become red-eyed demons who levitate through the halls and sneak up on teens having sex in coffins. "Hey lady, I live in a nice house with plastic seat covers on the furniture," says one teen, before being pounced on by a topless demon covered in lipstick. Plenty of laughs and scares are had with "Night of the Demons." A habitually underrated B-movie of the 1980s, "Demons" is one film worth fishing in the discount bin for.

British singer's career takes another detour

By Len Right
The Morning Call

The most dramatic moment of an animated phone conversation with Alison Moyet comes just before it's over. "This tour is a rarity," says the Brit pop singer, who is performing solo in North America for the first time in 14 years, "and likely to be the last time it happens."

Moyet is now 47, and though she is a star in the U.K. and Europe, having won several BRIT awards as well as racking up massive record sales and accolades playing Matron "Mama" Morton in the West End production of the musical "Chicago" in 2001, she is best known stateside as the shapelier soulful singing half of the '80s synth-pop duo Yaz ("Only You," "Don't Go," "Situation").

Last summer, Moyet reunited with Yaz partner Vince Clarke for a series of well-received – and well-attended – live dates.

But at the moment she is feeling anxious about her solo tour. "There are a couple of things that don't fall in my favor," frets the feisty chanteuse, speaking from Toronto. "Tickets went on sale only three weeks before the tour began, and not having been (in North America) for 14 years doesn't help, especially with a tough economy."

Moyet will be backed by a pianist, bassist, drummer, guitarist and violinist/backing vocalist as she performs songs from her latest CD, "The Turn," which was released a year ago to mostly favorable reviews, and vintage material.

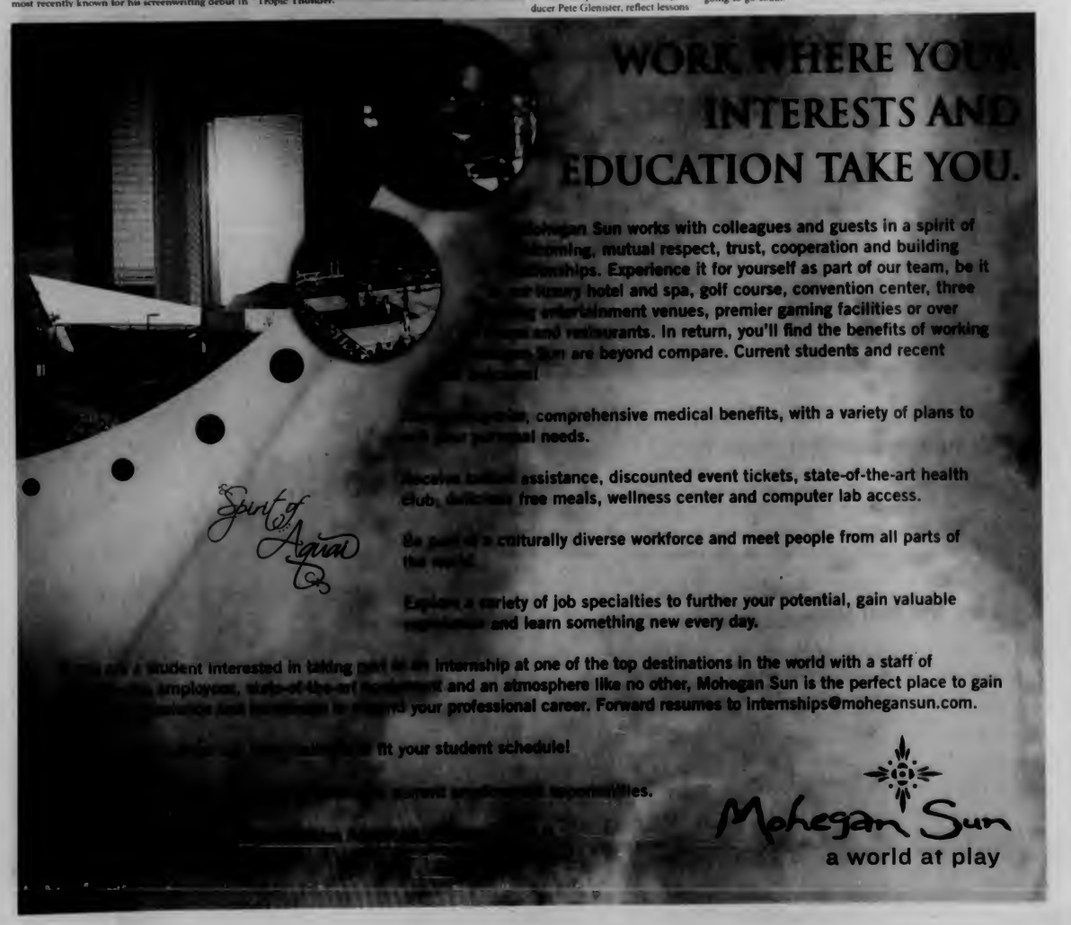
"The Turn" tunes, co-written with her frequent collaborator, producer Pete Glenister, reflect lessons about love Moyet has learned over the course of two marriages and three children (she has a son who is 23 and daughters who are 20 and 12).

"Every project comes from a different place," she says. "With 'The Turn,' I was looking to make a CD full of melody and intelligent lyricism. It's quite awash with psycho acrobatics."

On the opening track, "One More Time," Moyet describes a woman hemmed in by her feelings for her man, but accepting the co-dependent nature of the arrangement.

On the equally emotional "Anytime at All," the singer pledges not only unwavering fidelity, but asserts she would change her life for her man. Moyet admits she usually would avoid such a lyric. "That's why I won't sing (her 1984 Lamont Dozier-penned hit) 'Invisible,'" she says, "because there's a kind of misogyny in it. But with 'Anytime,' there's a darkness in the lyric where there is a more gentle openness. Trying to get to that, that was the challenge in doing it."

Moyet sounds almost cruel as she delivers the vinegary sentiments of the cabaret-flavored "Home," one of three "Turn" tunes she wrote for the stage play "Smaller." "It's less about cruelty and more about blunt speaking," says Moyet. "It's about a middle-aged woman disappointed with her lot. When you're lived in, and you're dealing with younger (people) in love for the first time, many times you encourage them. Sometimes, though, you want to say, '(Screw) off. It's all going to go south.'



The disc's final track, "A Guy Like You," is a full, orchestrated Nona Hendryx-style soul-pop hit in waiting, with Moyet trying to keep tabs on an in-demand pop star. She wrote the song to prove a point.

Moyet's eclectic musical tastes are rooted in her upbringing. Her French father listened to chanson (lyric-driven French songs), her English mother to classical music. Her brother was a prog-rock fan and her sister a soul girl. "I found passion in all those things," Moyet says.

And though she has often been portrayed as a devotee of the late British soul singer Dusty Springfield (1939-99), "I wasn't a big fan growing up," says Moyet, who along with Sinead O'Connor, backed Springfield in 1995 on the BBC music show "Later With Jools Holland."

In 1985, Moyet performed at the historic Live Aid concert at Wembley alongside Paul Young. Later, Moyet was asked by Paul McCartney to join Bob Geldof, David Bowie and Pete Townshend in a rendition of "Let It Be."

Asked to reminisce about that day, Moyet says, "I was asked if I wanted to do this charity gig, and I said, 'OK,' thinking it was at Wembley Arena, which holds 7,000, not Wembley Stadium (which holds 72,000). So I went there and was told, 'This way to the helicopter.' I thought, 'Helicopter?' The next thing I knew I was sharing a helicopter ride with David Bowie and Bono. When we landed, there's Roger Daltrey waving at me and Freddie Mercury blowing kisses at me. I've never seen anything like it before or since."

Teams shift ranks after high-scoring Saturday games

CAA claims nine spots in weekly poll, keep improving

By Jared Gardner
Collegian Correspondent

James Madison got the 35-yard, miracle touchdown it needed as time expired to maintain the No. 1 ranking in the Football Championship Subdivision's Top 25 poll for the sixth straight week. JMU defeated Villanova 23-19 on Saturday.

JMU received 98 of the possible 104 first-place votes. If JMU had lost the game, Appalachian State would likely have become the new No. 1 team. The Dukes (7-1-0, 5-0-0 Colonial Athletic Association) will head home to face unranked Delaware next weekend.

FCS Top 25

Despite the loss, Villanova (5-2-0, 3-1-0 CAA) remained the No. 7 team in the FCS poll. After traveling to Brookline next week, the only real test left on the Wildcats' schedule will be at home against new No. 9 New Hampshire.

UNH moved up one spot in the poll after blowing out Towson, 42-14.

The Wildcats (6-1-0, 3-0-0 CAA) still have tough road games at Villanova and No. 15 Massachusetts.

Appalachian State kept its No. 2 ranking for another week after defeating No. 18 Furman, 26-14.

The Mountaineers (6-2-0, 4-0-0 Southern Conference) will meet with No. 3 Wofford in what could be one of the biggest games in the FCS this year.

Wofford moved up one spot to No. 3 after destroying former No. 7 Elon, 55-20. The Terriers (6-1-0, 4-0-0 Southern Conference) upcoming showdown with Appalachian State will most likely determine who will claim the Southern Conference title.

California Polytechnic jumped two spots, from No. 6 to No. 4, in record-setting fashion, after outgunning Southern Utah 69-41 in an offensive show. The Mustangs (5-1-0, 2-0 Great West) will finish their regular season by facing Wisconsin, the Football Bowl Subdivision powerhouse.

JUMP IN RANKINGS

The schools with the biggest rankings change were William & Mary, South Carolina State, Elon and McNeese State.

William & Mary had the biggest leap in the poll, jumping seven spots, from No. 23 to No. 16, after defeating Rhode Island 34-24 in its homecoming game.

The Tribe (5-2-0, 3-1-0 CAA) will head to Maryland to face off against Towson.

South Carolina State went from unranked to No. 22 ranking in the FCS poll after defeating Hampton 35-15 at home.

Thanks to a 55-20 defeat at the hands of Wofford, Elon fell seven spots in this weeks FCS rankings.

The Phoenix (7-2-0, 5-1-0 Southern Conference) who entered last week's game at No. 3, are hanging on by a thread in the Top 10.

McNeese State saw the biggest drop in the poll, falling nine spots, from No. 11 to No. 20, after a 38-35 loss against Nicholls State, a squad that didn't receive one Top-25 vote.

Massachusetts rebounded from a homecoming loss to Richmond by overpowering the first-year FCS team Bryant.

Led by five touchdowns and more than 300 yards from quarterback Liam Coen, the Minutemen (5-3-0, 2-2-0 CAA) went from No. 17 to No. 15. The only remaining game against a ranked team for the Minutemen is a clash with the rival UNH Wildcats in Durham, N.H., in three weeks.

The latest FCS poll added no new teams to the Top 10, although some teams did change position. Northern Iowa remained at No. 5, while Montana climbed two spots to No. 6, and Richmond moved up one spot to No. 8, despite walking all over unranked Georgetown, 48-0.

Other teams that climbed in this week's poll include Central Arkansas, who climbed to No. 11.

Weber State jumped three spots to No. 13 and Liberty rose three spots to No. 17 after a defining 42-0 win over Charleston Southern.

Harvard continued to be the only Ivy League team in the Top 25, climbing two spots to No. 23 after defeating Princeton 24-20 in a conference matchup.

NOTES

CAA teams took up four of the top nine positions in the poll and had six in the Top 25. The Southern Conference had the second most with four teams in the Top 25 poll.

Cal Poly put up more than 600 yards of total offense in its 69-41 win over Southern Utah. Cal Poly quarterback Jonathan Daly and wide receiver Ramses Barden became the first pair of teammates this season to be named FCS Co-Players of the Week.

Barden broke Jerry Rice's NCAA record of receiving touchdowns in a career. Barden caught both the record-tying and record-breaking passes in the game.

Daly tied his school record by throwing for six touchdowns to go along with 410 yards.

Elon ended its longest winning streak (seven) since 1981 against Wofford last weekend.

Through nine weeks of play, Dayton (11-2-2, 5-0-1 Atlantic 10) remains undefeated in conference play. The Flyers recorded a 1-0 shutout over Fordham on Oct. 24 and added a 3-1 victory over La Salle two days later.

Atlantic 10 Soccer

Dayton's junior midfielder Alex Torda was named co-Player of the Week for the second time this season after scoring two goals against La Salle and recording the game-winning assist against the Rams. Torda's eight goals and 19 points lead the Flyers and rank fourth in the league in points.

Massachusetts (5-6-3, 3-1-1 A-10) continues its strong conference play after defeating Richmond, 2-1, in overtime on Oct. 24 and blanking George Washington 2-0 two days later. The latest victory pushed the Minutemen into second place in the A-10 Conference standings.

Rhode Island (6-5-1, 2-1-2 A-10) remains in the top half of conference standings as it tied its previous two games against George Washington and Richmond. Senior forward Kedan Crosby notched a goal against George Washington and added an assist against the Spiders. Freshman forward Erkko Puranen scored both goals against Richmond, earning Rookie of the Week honors.

Temple (7-4-3, 3-1-1 A-10) defeated cross-town rival Saint Joseph's, 2-0, on Oct. 25. The victory stabilized the Owls' position near the top of the A-10 conference. Currently, they are tied with Massachusetts at second and trail Dayton by six points. Junior midfielder Matt Chevrolier and sophomore midfielder Brian Weinhardt each scored a goal during the last 20 minutes of play to secure the victory.

Xavier (2-10-3, 1-3-2 A-10) is no longer winless in conference play, as the Musketeers defeated La Salle, 1-0, before falling 2-1 to Fordham two days later.

The Musketeers' senior midfielder Jimmy Cummings scored his first goal of the season against La Salle late in the second half to give Xavier the shutout victory. Ryan Englemann, Xavier's freshman goalkeeper, made both starts that weekend, recording 10 saves.

St. Bonaventure (4-4-4, 2-2-1 A-10) recorded a 2-0 win over Duquesne in its only match of the week. Sophomore goalkeeper David Flynn posted the shutout as he picked up eight saves.

Flynn's .835 save percentage also leads the league as he earned co-Player of the Week honors.

Saint Joseph's (3-6-2, 0-4-1 A-10) remains winless in conference play after suffering a 2-0 shutout against Temple in its only game of the week on Oct. 25. The Hawks' poor conference play is highlighted by being outscored 10-0 in their previous three games. They managed just two shots on goal against Temple.

After starting the season strong, Charlotte (10-4-1, 2-2-1 A-10) are .500 in conference play. The 49ers suffered a 3-2 loss to Saint Louis in its only contest of the week on Oct. 25.

Senior forward Chris Salvaggione scored the first goal and recorded an assist on the second. Salvaggione now leads the 49ers with 11 goals, the most by a Charlotte player since 2004. He also leads the conference in points with 29.

Roswess takes on new role for Minutemen

Scoring no longer issue for Minutemen after weekend

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Finishing has been the Massachusetts men's soccer team's problem since the start of the season, but after scoring eight goals in three of its last four games that no longer seems to be a problem.

High expectations and a No. 13 preseason ranking seemed too much for UMass in August. After losing its first game to Holy Cross on Aug. 29 the team fell off the charts, but now the Minutemen have turned their season around and after two successful weekends they extended their unbeaten streak to four games.

Before Oct. 17 the Minutemen struggled to accumulate points, but after their win over St. Bonaventure they have shown they can score. Since the 4-1 win, the Minutemen (5-6-3, 3-1-1 Atlantic 10) have scored eight goals, more than doubling their total. They have 13 goals thus far.

UMass Soccer

With 10 points, UMass is tied with Temple (7-4-3, 3-1-1 A-10) for second place in conference standings. Sitting in first is Dayton (11-2-2, 5-0-1 A-10), with 16 points. With four games remaining (three A-10 games) before the A-10 tournament, the Minutemen need to keep up their momentum as they challenge La Salle (Nov. 2), No. 23 Saint Louis (Nov. 7) and No. 24 Charlotte (Nov. 9).

SWITCHING THINGS UP

Freshman Chris Roswess has moved into a starting position at attack with junior Mark DeSantis, replacing last season's leading scorer, junior Bryan Hogan. Roswess and DeSantis started both games in the Minutemen's two wins last weekend while Hogan and senior Prince Ofosu came in off the bench.

"[Roswess has] played very well. He's worked hard in training and he's deserved to start," said UMass coach Sam Koch. "He's taken it and done a great job with it."

Though Roswess's improvements have moved Hogan to the bench, that doesn't mean the reserves aren't getting as much playing time. On Sunday, DeSantis totaled 57 minutes, Roswess played for 48 minutes and Hogan and Ofosu played for 42 minutes.

"It's sort of deceiving with our team because you have Hogan and Prince that come off the bench that play just about as many minutes [as DeSantis and Roswess]," Koch said. "Starting is nice because you are out there for the start of the game, but I think all four of them are doing a good job."

Hogan and Ofosu have been contributing more as reserves. Ofosu is known to be better coming off the bench than starting the match and it shows. The second group of attackers were on the field for both of the Minutemen's goals in the 2-0 win over George Washington on Sunday.

"I think all of them help each other out, whether it is the first group wearing down the defense for the second group or vice-versa," Koch said. "The four of them are all playing, I think, equally well. Any of them can start. I think Prince comes off the bench better out of those four, he's better coming off the bench where the other three I think any of them can start. It's a little bit of a dilemma, but when the team wins I don't think anyone cares."

PLAYMAKER

Sophomore Ben Arikian, a key performer on set pieces, has played an important role in UMass' wins this season. Against the Colonials on Sunday, he assisted on Stuart Thomson's game-winning goal when he took the corner kick and placed it perfectly for Thomson to head it in.

Arikian scored the first goal of the game in UMass' 4-1 win over St. Bonaventure on Oct. 17. In UMass' 1-0 win against Siena (Sept. 6), Arikian was awarded the assist when senior Chris Brown headed in the game-winning goal off of Arikian's set piece. Arikian scored the game-winning goal minutes into the second overtime in the Minutemen's 3-2 double-overtime win against Boston University on Aug. 31.

This season, Arikian leads the team in assists (three), and has two goals for seven points, good enough for third on the team. Arikian can be seen on the field for almost the entire game. He played the full 90 minutes on Sunday and totals 1,239 minutes this season, playing in all of UMass' 14 games, starting in 13 of them.

FOUR GAMES OF FIRSTS

The last four games have brought many firsts for the Minutemen. Roswess scored his first goal of the season against Richmond and, in theory, Thomson tallied his first two goals of the season over the weekend.

"Technically, I scored against my team [on Friday], so that could have been my first collegiate goal, but [the game-winning goal against George Washington] was for my team so I'm excited about that," Thomson said.

Hogan earned his first point of the season when he assisted Ofosu's goal on Sunday. DeSantis scored his first, second and third goals of the season this weekend – the first two coming against St. Bonaventure, the other in the 2-1 win against Richmond last Friday. DeSantis and Hogan led the Minutemen in goals last season.

The Minutemen's win over the Spiders was the first time this year that a UMass a game has ended in a single overtime. This season, the Minutemen have seen five overtime games that went into the second OT, and three of those five ended in ties.

FRESHMEN STEPPING UP

The freshmen class has been improving this season and taking on bigger roles for the Minutemen. As the season has progressed they have begun to understand their roles and learned the team's systems.

"They are protecting the ball better, they aren't giving it away as much," Koch said. "I think Roswess gets better and better each week. Bryant Craft floats in and out sometimes. He hasn't been as consistent as we'd like him to be, but each week I think he gets a little bit more consistent and they understand the system better. They have all been strong contributors."

The Minutemen have some freshmen that don't see as much playing time as Roswess and Craft. David Key has played 21 minutes in two games and Chris Gilbert has seen 128 minutes on the field in six games.

"[Key and Gilbert] are contributing as well and doing a good job in training, we just can't get them all on the field," Koch said.

The Minutemen play again on Halloween at La Salle.

GRASS STAINS

Koch earned his 250th career win on Sunday in UMass' 2-0 win over George Washington. Koch's 200th win came against the same team on Oct. 3, 2003, in the Minutemen's 3-0 victory.

Seniors Chris Brown and Mike DeSantis tied the UMass record for most career games at 79 on Sunday.

It was also Brown's 79th career start — Ofosu's goal on Sunday put him back in the lead in points (nine) and goals (four) for the Minutemen.

Melissa Turtinen can be reached at mturtinen@dailycollegian.com

Junior Mark DeSantis went half the season without scoring a goal, but in the last four games he has tallied three goals. DeSantis and UMass look to continue their four game unbeaten streak.

Meyers' still surprising

31 shots in UMass' tie against the Wildcats.

Most of those shots coming with many UNH attackers in front of the net obstructing Meyers' view.

With Paul Dainton recovering from an injury, Cahoon doesn't think the goaltending situation will become difficult as Dainton inches closer to being able to play, but make the Minutemen better as a team.

At this point in the season Meyers has posted a 1.47 Goals Against Average, .948 save percentage and a 2-1-1 record as the starter, impressing everyone.

IT'S GOOD TO BE HOME

The Minutemen have yet to play a game at home until this Friday against Providence.

The Mass Attack are currently the only team in the Hockey East that has yet to play game at their own confines.

Last year at home the Minutemen posted a 8-3-4 record at the Mullins Center.

They hope that they can continue that success back in Amherst.

MEET AND GREET

The Minutemen are will be holding a Meet and Greet session tonight from 6-8 p.m. at the Union Billiards room in the lower level of the campus center.

This will be your last chance to meet the team before their home-opener Friday night.

Ryan Fleming can be reached at rfleming@student.umass.edu

A catalyst on the Minutemen defense, Justin Braun has taken over as one of the leaders on the ice. Braun has registered one assist this season.

JMU stunning at finish again

New Hampshire success, Rhode Island troubles

BY JAY ASSER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

For the second consecutive week, James Madison pulled out an improbable victory in the late stages of a game.

The Dukes followed up a punt return for a touchdown with one second remaining two weeks ago with a 35-yard Hail Mary for a touchdown this past week as time expired in regulation.

The two thriller wins for James Madison came at the expense of conference foes, Richmond (6-3, 3-2 Colonial Athletic Association) and Villanova respectively and raised the Dukes' record to a perfect 5-0 in the CAA.

CAA

The loss for Villanova (5-2, 3-1 CAA) snapped its impressive nine-game home win streak which dated back to Nov. 4, 2006.

After dropping the first match-up of the season to Duke (4-3, 1-2 Atlantic Coast Conference) in a 31-7 loss, James Madison has reeled off seven consecutive victories in which its scored at least 23 points. Much of the Dukes' success this season can be attributed to their offense, which has scored over 50 points in three victories.

There's no question that the leader of the Dukes' high-powered offense is redshirt senior quarterback, Rodney Landers. After directing a come-from-behind win last game against Villanova, Landers was named the CAA Football Offensive Player of the Week. Landers finished the day with 184 passing yards, 133 rushing yards and a career-high three touchdown passes, including the final play of the game when he found Bosco Williams for a 35-yard game-winner.

The victory gave Landers' eight passing touchdowns in his last three contests and extended his streak to four-straight games without throwing an interception.

JMU (7-1, 5-0 CAA) looks to continue its hot streak when it hosts Delaware (3-5, 1-3 CAA) this Saturday for Homecoming.

LOST IN THE SHUFFLE

Overshadowed by the excitement of James Madison the past few weeks has been New Hampshire (6-1, 3-1 CAA), second in the CAA conference.

The Wildcats have nearly matched the Dukes' step for step this season, coming up short in only one contest against conference opponent, William & Mary (5-2, 3-1 CAA).

Junior defensive back, Ryan Hinds, led the Wildcats' defense last week in a 42-14 routing of conference foe, Towson (3-5, 1-3 CAA).

Hinds received CAA Football Defensive Player of the Week honors after intercepting Tigers quarterback, Sean Schaefer, on two occasions. Hinds finished the day with a total of 109 yards in interception returns, 78 of which came on a return for a touchdown.

New Hampshire hosts Hofstra (3-5, 1-3 CAA) this week in search of their fourth conference victory of the season.

URI SEARCHING FOR WIN

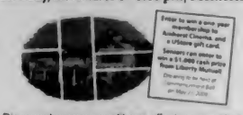
Inconsistent play on offense has led Rhode Island (2-7, 0-5 CAA) to a winless conference record this season.

After starting off the season with a hard-fought victory against Monmouth (5-3, 4-0 Midwest Conference), URI has lost seven of its last eight games.

In the first five matchups of the season, the Rams' offense struggled and was held scoreless twice. However, in the last five contests, the offense has averaged 25 points per game and seems to be on the rise.



Rhode Island looks to end its conference woes when it hosts Massachusetts (5-3, 2-2 CAA) this Saturday in Kingston.

Fischer leads UMass program, preparing it for the future

BY NICK BUSH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the past three seasons, the Massachusetts men's cross country team has been on the rise.

But finally is now considered to be in possession of one of the top seven lineups in the Northeast.

Led by senior Nils Fischer, who came in 23rd in a field of 295 runners, UMass finished sixth at the prestigious Paul Short Invitational at Lehigh University on Oct. 23.

The invitational featured five of the top 20 teams in the country.

About five years ago, however, the picture was quite different and recruiting was at a near crisis for the track and field team.

And along came Fischer.

"Our program suffered a setback, with the status of the indoor track program in jeopardy due to budget cuts," said UMass coach Ken O'Brien, recalling the dire state of the track and field team's courtship of potential runners.

"This made our recruiting very difficult, as word spread around to parents and recruits that we might not have an indoor track program to complement our outdoor [track] and cross country programs.

"We lost quite a few recruits, but ultimately we were able to have indoor track reinstated the next season," O'Brien continued.

"The first major recruit to say 'yes,' and make a commitment to our team after that, was Nils. This opened the doors, and got our program back on the ground. ... If he didn't do it, I'm not sure who would have."

Fischer carried a long family history of distance running. His grandfather ran at the collegiate level in the 1940s.

His father and uncle, for Cornell and Syracuse, respectively.

Nils was a stand-out at Nashoba Regional High School by his senior year, and one of the better runners in the state.

"Just hearing about my dad running made me want to give it a shot around the beginning of high school," Fischer said when asked what made him pick up the sport. "I had been very active as a kid, so I guess that paid off."

"Active" does not do justice to the lifestyle of a collegiate cross country runner, who has a schedule consisting of more than 100 miles a week in training.

"Discipline is a big thing," he said. "Staying on top of all the little things; there are days where it is not always easy to go out there, especially in the winter. I guess that is how I try and lead on the team – by example."

The reward for these athletes is very different than what is normal in other American sports.

"The pump and circumstance of pep rallies and media attention, or the idea of hundreds of people caring intimately about the results ... these types of external motivators are not evident very often in this sport," O'Brien said.

"Great runners are internally driven by their personal goals. They have to look themselves in the eye."

After arriving at UMass, Nils quickly made a name for himself and was elected to the All-Conference Team as a sophomore.

"I didn't expect to be one of the top runners," he said.

"As a team, we have grown so much over the past couple years. A lot of the older guys saw it coming – that we were a team on the rise. It's an individual sport, but it is a team sport at the same time."

At the Paul Short Invitational, Fischer not only led the Minutemen, but cut nearly 30 seconds off of his time at the event last year.

"[At Paul Short] we did really well," Fischer said. "Our top seven has huge depth."

This weekend holds a big race.

The Minutemen traveled to Indiana, where they have a chance to return for Nationals later in the year, according to Fischer.

The Minutemen finished 20th of 41 teams. Though Fischer didn't score in the meet, he finished 7 seconds after David Johnson – who finished 106 out of 276 runners.

If they could earn a trip to Nationals, Fischer and the rest of the cross country team now stands a chance of competing with the best in the nation.

Such a performance would only reinforce how far the team has traveled over the past few years, and how much lost ground Fischer and his teammates have helped the program regain.

After spending last semester abroad in Great Britain, Fischer returned this year as fast as ever.

He spent his time across the Atlantic Ocean, training with running partner Adam Grice, who now runs for the English national team.

"It was nice to get a new perspective. I was used to running in front of my teammates at practice, but Adam was much faster than I am," Fischer said. "It taught me a lot to run behind someone like him."

Back at home, however, Fischer is again at the head of the pack.

Now the senior runner is using his experience to carry the team, which is still working on its own type of comeback.

Nick Bush can be reached at nbush@student.umass.edu

Senior Nils Fischer returned for the 2008 cross country season after studying abroad in Great Britain while practicing behind Adam Grice, who now runs for the English national team.

49ers ranked No. 25, Bonnies improving

Charlotte ranked for first time in 25 years, St. Bonaventure program starting to see upside

BY JEFFREY ENGMANN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Charlotte 49er women find themselves in a place they haven't been in five years.

For the first time since Oct. 2003, the Soccer nation poll has ranked the 49ers as one of the top 25 teams in the nation.

Sporting an impressive 13-3-1 record, the 49ers sit atop of the Atlantic 10 conference with just two games left.

The No. 25 ranking comes on the heels of yet another undefeated week.

Atlantic 10

The 49ers won their two divisional games to remain undefeated in the A-10.

On Oct. 24, freshman Jonna Handra kicked the 49ers past Dayton in the 73rd minute, to come out with a 2-1 victory.

Handra, who at the end of the week took home both player and rookie of the week honors for the conference, notched her sixth goal of the season, to lead her team to victory.

Two days later on Oct. 26 the 49ers blew out Xavier on senior day 5-0. Handra scored two goals in the match.

The team has not lost a game in since Sept. 14th, as they ride a 10-game winning streak heading into their matchups this week against Rhode Island and Massachusetts.

During this span, the team has been dominant, scoring 45 goals while allowing just five.

Offensively, the team has reached unprecedented heights, scoring more goals (60) than any team in school history.

Led by junior Hailey Bailey's 13 goals and 12 assists, the team is the second highest scoring team in the nation.

However, to outscore opponents by 40 in a span of 10 games does require some defense.

Charlotte's defense has been anchored all season by junior goalkeeper Lauren Brown.

The 49ers soccer program is beginning to establish themselves one of the best in the A-10.

The 49ers won the A-10 Championship last year and appear to be on a strong course to repeat.

BONNIES ON THE RISE

In just three years St. Bonaventure women's soccer coach Manoj Khettry has already made an impact on his soccer program.

After recording just five wins last season, the Bonnie's reached the double-digit mark with a 3-0 victory against Saint Joseph's on Oct. 26.

It marks the first time the team has reached the 10-win plateau in six years.

More importantly, the win was the team's fifth in conference play, which matches their highest division will total in school history.

Sophomore Nicole Markert came up huge, in a big game, as she recorded her fifth shut out of the season.

On Oct. 24 the team scored a season high five goals to defeat the Temple Owls 5-0.

Currently, the No. 6 ranked team in the division, the Bonnies goal of making the postseason resides in their own hands.

With just one game left to play, the team can make the A-10 tournament for just the second time in school history with a victory on Nov. 1st against Duquesne.

The team has been really successful playing in their backyard, as it has impressive 6-2 home record.

However if the Bonnies are going to make the post season, they must be effective in their last game on the road.

Jeffrey Engmann can be reached at jengmann@student.umass.edu

Redshirt senior Vanessa Lima scored the Minutewomen's only goal this season in a fantastic win against Dayton on Oct. 12. Lima has scored five points so far this season.

Hockey East play dominant over west

BATTLES IN NET

Friday's tie between UMass and UNH matched two goaltenders that entered the season with very different expectations.

UNH's Brian Foster stepped in for graduated Hockey East Player of the Year Kevin Regan this season, and has impressed in his first five starts with a 1.39 goals-against average.

UMass' Meyers ended last season as the No. 2 for the Minutemen, but a preseason injury to Paul Dainton forced him into starting duty.

Throughout Hockey East, goaltending issues are the norm, it seems.

Even with Foster's performance thus far, five games is hardly a fair sample size to judge a collegiate goaltender. Beyond Boston College (3-1-0, 1-1-0 Hockey East) and Northeastern (5-0-1, 4-0-0 Hockey East) there were questions just about everywhere else.

Boston University coach Jack Parker has rotated freshmen Kieran Millan and Grant Rollheiser to this point. Aided by one of the nation's best defensive units, the pair has combined for a 1.60 goals-against average and a 4-1 record. Millan is 3-0 in his three starts. Rollheiser earned the Terriers' lone loss, but made 22 saves in the 2-1 defeat at the Whittemore Center two Sundays ago.

Goaltending was the undoing of BU (4-1-0, 1-1-0 Hockey East) last season. Brett Bennett, who is no longer with the program, played a majority of the games, but never really developed any momentum. Through fives games this season, BU has allowed eight goals after allowing 21 in its first five games last season.

As it stands now, Rollheiser should get the start against Vermont (2-1-1, 0-1-0 Hockey East) Saturday in Burlington.

UVM junior Mike Spillane, like Foster, entered the season as the presumptive No. 1 choice replacing one of the nation's best goaltenders. Joe Fallon graduated in the spring after a four-year career which ended with a 2.05 career goals-against average and a .546 winning percentage.

Spillane played well in his sparse ice time during his first two seasons in Burlington. UVM coach Kevin Sneddon puts a premium on sound team defense and leans heavily on his goaltender and blue liners to keep his team in games. As Hockey East offenses gain rhythm in the coming months, growing even more dangerous than they already are, Spillane will need to draw on what he learned under Fallon.

The only two goaltenders that entered the season without any real competition or uncertainty were BC's John Muse and Northeastern's Brad Thiessen. Arguments for the conference's best net minder begin and end with this pair. Muse typically gets the nod with a national championship already plastered on his resumé.

Though typically counted out before the season begins, Merrimack's pair of goaltenders rivals any in the conference. Junior Andrew Braithwaite took over in 2007-08 and kept the Warriors (2-2-1, 0-1-0 Hockey East) competitive. His chief competition comes from freshman Joe Cannata. In the first start of his career, he made 44 saves in a 1-0 win over Army at the J. Thom Lawler Arena.

Some may wonder how the Warriors landed Cannata, a product of the United States Under-18 National Team Development Program, look no further than the USNTDP's goaltending coach, MC alum, Joe Exter. Overall, however, the Warriors have improved their recruiting efforts under coach Mark Dennehy who served as assistant to UMass coach Don Cahoon from 2000-05.

HOCKEY BEAST?

Saturday night in Boston, BU and then-No. 5 Michigan met at Aggasiz Arena. The Terriers scored two goals in the first and second period before a three-goal third sent the Wolverines back to Ann Arbor and down the national polls thanks to a 7-2 defeat.

Michigan fell to No. 8 while BU rose to No. 3 in the USCHO.com/CBS College Sports Division I Men's poll. BC also crept up in the polls to No. 2 after falling from the top spot after losing 4-3 to Northeastern last weekend.

The Huskies, No. 9, and UNH, No. 6, round out the Hockey East contingent in the Top 10. Vermont is the fifth and final Hockey East team in the Top 20 at No. 14. UMass and UMass Lowell (2-2-0, 1-0-0 Hockey East) both sit just outside the poll.

Overall, Hockey East has enjoyed more success against its rivals to the west than in previous years. In 12 games with Central Collegiate Hockey Association (CCHA) teams, Hockey East is 7-2-3. It has enjoyed even more success in six games with Western Collegiate Hockey Association (WCHA) teams, posting a 5-1-0 record.

With conference play beginning to dominate teams' schedules in the coming weeks, these marks may remain the same for the foreseeable future.

The next battle between Hockey East and WCHA comes a week from this Friday as New Hampshire travels to St. Paul, Minn., for a weekend pair with Minnesota. That same weekend, the CCHA's Notre Dame heads east for matchups with BC and Providence (2-2-0, 0-2-0 Hockey East).

ICE SHAVINGS

BU senior forward Jason Lawrence earned CCM/RBK player of the week honors for his pair of goals against Michigan. Northeastern's Alex Tuckerman won the Pro Ambitions Rookie of the Week for picking up two points as NU swept Maine in Orono.

Vermont's loss to BC at Conte Forum on Friday dropped the Catamounts to 0-8-0 at The Heights since joining Hockey East in 2005-06.

With its win over Providence Friday, UML improved to 3-0-1 in its last four home openers. NU's 5-0-1 start is the program's best the 12-0-0 start to the 1980-81 season.

Maine alumnus Ben Bishop, who forwent his final year of eligibility in the offseason and signed with the St. Louis Blues, suffered a lower-body injury in his second NHL game Saturday night.

Joe Mellema can be reached at managingeditor@dailycollegian.com

Sophomore John Muse led Boston College to a national championship last season. This year Muse and the Eagles are 3-1-0.

Minutemen ranked 6th in preseason poll

UMass hopes to perform better than polls indicate

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Yesterday, the official Atlantic 10 Coaches Poll rankings were released and the Massachusetts men's basketball team was ranked sixth in the A-10 out of 14 teams.

The A-10 preseason first and second teams were also released and two UMass players made the squad. Senior point guard Chris Lowe was selected to the first team and junior guard Ricky Harris made the second team.

Men's Basketball

After a successful season in which the Minutemen won 25 games and advanced to the finals of the National Invitation Tournament, UMass enters the season with somewhat lessened expectations due to the graduation of several key players such as Gary Forbes, Etienne Brower, and Dante Milligan. Sixth place in the A-10, while not terrible, would not be enough for the Minutemen to have a shot to make the NCAA Tournament.

"You know what, losing three fifth year seniors who were all very good players, our first, third, and fifth leading scorers' hurts. [The ranking] is about right at this time of the season, but hopefully we can prove some naysayers wrong and continue to compete and get better as the season goes on," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said.

Leading the Minutemen this season will be Lowe who is widely recognized as being the top point guard in the conference. In addition to being named to the preseason first team, he was named to the A-10 All-Defensive team.

"It's a great accolade for Chris Lowe ... as a senior point guard we expect that [performance] and we expect his leadership qualities to get better. I want him to be the best on the ball defensive point guard in the country, that's what I preach to him every day," Kellogg said.

"We know he can get in transition and make plays, we know he is very quick with the basketball, but I want him to pride himself in being the best on the ball defender in basketball," Kellogg continued.

Harris, the other player the Maroon and White honored yesterday, enjoyed a breakout season last year being named the A-10's Most Improved Player. He averaged over 20 points per game in five NIT games and was named to the NIT All-Tournament team.

"We want [Harris] to continue to improve and come to work hard every day. I want him to continue what he does offensively, but I want him to make a concerted effort to become one of the better defensive guards in the country," Kellogg said.

The top ranked team in the A-10 is the Xavier Musketeers, who earned a program record 30 wins and a berth in the Elite Eight after winning the conference for the second straight year. Xavier received 44 of the 61 first place votes from a panel of coaches and media members.

Tabbed for second place is Temple University, who won the A-10 tournament last year, the league leading seventh time the Owls have won the tournament.

Ricky Harris will be looked at by new coach Derek Kellogg to lead the defense in intesity and physical play. The Minutemen open their season Nov. 5 at the Mullins Center against Dowling.

UMass loses Smalls for season

Star cornerback out, defense must step up to fill void

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The No. 17 Massachusetts football team may have won big over Bryant this past weekend, but they also suffered an even bigger loss in the game.

All-American cornerback Sean Smalls will miss the remainder of the regular season due to a crack in his hip he suffered in the victory.

Smalls first went down in the first quarter of the 42-7 victory over Bryant, when he was tripped up as he was crossing the Bulldogs goal line on a punt return. the return was called back, however, due to a block in the back.

"On the punt return I was basically jogging in and the punter clipped my ankles and I just came down on [my hip] wrong," Smalls said.

Smalls returned on the next Bryant offensive drive for a few plays before needing assistance to get off the field.

"It first happened on the punt return, but I was able to still move around and then on one of those plays when I went back in, it just gave out. I just felt a pop," Smalls said.

The cornerback was seen on the sidelines for the remainder of the game with crutches.

Smalls was still hopeful that he may be ready to go if his team makes the playoffs.

"They said four to six weeks so unless we make the playoffs that's pretty much it for me," Smalls said. "The way it is looking right now I wouldn't have to have surgery, but I just have to let it rest and let it heal and then rehab."

UMass Football

I-Mass (5-3, 2-2 Colonial Athletic Association) coach Don Brown, however was not as hopeful when asked if there was an outside chance his All-American cornerback might play again this year.

"It doesn't look good," Brown said on Tuesday. "It is a crack in the hip bone, it doesn't matter how big it is, it's significant."

The loss of Smalls is huge for UMass' defense and to the Minutemen as a whole.

As a whole, the defense has been strong in its past couple of games, in part because of what was considered one of the best cornerback tandems in the country coming into the season according to Brown.

Smalls and Courtney Robinson anchored a secondary that had given up under 100 yards passing in four of its last six games and gave up an average of just over 160 yards over eight games.

Against the four CAA opponents the Minutemen have faced, that average drops down to 103 yards per game.

The injury may not only end the season for Smalls, it may end his UMass career unless the Minutemen make the playoffs and he is ready to play.

The true senior had started in 16 consecutive games for the Maroon and White and recorded two interceptions in his career.

One which he returned 90 yards – fourth longest in UMass history – for a touchdown.

Both interceptions came during the captain's junior season, a year where he also had 12 passes defended.

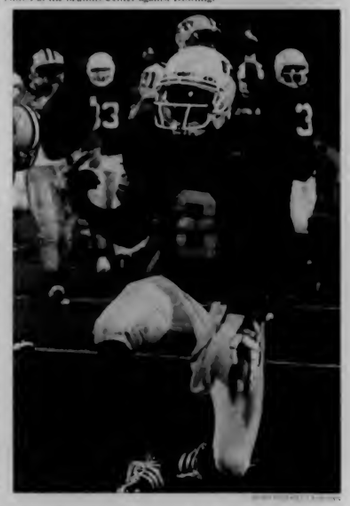
Smalls career numbers may not be eye popping, but they were deceiving.

Opposing offenses have shied away from Smalls' half of the field because of his talent.

His presence has been one of the main reasons the opposition has not had success throwing against UMass.

Three times the Minutemen's defense has given up fewer than 10 completions and on six occasions they gave up 15 or less.

Corey Davis and Reshaude Goodwin will be looked upon to fill the void left by Smalls and Brown feels they are ready for the job.



"[Davis and Goodwin] have been playing so it's not like we're thrusting guys in with no experience. They got to look at it like it is there time to shine," Brown said.

True junior Jeromy Miles will also be looked to without Smalls.

The free safety has come up big on multiple occasions over the year including a key interception to put the game out of reach against Delaware and a fumble recovers late in the fourth quarter the following weekend against Northeastern.

"I actually said something to Miles on Sunday, basically saying this is your secondary now, just take it over," Smalls said. "I have a lot of faith in those guys, they have been here for awhile."

vanRiemsdyk's play taking over league

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's nothing new for New Hampshire coach Dick Umile to lure National Hockey League prospects to the Whittemore Center. The massive Olympic-size ice sheet allows young forwards the opportunity to hone their offensive talents in a wide-open offense that regularly produces one of college hockey's most potent attacks.

Hockey East

So it was no surprise when James vanRiemsdyk, the No. 2 overall pick of the Philadelphia Flyers in the 2007 NHL Entry Draft, committed to UNH (3-1-1, 1-0-1 Hockey East) and then didn't waver from his decision following his selection.

After a strong, first season in Durham, N.H., featured primarily on the wing of UNH's second line, vanRiemsdyk looks primed to establish himself as one of the nation's premier power forwards. In 2007-08, players like Matt Fornataro and Mike Radja carried the scoring load while van-Riemsdyk and fellow freshman Danny Dries learned their roles in the UNH lineup.

Both Fornataro and Radja moved on to professional careers after UNH's loss to Notre Dame in the opening round of the NCAA tournament last season.

The Wildcats have more than enough depth, but with every team in Hockey East improving and the gap between rich and poor shrinking every year, young players as talented as vanRiemsdyk need to contribute for their teams to succeed. Through five games, he's scored three goals and assisted on two others.

In a 1-1 tie against Massachusetts (2-1-1, 0-0-1 Hockey East) Friday night, the sizy winger scored UNH's lone goal – a short-handed tally that dazzled the sellout crowd. What makes van-Riemsdyk so special is his combination of speed, raw strength and hockey savvy. Two UMass players hesitated at the UNH blue line, expecting an off-side call; vanRiemsdyk quickly took the puck and headed up ice. With two UMass players harrying him every step, he maintained control of the puck easily and fired a hard wrist shot past UMass goaltender Dan Meyers.

Hockey East coaches were ecstatic to see Boston College's Nathan Gerbe forgo his final season of eligibility this offseason and sign with the NHL's Buffalo Sabres. Looks like there's another dynamo set to take control of the league, sorry guys. It's just a question as to how long he'll be around.

Staying solid

Quality tie brings consistent play, carries Minutemen

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After Friday night's 1-1 tie against No. 4 New Hampshire, Don Cahoon, the Massachusetts hockey team's coach was happy with the outcome and the effort his team put in.

"You know, you're always disappointed because you always play to win," Cahoon said. "But with games like that you can walk away from it saying both teams left it on the ice."

Hockey

In a game where only two goals were scored, there were checks, diving saves and many penalties.

There were 16 penalties, 71 shots, a power play goal and a shorthanded goal.

The game could have gone either way, but both of the goaltenders stood up to the task and continued to stay strong in the overtime period.

"There were points in the game where we were in control," Cahoon said. "And there were points where we were hanging on for dear life."

VERY SPECIAL TEAMS

The Minutemen's special teams units continue its successful trend.

UMass (2-1-1, 0-0-1 Hockey East) has killed its last 13 penalties dating back to last Tuesday's 6-0 win over Rensselaer. The special teams also played a big part in the win against RPI.

Brett Watson and Justin Braun are huge reasons for this particular success.

In Friday's game against New Hampshire, Watson went 15-5 on faceoffs, an aspect of the game that Cahoon said could go either way.

One of the few mistakes the Minutemen have had while one of their penalty units were on the ice was the shorthanded goal that they gave up against a tough New Hampshire team, which ended up being the game-tying goal.

Braun, Watson and other penalty killers like Martin Nolet play aggressive when faced with the man-down situation.

They don't give opposing teams time to set up plays, they attack, forcing them into situations they would rather not be in.

The Mass Attack is holding opponents to a .125 average on the power play, which translates into 2-16.

THE GREAT WALL OF MEYERS

Dan Meyers, who sat behind former UMass goaltender Jonathan Quick two years ago is proving that he can stop pucks with the best of them.

The junior net minder stopped

Allen brings energy

New discussion on alternatives

BY TINA LAGERSTEDT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Former Virginia Governor and United States Senator George Allen spoke last night at a talk titled 'McCain, Obama, and America's Security' at Bowker auditorium at the University of Massachusetts.

The event attracted about 90 people and was sponsored by the UMass Republican Club and the Young American's Foundation.

Allen characterized next week's election as a very important day for Americans and that there are five battleground issues that will be significantly affected by the next president.

The five issues he mentioned were the war in Iraq, immigration, healthcare, taxes and energy policy. Although he briefly touched upon each issue in broad terms and contrasted the viewpoints of Senators John McCain and Barack Obama, he transitioned to focus on energy – the primary topic of his lecture.

Allen began his discussion about energy noting that it is an issue of 'great, paramount significance' in many ways. He mentioned the various areas that are affected by energy, such as national security, trade, American families, businesses and the standard of living.

Former Virginia Governor George Allen speaks at Bowker auditorium last night. Allen addressed his concerns with American energy policy.

He said that the American public wants 'affordable, reliable, clean American energy.'

But Allen parted ways with the main political consensus on energy with his views on American reliance on energy.

"Americans are not addicted to oil," said Allen. "Americans are addicted to freedom."

He added that freedom of movement, affordability and availability of energy appeal very strongly to the American public.

He said many of the energy proposals out there are very similar and he reasoned that Americans need to 'restart their creative engine.'

While talking about different solutions that are currently proposed, Allen expressed dissatisfaction with the 'cap and trade' solution that has been proposed for the last eight years.

'Cap and trade' is a system where by economic incentives are offered to reduce pollution. Allen said that 'cap and trade' proposals will actually hurt the economy of developing countries that are trying to raise their standard

New 'jolt' brings more services to students

BY KATHERINE NEUBERT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Daily Jolt is back.

Founded in 1999 by a group of friends between Amherst College and Brown University, the Web site was created for their specific campuses. From there, the Jolt quickly spread to the University of Massachusetts Amherst, Smith, Mount Holyoke and Hampshire colleges and is now at more than 200 campuses.

This fall, the Daily Jolt released a new version of the Web site. In addition to a make-over updating its look and feel, the site has a number of new features allowing users to communicate and comment.

Max Woolf recently became the new general manager of the Daily Jolt. Woolf is working with students at UMass to continually update the site.

"The Jolt has always been the authentic voice of students on the UMass campus delivering a truly local online experience that is both at arms length to the administration and a hub for the community," said Max Woolf, general manager of The Daily Jolt.

A new flyer-board feature allows users to upload and add images for events, announcements and classifieds as an exact replica of a paper flyer. The site also has a marketplace and textbook exchange, as well as weather, professor quotes, a blog for students, dining hall menus, Collegian news and forums.

"I like that even though the site has been around the UMass campus for a few years, we're basically starting all over because it's a totally new site," said UMass senior, Daily Jolt editorial and publicity assistant

Authors talk psych at UM

BY SEAN MCDONOUGH

Dr. Siegried Haug and David Lovelace discussed their personal encounters with bipolar disorder and insomnia, including strategies to deal with the conditions, at the University Club at the University of Massachusetts yesterday.

Living in the "hills of Western Massachusetts," Haug has been teaching and practicing therapy for over 30 years. His book titled "I Want to Sleep: Unlearning Insomnia – Treat Yourself to a Good Night," takes a new look at the sleeping disorder.

"An estimated 76 percent of American adults use medications for troubled sleeping, and over 20 percent (the majority women) suffer from chronic insomnia," the book reads.

College students at UMass are no exception.

Haug describes insomnia as a psychological problem.

"'Psychological' is a word doctors use when a complaint doesn't have a clear physiological or biological explanation," he writes. "Which means there is no likely pharmacological treatment."

Haugs reasons that during the day people deal with problems and stress by pressing through it. But when it comes time to sleep this strategy just robs them of rest. Haug's book aims to inform people so that rather than fighting insomnia, they can fall asleep.

Lovelace is not only a Western Mass. author, but

Private colleges face fundraising trouble

BY NISNA HEIKKINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Small private colleges across the country may face new fundraising challenges as donors become less willing or able to donate to their alma maters.

Here in Western Massachusetts, small private colleges like Hampshire College, Springfield College and Elms College remain cautiously optimistic about their financial prospects.

The full impact of a slumping economy is not yet evident for those colleges still in the midst of fall fund drives.

A report last week by Moody's Investor's Service, warned that some small private colleges may be in financial trouble if they have relied heavily on variable rate bonds to finance capital projects on their campuses. There is concern that banks may demand accelerated payment of loans, putting small colleges in a very difficult position financially.

Schools particularly at risk are those heavily dependent on tuition revenue and which have endowments significantly under $100 million. However, small private schools in this area are more concerned about how their endowments and annual funds, which are maintained through donations, will be effected in the coming months.

While college officials on the three campuses agreed that fundraising for colleges across the nation would be difficult, all were quick to add that their institutions were financially sound.

"This could prove to be a challenging year for any institution in raising funds, and at this point it would be difficult for anyone to predict fully how the year will unfold," said Elaine Thomas, director of communications at Hampshire College.

She added that Hampshire, which started raising money for Hampshire Fund two weeks ago, has reached one-third of its goal of $1.5 million. Last year, the Hampshire Fund successfully raised more than $1.3 million.

"We appear to be on track so we are optimistic we will meet our goal," said Thomas.

At Springfield College, the administration remains cautious about the current economic state and its relationship to donations.

"All colleges are concerned with what is going on in the economy," said John White, the major gifts officer at Springfield College.

While White could not give specific details about how much particular donors were giving to the college, he did say that there was some uncertainty about how much some donors would be able to give this year.

"We are on a holding pattern right now, people aren't making the same amount as six months ago, their portfolios don't look the same as they did," said White.

Despite these concerns, White acknowledged that Springfield College was financially strong.

"Our annual fund is right on target," she said. "We just wrapped a phone-a-thon, our target was $40 million and we just raised $44.5 million. Right now we are going around thanking people."

White acknowledged that the college could have struggled more with fund-raising if they had started later in the year when the financial woes on Wall Street first hit the media and the effects started to be felt in people's checkbooks. "I'm glad our campaign ended June 30," he said.

Of the three private colleges, Elms College in Chicopee fits the profile outlined by the Moody's report, of a college that could face significant financial problems in the future.

With an endowment under $10 million, the college does not have much of a safety net to protect it from financial trouble, and according to public relations officer Russ Powell, Elms College is largely tuition dependent for its income.

Powell did not specify if the Elms used variable rate bonds or not to finance capital projects, but if it does the outlook for the college could be poor.

Elms College is in the midst of its fall fund drive. At this point it is difficult to say definitively whether the downturn in the economy has had a negative effect on donor support.

"People are cautious moving forward," Powell said.

He added that the college will "just have to wait and see" before decisions are made about possible cuts in spending if the college does not raise as much money as it anticipated for this year.

Powell said that Elms College will delay making decisions

Majors Fair for UMass

Yesterday was the last Wednesday in October, which means one thing at the University of Massachusetts, the annual Majors Fair.

The Majors Fair, a tradition that goes back more than 10 years, flooded the basement of the Campus Center with students last night and featured representatives from over 75 of the University's academic departments.

The fair, sponsored by Undergraduate Advising, aims to help both undeclared and declared students explore the various majors and opportunities that the UMass has to offer.

Tamatha Gaumnitz, an academic advisor for Undergraduate Advising, described the fair as "a rare opportunity where representatives from all departments come together in one place [so that students] don't have to run across campus to meet different people."

For the first time, the fair included

Study faults federal standards

BY KRISTEN HEALY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Measuring success in college by a single federal standard could make many universities and colleges seem less adequate than they actually are, according to research by the University of Alaska at Anchorage.

Now the graduation rates are measured by the proportion of students who obtain a degree – either bachelor's or associate's – within 150 percent of the expected time, according to the U.S. government.

This measurement only counts first-time and full-time students, and therefore could discredit schools that have few students matching this description.

Criticism has come particularly from those schools that enroll a high number of part-time students, transfer students, or students who have decided to come back to school after dropping out.

Schools like the University of Alaska argue this federal standard is making those schools look as though they are not giving students the education and skills they need to graduate, when in fact they may.

The federal rate indicated that Alaska's graduation success was only at 18 percent. However, this figure only represented between three and five percent of each year's new students.

As a result, the University implemented a new approach to measuring graduation success. Instead of using a six-year spectrum for a bachelor's degree, they decided 10 years would be more effective because it accounts for more students who decide to leave school, but return to finish their degree.

Their plan also includes transfer students as well as part-time students, who will be tracked over a 10-year period.

According to Gary Rice, director of institutional planning, research

Eurpoean blackness examined

BY NETHA GILL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

German Studies professor at Vassar College Peggy Piesche hosted a lecture, titled "Old Dynamics New Spaces? The Europeanization of Blackness," as a part of the W.E.B. DuBois Lecture Series at the University of Massachusetts.

Piesche began the discussion held in Fernald Hall Tuesday by making it clear that its focus was on Europe outside of the United Kingdom, while focusing mainly on Germany.

She talked about aspects of the German studies curriculum she wants to improve. Piesche said one of the challenges was to make up a curriculum that is not just another ethnic studies course, but a part of Germany's history.

She connected U.S. racial issues with those in Germany by comparing two advertisements: the "I Am an American" ad, which came out after the Sept. 11 attacks, with the "Du Bist Deutschland" (I am Proud to be a German) ad.

The American ad included people pertaining to demographics. In contrast, the German ad featured celebrities and other people, and the only person of color was Ghanaian-German soccer player Gerald Asamoah.

Piesche said she used this example to introduce the idea that minorities appear in the media only in times of crisis and tragedy in order to establish national identity.

Piesche said that blacks in

Andrea Schneider. "And I think although CampusLive has a lot of the same features, The Daily Jolt seems more like a community; I feel like the people who visit the site have been for years."

"The Daily Jolt has seen and is acting on two distinct trends in forums and message boards; one trend is for complete transparency and the other is for complete anonymity," Woolf said.

The forum is a central feature of The Daily Jolt. It allows students to have conversations on a range of issues relating to life, campus and the community.

With respect to offering a place for transparency, The Daily Jolt has created a "Conversations Forum" where every post includes the user name of the individual making the post. An equal but opposite "Confessional Forum" aka "JoltSecret" has been created to allow thoughts, opinions and statements to be posted anonymously.

"The "Original Daily Jolt Forum" will continue allowing users to choose between posting their identity and posting anonymously.

"The Jolt wants students to have a choice without restricting or restraining, while at the same time, continuing to have moderation as needed," said Woolf.

The Daily Jolt was born out of the UMass community and aims to continue serving that community. It is run by five students at the University, who are in contact with General Manager Max Woolf via e-mail, phone and instant messaging.

also a carpenter and former owner of the nearby Montague Bookmill. His book, "Scattershot," describes his family's struggle with bipolar disorder.

"Generally you don't want to be treated; at that point you're on a manic high," said Lovelace describing the condition in an interview with NPR. "Deep down you know you have lost it, you're crazy, you're very scared, but you're on a roller coaster. You're high and it's an amazing moment and you don't want anybody to stop that. You don't want to deal with the effects of it either."

Before writing "Scattershot," Lovelace wrote poetry as a way to deal with his bipolar symptoms. But, he found that it didn't provide the relief he was looking for, so he sat down and described it in writing.

The book deals not only with his experience, but that of others in his family as well.

There was one year where all the male Lovelaces of his family were committed. Lovelace said his family had mixed reactions to the release of the book due to its sensitive content.

Lovelace's struggle leads him to conclude that he cannot run or deny his bipolar disorder.

"I've seen both my parents drown in the sickness," his book reads. "I've seen my brother sink down. I've denied my own madness and I've loved it almost to death. All my life I've heard my family blame each other, some devil, some church, genetics and shrinks.

Now, Lovelace hopes when he talks about the condition, he can help others reach that same level of self-acceptance.

about possible changes in spending until after the presidential election is over, and the state of the economy is more clear.

"We're definitely in cautious mode. We're preparing for whatever comes down," Powell said.

Another source of concern for small private schools is a shift of student interest to cheaper public universities and community colleges as it becomes increasingly harder to afford a private education.

"We expect there may be a larger shift to lower cost alternatives," the Moody's report stated.

Thomas assured that Hampshire College would remain committed to keeping the cost of college affordable for its students.

"As in any year, we will work to hold tuition increases as low as possible, and remain committed to a strong financial aid program" she said.

College officials at Springfield and Elms Colleges did not seem worried about possible declining enrollment.

"We have a lot of commuters in part-time programs and we expect that to do well," said Powell, adding that Elms College plans to expand its programs for part-time students.

Grad rate questioned

and assessment at Alaska, this new formula will allow the University to obtain more information on the individual success of students based on their goals, educational background and actual degree earned.

In a study done by the University of Arizona, which included 52 public universities, the University of Massachusetts ranked well in comparison to other large public universities in terms of graduation rate.

Such analysis is often used in determining how well elementary and secondary education systems are preparing students for college, since many public colleges and universities serve the purpose of educating students from that particular state.

Local high schools are trying different ideas to prepare students for college to ultimately earn a degree.

According to Principal David Dupont, Holyoke High School has an established SAT preparation course, a college-prep remedial English course and Advanced Placement courses designed to give students a sense of college coursework and material.

He said they have also partnered with Holyoke Community College (HCC) to form a Tech Prep, which allows for content pathways to be created between courses at Holyoke High and HCC.

Freshman entering high school also have the option to take a Career Choice course, which may help them dictate a path to follow in high school to ultimately lead to college goals, said Dupont.

He also said there are many on-site college visits to their school, where students are able to meet with college personnel to discuss options.

As far as the standards set by the government to measure graduation rates in high school, Dupont said he has no concerns with actually setting a standard. Although, he said he does have serious concerns with the variables that affect certain schools' graduation rates, such as location e.g. urban or suburban and the demographic of students.

Dupont's concerns are similar to that of people such as Rice who are researching graduation rates in higher education.

They both agree that the standard to which these rates are calculated is flawed and the results can often cast a stigma on a particular institution for not educating students properly.

"Obviously, these concerns matter," Dupont said, "When it comes down to the potential for corrective action for schools and when schools are listed and compared in the media without any explanation of the factory at all."

of living and that the idea is not supported by the majority of countries around the globe.

Allen also believes that global warming was not caused by man and is result of a natural change in temperature.

Allen also proposed several solutions to America's energy problems. The first solution he mentioned was the idea of 'ground transportation.'

He noted that the internal combustion engine will not be used for much longer and that hybrid and electric cars are much better alternatives. Although he touched upon several other ideas, including hydrogen fuel cells, biofuels and ethanol, Allen maintained that hybrid and electric cars are the best solution.

Allen's second proposal was coal, which currently makes up a large portion of America's electricity supply. He added that coal is substantially less expensive than other fuels, such as natural gas, which can cost up to four times as much.

He noted that coal is in abundant supply in America and needs to be used creatively and effectively. Allen also spoke about the importance of nuclear energy being used in a non-wasteful way.

Allen advocated strongly for lifting the federal ban on offshore drilling. He maintained that each state should be able to determine if they want to take part in offshore drilling, but that it would create tax revenue that could be used for improving infrastructure and education in the state.

Throughout his speech, Allen made many comments about the creativity and innovation that America can produce. He specified that the advances made in nanotechnology could make significant progress towards developing better batteries and solar devices.

He also mentioned the idea of 'practical conservation and common sense' for Americans when dealing with energy. Although he feels there shouldn't be an across-the-board mandate, he does recommend the use of innovative technologies in government buildings such as college dorms and hospitals.

Allen ended his speech by noting that we need various solutions to the energy problems of America. He concluded that there is "no single silver bullet" and that we need 'silver buckshot to address energy problems.'

Allen was Governor of Virginia from 1994 to 1998. He won a seat in the U.S. Senate in 2000, unseating the Democratic incumbent. Allen served on various Senatorial committees, including the Foreign Relations Committee and the Energy and National Resources Committee.

Allen lost his reelection to the Senate in 2006 by a very narrow margin to current Senator Jim Webb. He was a frontrunner as the Republican nominee for the 2008 presidential race in 2005, but fell behind before the primaries. Currently, Allen is a Reagan scholar in the Young America's Foundation.

Europe, still struggle to claim blackness and European-ness at the same time without seeming absurd.

She also talked about the organization ADEFRA, Ethiopian for "the woman who shows courage." It is mainly a resource for black German women to address racial and gender issues.

An exhibit on the representation of black women in Germany in the form of art around 2006 was shown to those in attendance. In this exhibit, photography of past and present, poetry and paintings from prolific women in Germany was displayed.

In the conclusion of her lecture Piesche said she feels that minorities are still in danger in regards to race relations in Germany, Europe and the Western world.

"You can't build a new house on an old foundation," she said.

During a question and answer session, the audience got to get more of Piesche's ideas on how racial issues are addressed in Germany. She said racial issues are often left out of the history and in the current discourse of Germany.

Piesche connected that history to the United States when she brought up the idea that the success of black politicians is never due to race. And she said if race is addressed then blacks are often shunned and doomed to lose in any campaign.

According to Piesche, this is why she feels Obama is popular with the majority, since she said, he talks more about unifying America in regards to race issues.

Audrey Borgeson, a freshman UMass feels differently from Piesche.

"The best way to achieve genuine racial equality in society is to completely ignore our differences and actually give everyone equal treatment," Borgeson said.

She said racial issues today are "a result of socio-economic differences."

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 30, 2008

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."

Serious funnies

Yesterday The Boston Globe published a controversial editorial cartoon by artist Dan Wasserman. In the drawing, Wasserman depicted a gun store owner donning camouflage, telling a father and son, who mirrored the owner in their fatigues, "Sorry – he has to be 10 to detonate a nuclear weapon."

The illustration was a commentary on the recent death of Chris Birjij, the 8-year-old who accidentally shot himself to death with a Micro Uzi at the Westfield Sportsman's Show.

Many Globe readers were outraged by what they considered the "insensitivity," of the subject matter. This controversy brings an important issue to light – one that Wasserman addressed in his article, "'Tasteless' cartoon?" – what makes an editorial cartoon?

The article, which is part of the "Out of line – a notebook on graphic disobedience" feature on the Globe's Web site, allowed Wasserman to defend his cartoon and explain to his audience what an editorial cartoon is and what it is not.

The outrage over Wasserman's cartoon is reminiscent of the reaction to Dutch political cartoonist, pseudonym Gregorius Nekschot, who drew Mohammed, dressed like an Islamic jihadist, among other "distasteful" cartoons.

Nekschot was arrested for publishing "insulting cartoons," and his life was threatened by extremists.

Although his subject matter is offensive on many different levels – first of which the Koran's laws against visual portrayals of the prophet – it should have been a protected form of expression.

In America, freedom of speech thankfully protects all speech, offensive, benign – however you like it. Just don't yell fire in a movie theater. Both Nekschot and Wasserman's cartoons make important political statements, whether they're agreeable or not.

Editorial cartoons deserve to be protected at the same level of immediacy as editorial columns. Comics are a medium that should not be dismissed. In a single panel, a cartoonist can send a significant message to its readership.

Wasserman described editorial cartoons as "instant, distilled, graphic commentary on breaking news."

It's not just a picture on a page. Cartoons should not be glanced over or ignored by defenders of the first amendment. A cartoon can be a powerful tool for change, or a biting social commentary.

As Wasserman concluded in his defense, "Cartoons can be mirrors, and sometimes the reflection is not pretty."

There's a bad sun rising

Jon Peterson

On Nov. 4, people all across the country will be waiting and hoping – hoping for some miracle to come and touch their lives. Something to turn everything around that has gone wrong in the past eight years.

Because apparently, Republican politicians are responsible for breast cancer, the Iraq war, the lack of stricter gun control, arthritis, racism and every other tragedy that has come since they came to power.

Why is it that students have latched on to a politician who has spent little to no time supporting issues that are relevant to students?

Senator Barack Obama has only a few scant references to the education system on his resume, and those are well known and partisan enough. He has supported sex education for kindergarteners, which is akin to going to a teachers' conference and being informed that the teacher always wears a condom in class. It is better than the alternative, but somewhere, something has gone horribly wrong.

We also know that Sen. Obama has supported teachers unions in the past. We know that his hometown's education system is one of the worst in the country for students.

In some suburbs of the city, a quarter of the teachers make over $100,000 a year and Senator Obama is in favor of merit pay, something which he defines as being decided by the teachers themselves.

The senator, though, has proposed to provide grants to every college student in the United States – thus making college "affordable to everyone." This is without considering that not everyone should go to college, and since everyone does now, a four year degree is the new standard for what a high school diploma was decades ago.

The people want something to make themselves feel important and Senator Obama has made his candidacy into a historical event.

Can these reasons really be why there is such overwhelming support amongst students for Sen. Obama? And for those who do support the Senator, is this the sole reason why there is such a wide split between the party groups, and why each party is so opposed to the other's presidency?

Historically, people have always had a great event to define the times. Our parents had the '60s and the Vietnam War. Their parents had World War II, and their parents the Great Depression.

What our generation faces is a time where there is little to no greatness. Our eternal pessimist, Neitzsche, stated that "A people is Nature's detour to produce six or seven great men."

Society laps up this idea. And from a man who has built his campaign on rhetoric, they see the possibility to take a chance at something – anything – different than what they have now. We have little to define ourselves with, the massive public unity that existed in the past is obscured by a lack of cohesion.

The people want something to make themselves feel important and Senator Obama has made his candidacy into a historical event, with elementary school textbooks going so far as to have already written him in as an important historical figure while neglecting Senator McCain.

This great endorsement of the Senator leads to fanaticism. Emotions run high at Obama's rallies, and he regularly draws tens of thousands to see him. What history tells us is to be wary at these times. Los Angeles caught fire after the Lakers won the NBA championship. L.A. caught fire after the officers were acquitted from the Rodney King incident.

These parallels cannot be seen clearer, even Representative John Murtha (D-PA) has said about his own voting bloc that it may be difficult for Obama to win votes because there is a clear and distinct group of voters who are "racists," and later clarified that he meant they were rednecks.

College students are also greatly in favor of the Senator, and these facts bring about one likely conclusion. There will be rioting and arson. We live in an area known as the Five Colleges, in a state in which there is a greater concentration of universities and students than anywhere in the world. If you look out your window on Nov. 4, somewhere towards the northeast, you may see a new sun rising towards the direction of Boston.

Is the possibility of this fanaticism a boon though, leading to greater country unity through some unforeseen leadership, though? We can't say, but the long night is coming again, and we all have the possibility to see history made on it.

A rumor of endless war

John Glaser

Chalmers Johnson, the authoritative academic turned scathing author, has recently reminded us that "from the founding of the republic to the moment of President Dwight D. Eisenhower's farewell address in 1961, some of our leaders have warned us that the greatest threat to our republican structure of government is war, including its associated maladies of standing armies, a military-industrial complex and all the vested interests that develop around a massive military establishment."

While truer words are hard to find, presidential candidate John McCain has proven over his many years in public office, as well as throughout this campaign, that he fervently believes the antithesis of professor Johnson's wise pronouncement. He evidently believes that war is the pillar of republican governance and the most vital protectorate of a free people.

A more dangerous prospective conviction for the next sitting president to hold is unlikely to be found in these two campaigns, the culmination of which is now just days away. It seems McCain never met a war he didn't consider absolutely necessary for all Americans to hail.

This frightening martial proclivity has led journalist Matt Welch to conclude that McCain "would be the most explicitly interventionist president since Teddy Roosevelt" and that "he certainly makes George Bush look gun-shy by comparison."

Back in Dec. 1990 McCain's impassioned call to army sounded strikingly similar to his current warring rhetoric when he said "the peace and security of the world for future generations [demand] that the world community act decisively to end the Gulf Crisis now."

"In Jan. 1994," Matt Welch reports, "he described North Korea's nuclear weapons program as 'the most dangerous and immediate expression' of 'the greatest challenge to U.S. security and world stability today,' and warned that 'there can be no serious doubt that our vital national interests are imperiled.'"

"America's most important values," McCain said in 1999, "are under vicious assault by the Milosevic regime" and that "an immediate and manifold increase in the violence against Serbia proper and Serbian forces in Kosovo" was required as well as infantry preparations for a possible ground war.

This over-eager hawkish oratory was again exemplified with the recent Russian intervention into Georgia. McCain made sweeping claims about Russia's imperial ambitions and the potential return of the Cold War, saying at a rally that "we are all Georgians now." He is equally antagonistic towards Iran; another conflict America simply must avoid and understand as unnecessary.

Despite a majority of American citizens being firmly against this war on nearly every level, and despite the falsification and near-proven fabrication of every rationale for going in the first place, McCain stubbornly insists that these realities be forgiven or even ignored.

He demands that our full occupation of the country remain constant until we've finished the job, while of course being deviously vague as to what that means (as well as ignoring the requisite legal or moral justification for it), thus concocting a recipe for perpetual war – a dream for him if there ever was one.

It seems McCain never met a war he didn't consider absolutely necessary for all Americans to hail.

A dangerous and excessive compulsion to intervene militarily, in any country from Georgia to Iraq to Darfur, has been the hallmark of McCain's career and would mean disaster for our national security, our civil liberties, our Constitution and so much more.

It would mean yet another administration in full support of U.S. unilateral imperium, with total disregard for the noninterventionist principle of the founding of this country.

War typically implicates much more than increased military activity abroad. War, as Randolph Borne said, is the health of the state and at no other time are regular citizens more vulnerable to the abuse of governmental power and scope than when at war.

Warnings from McCain supporters that Barack Obama will advance the forces of socialism upon this country would be wise to note that nothing welcomes state control over our economy, our privacy and our lives like war.

Paralleling Bush administration policies with the policies of a would-be McCain administration is not just a feigned political predisposition. The gross expansion of the executive branch we have witnessed throughout this war time regime, likening the office's authority to that of a king on everything from executive orders to prisoners of war to unchecked power of every kind, has been a ruinous development in the life of our republic, one which war has facilitated. And all signs point to its continuation in a war time McCain administration.

Unfortunately, McCain's opposition has likewise employed antagonistic rhetoric (although to a lesser degree) and called for troop surges and cross-border attacks, but he would be hard put to prove more militaristic than McCain. The future of America's militarism remains to be seen, although prudence would suggest its maintenance either way.

History tells us, as in the Roman Republic, how poisonous perpetual war and ruthless empire can be to democratic government. A vote for McCain could very well mean the invitation of America's eventual demise.

A yard sign election

S.P. Sullivan

David B. Farrick was hanging out on a bench on Main St. in Easthampton, Mass. recently, enjoying the day and counting the engines on planes coming up over the Holyoke Mountain Range with his binoculars.

I was on assignment for The Daily Hampshire Gazette, "selling out," as my editors at The Daily Collegian would call it, though they don't pay me any money. I was shooting video, because journalists can't just carry notebooks anymore, and feeling like a telemarketer asking strangers their opinions on the election.

Many are of the opinion that they don't want to talk about the election. At least not to the guy with the tripod.

"I'll talk to you but I don't want to be videotaped," Farrick said. "I'm self-conscious."

Farrick is a U.S. Army veteran who grew up in Easthampton. He used to be a postal worker over in Indian Orchard, but he doesn't work there anymore.

People are always going to be concerned most with what's going on in their backyard.

I didn't have to guess his political preferences; he wore them on his chest, like a medal.

"I'm for these guys, obviously," he said, thumbing towards the Barack Obama/Joe Biden button on his shirt.

We started talking about Question 1, the initiative to phase out the income tax by 2010, which is what I was doing there in the first place.

"I think it's a foolish idea," he said. "It seems irresponsible at this time. Deval Patrick already had to cut a billion bucks from the budget. With this thing they'd have the cut 13 times as much."

I asked Farrick what was the first thing he'd cut from the budget if he were governor.

"Man," he said. "I'm glad I'm not the governor."

Farrick said that if the income tax went, he'd be alright, but he wouldn't be happy.

"I can retire in two years, and between that and the money from VA [Veteran's Affairs], I should do alright," he said. "I'm receiving a small thing from VA. That would be the last thing they touch – vet's benefits."

Then what are they going to touch? I asked.

"I dunno," he said. "Easthampton would have to lose 40 percent of their budget, so a lot of things would have to go. They'd have to close the libraries, which upsets me. I'm a patron of the library."

Farrick, like a lot of people worried about Question 1, wasn't worried about Beacon Hill. He was worried about Easthampton.

"The infrastructure around here is so bad right now. That bridge down there," he said, and he pointed down Main St. to the Route 10 Bridge, which rolls over the Manhan River, "they say they're gonna' replace that by 2010. It's going to take even longer if they lose the budget."

That's why they say all politics is local. Nobody feels the financial crisis harder than the local people wondering what's going on with that goddamn bridge.

Sure, there are a lot of Obama lawn signs. There are quite a few John McCain signs, too. But most of the front lawn advertising going on in the Five College area is about state and local ballot initiatives.

This election is about lawn sign initiatives. The people of Mass. haven't opted out of the national presidential election, but they don't see change – no matter who's promising it – coming from either candidate.

When Ralph Nader spoke at the University of Massachusetts a few weeks ago, he said he'd be the only candidate the state of Massachusetts was going to get.

"Obama's got it in the bag and McCain's writing it off," he said.

Ralph Nader may never win an election, but he's an expert on the subject. Nader has run for president more times than I've run to catch the bus.

And he doesn't think you should ignore people like David Farrick because their vote is a given.

"If you're running for president, that's how you show respect for voters," he said. "You campaign in all 50 states."

The focus most voters are putting on local ballot initiatives isn't anything new. People are always going to be concerned most with what's going on in their backyard. But the button they'll be pushing on Tuesday will be for the ticket they think will keep the folks in their hometowns employed and the bridges in working order.

The media is doing the irresponsible thing and calling the election for Obama already. That's a joke, but it's not quite so foolish to say Massachusetts is going to Obama because of people like Farrick, who think their candidate in the White House will help out their community at home.

But change doesn't happen in Washington. Change happens at home.

POINT-COUNTER-POINT

"...the ring where opinions clash." - Adlai E. Stevenson

A hazy future for marijuana

One joint too many

It's no surprise the University of Massachusetts campus has been up in arms about Question 2. The decriminalization of marijuana would make bong hits and stress-free.

Melissa Garber

The Cannabis Reform Coalition registered more voters than the Student Government Association (I imagine) this election season – a result of their newfound political fervor. A yes vote on Question 2 would benefit Amherst's residents in innumerable ways – but what about the Pioneer Valley communities most affected by marijuana use?

A farm town full of aging hippies and college students is hardly destroyed by drug use quite like the inner-city.

Question 2 calls for civil penalties against marijuana users who are in possession of an ounce or less.

For many, this sounds like a reasonable punishment. But take into consideration just how much an ounce of weed is. According to Michael O'Keefe, the District Attorney for the Cape and Islands, "One ounce of marijuana – street value $600 – equates to approximately 56 individual sales."

Question 2 isn't just protecting the occasional toker, it's decriminalizing the drug dealers role.

That's a $100 fine for an offender possessing enough pot to run a business. How is a speeding ticket more serious? Question 2 isn't just protecting the occasional toker, it's decriminalizing the drug dealer's role.

An ounce of weed is too much to defend. No casual, not-for-profit, pot smoker possesses such a large quantity of marijuana. Granted, the dealers busted for an ounce or less aren't the largest drug proprietors, they are still antagonizing their neighborhoods; specifically, the well-being of the most impressionable residents – high school students.

Dealers are ravaging the streets of Springfield and Holyoke. They are enticing juveniles, who should be in school, with jobs. There aren't an abundance of employment opportunities in the failed manufacturing communities of Massachusetts; there is no excuse for making drugs the best option.

Many on this campus think the penalties for marijuana use are far too extreme. But, according to O'Keefe, "Massachusetts law already requires our judges to dismiss charges and seal records of first-time offenders."

The Committee for Sensible Marijuana Policy argues the state would save $29.5 million a year if Question 2 passes. The assumption is the police will stop focusing all of their energy on the casual pothead and divert their attention to the real criminals.

But, Boston Globe columnist Adrian Walker stated in a Sept. 16 article, "A question of possession" that, "In 2007, not one person went to jail in Suffolk or Middlesex counties for marijuana possession alone." So who are the people that will be saved from jail time with the passing of Question 2?

"People who go to jail for marijuana in Massachusetts are there because they're also carrying guns and committing other crimes," said Dan Conley, Suffolk County District Attorney. "Current law targets drug dealers and violent criminals, and it's working."

In a "Coalitions for Safe Streets," press release, the Rev. Jeffrey Brown, president of Boston TenPoint Coalition and a member of the Black Ministerial Alliance said, "This legislation is put forth by wealthy, out-of-state radicals who I guarantee have never and will never step foot in our neighborhoods."

Why are the community's least affected by Question 2 the most adamant about its passing? In Amherst, a yes on Question 2 means college students can rest easy knowing their last joint will only cost them the price of four UMass parking tickets – if caught.

In Springfield, Question 2 means fewer reasons not to get involved with drugs. It enables dealers and cheapens the futures of countless high school students. Harsh consequences used to deter students from drug dealing, vote yes on Question 2 and it's an invitation.

The drop out rate of Springfield high school students is already astronomical. Natalia Muñoz, editor of La Prensa, a Latin-American newspaper in Western Mass, wrote in a Valley Advocate article, "At Central High four years ago, the first-year class size was 900, but this year only 300 seniors graduated."

Amherst Regional High School students aren't ditching school for gangs and drugs quite at the same rate as Springfield students – so it's easier to envision a happy place where a hit is just a hit.

But in Springfield, dealing becomes a means of survival – not just a leisurely activity. Where's the justification in making drug dealing more appealing than an education? A slap on the wrist and a class on "why drugs are bad," for the first, and subsequent offenses, is hardly effective.

The CORI system needs improvements, not Massachusetts's marijuana policies.

In Walker's column, Brown explained: "What I need is someone to help me in the street, helping these young men and women get jobs and educations and rebuilding families. I don't need a bunch of suburban folks asking what's wrong with a little marijuana. It's amazing that anyone would consider this."

It ain't easy being green

I want to share some stories about drugs. When it comes to Massachusetts' upcoming vote on marijuana decriminalization, I've got plenty.

Steven Hoeschele

If you shopped at any of the Hadley supermarkets last fall or spring, you've probably seen me with a clipboard, flirting with old ladies, and pushing for the decriminalization. I petitioned for probably 2,000 signatures on the ballot question. It was one of the most fun jobs I've ever had, in large part due to the conversations I had with voters.

One young guy couldn't sign because he's a Swiss citizen. "But I appreciate what you're doing," he told me. Then he offered me some hash.

One middle-aged woman was so eager to sign, she grabbed the pen and clipboard from my hand. "Wait–" the grey-haired lady paused. "I shouldn't sign this."

"Why not?" I asked, confused.

"Let's just say… I have agricultural pursuits," she whispered with a wink. "But thanks for the work you do," she added.

"Hey," I replied earnestly, "thanks for the work you do."

Obviously there were the sparse opponents. "Lock them all up," an old man yelled across the parking lot. Some folks complained just because I was talking about marijuana laws as they walked by with their 12-year-old kid. I would point out that the kid will probably be offered pot within a year or two and should at least know the law.

Still, every once in a while I'd encounter someone on the fence, and my question to them is the same one I'll pose to you, the reader: "Do you think we should pay the government to lock people in cages, just because they have a plant in their pocket?"

That's the stark material reality of our marijuana policy.

Yet decriminalization opponents continue appealing to the authority of district attorneys and police chiefs who need to appear "tough on crime." But marijuana use itself isn't a crime, and tying it to violence – a key tactic of D.A.R.E. – is tenuous at best. So much of 'drug-related' crime involves a suspect who smoked pot weeks prior but still registered hot on their drug test.

So really, who's using? Let's look at use of this plant here in the Bay-State. According to the government's 2005 National Survey on Drug Use and Health (NSDUH): "Of the 15 SubState areas with the highest rates of past month marijuana use in the United States, five were in Massachusetts."

And while Boston's top spot as the country's most prolific marijuana user has been usurped by Western Montana this year, Massachusetts is still up there. In Boston and Western Mass, 12 percent of people over age 12 have smoked pot in the past month.

We're talking about a wide sample range here: this includes 13-year-olds and 63-year-olds who essentially told the government, "Yes, I smoke pot." 12 percent means one out of every eight people. 12 percent means some of our best teachers, lawyers, mechanics and, no doubt, police officers.

In next week's decision, we can't afford to think, "I don't smoke, so it doesn't concern me." So, reader, do you think that one out of eight people in Western Mass is disrupting the fabric of society? Let me put it another way: Do you think one out of eight Bostonians deserves to be locked up for this?

If this many people are smoking weed, the law isn't working. Enough citizens are willing to defy the law, risking jail-time, fines and a scarlet letter in the form of permanent criminal records that jeopardize employment, adoption, housing benefits and student financial aid. What we're witnessing is widespread civil disobedience. What that means for a democracy is that we ought to reconsider the law.

Which is more dangerous: blazing down route 9 at 75 mph, or blazing some reefer on Amherst Common?

Simply put, Question 2 reduces the penalty for small possession from a criminal offense with jail-time to a civil offense with a $100 fine. The often-used parallel to a speeding ticket is appropriate. Which is more dangerous: blazing down route 9 at 75 mph, or blazing some reefer on Amherst Common?

Further, Question 2 mainly addresses marijuana possession by adults. The punishment is heavier for minors, and the law remains the same as ever on DUI, selling, growing, and trafficking marijuana. The latest NSDUH cites the average age of initiative pot use at 17.6 years old. Look, by age 18 or so, you're old enough to make your own decisions.

I know I won't be influencing the vote of many Collegian readers; most UMass students and faculty will be voting yes anyway. But I want readers to think about this issue in a context other than the gateway drug, "no one's ever died from smoking pot" dichotomies that are too often tossed around the arena of ideas.

More than anything else, what I want to drive home is that this is simply a plant. It's just as much a drug as coffee beans. You can find it in nature; it doesn't require human manipulation or modification.

And so we are regrettably armies to punish fellow citizens for simply possessing that plant – by locking them in cages, no less. The criminalization of marijuana is a crime against nature.

HUMANS AGAINST 'NERD' CALLING

Dear Editor,

(Re: "Take guns, violent imagery," Tina Ortiz, Editorial, Oct. 23)

As a self-professed "nerd," I very much resented a number of points in Tina Ortiz's article entitled "Take guns, violent imagery." The implications of her statements made about nerds, geeks and other social misfits would be viewed as incredibly offensive to many if they were made about an actual recognized minority group.

If Humans vs. Zombies was played primarily by black students, I doubt that Ortiz would have written that this is training for when they go out and join street gangs, nor do I think that if it were a game played by Muslim students that she would have hinted that this is the precursor to a major terrorist attack. Stereotyping geeks as being prone to shoot up their schools is a stereotype just as bad and inaccurate as any other.

I will hazard a guess that Ortiz is not a person who would say that more mainstream, traditional sports are a bad thing, even though several of them can and do involve violent physical contact, real life injuries and sometimes even hospitalization.

In fact, almost all people, regardless of whether or not they supported HvZ, would think I was insane if I said that football players, boxers, hockey players or wrestlers were likely to beat someone to death because they played that sport.

So, if my above assumption is correct, what's the difference? Why is it being said that an activity like this, one that does not result in any real injuries, is worse than the aforementioned sports, simply because it's played by geeks?

I have been involved in role-playing games for many years, which trace back to games nearly identical to how HvZ is described. Neither I nor any of the people who have played like this have gone on to be violent, antisocial individuals.

In fact, such games were the best outlets and means of socialization those of us involved had. Despite violent themes and dark happenings in them, we found a community to belong to, and a space in which we were able to fight imaginary monsters that we stood a chance at beating and make things right in a way we were not able or allowed to in real life.

I cannot speak for the players of HvZ and say whether or not their motivation for playing and the enjoyment they get out of it is the same type that I and people I know experienced.

However I can say from experience that it is absolutely false that such harmless and therapeutic escapism is a necessary indicator of how someone will act in real life.

The article in question could have easily been one just about Ortiz's reservations about the use of guns or gun-like objects in the game. It was a completely unnecessary cheap shot to bring in negative stereotypes about a group that still unfortunately remains an acceptable target in doing so. It's fine if she thinks that such people are "lame," but spreading fear by implying that they are mass murderers in training is uncalled for.

Dear Editor:

We have to say that we found your article "Take gun, violent imagery" in the Oct. 23, 2008 edition of The Daily Collegian ignorant, stereotypical and discriminatory, as well as close minded.

Did you ever happen to consider that people are playing this game as a means of letting steam off? It is midterm season here at the University of Massachusetts after all. Maybe the people playing the game are only trying to relax after a hard day spent studying and taking exams.

In your article, you also lump everyone playing the game into the social class of "nerd." We personally find this very unfair and ignorant. Last year, my girlfriend and I played the game. And we are by no means "nerds."

To us, it sounds like you found one group of students playing the game and used them as a basis for everyone else playing. Maybe next time you write an article, you'll take the time to find out all the information about your topic. Even just looking around at the people playing, you can tell that they are not all "nerds."

We also find it very unfair that you group these so called "nerds" into the rejected class. Who are you to say who the rejected group is in society?

On a side note, you should recognize that these "nerds" make up a good portion of your audience. But with their "nerdy" studying habits and understanding of technology, you'll probably end up working under them sooner rather than later.

Your article also states that HvZ is unsafe and a violent game. However, if you had read the rules of the game, you will see that the creators took special care to make the game as safe as possible (e.g. when players are on a bike, they are essentially putting the game on pause). To be honest, we have seen more people hurt playing football than playing HvZ.

Violence is caused when one group is put down and made fun of because of the activities they partake in; when they are made to feel less than other people. I'd say that the attitudes expressed in your article are more likely to cause violence than a simple game of tag.

CLARITY OF MIND

Dear Editor

(Re: "UMass Mental Health falls short for some," Liz Wahlman, News, Oct. 17)

Correspondent Liz Wahlman raised several important points in her recent feature on student mental health – among them, the need for communication and information.

However, information must be accurate to be useful and unfortunately, this story was not. Perhaps most concerning was the erroneous description of Mental Health Services' emergency care.

MHS provides on-call services 24 hours a day, seven days a week, every day of the year. Students in an emergency situation can call or come to MHS during the day, or come to Walk-in Care at University Health Services evenings, weekends and holidays.

This multi-layered system ensures that emergencies receive immediate attention – not an appointment, days later. Students can also call MHS during the day and request a screening appointment.

Scheduled for the same or next day, these rapidly match needs to services and may result in an emergency, urgent or routine appointment, or a community referral.

The article's depiction of MHS as having a small, untrained staff is also highly inaccurate. The current roster includes 18 full-time professionals, including psychiatrists, psychologists, clinical social workers and an advanced practice nurse.

In keeping with recognized professional standards, our five interns and post-graduate fellow provide services under the close supervision of senior clinicians.

This depth and breadth of skills enables MHS to offer a wide range of services, including brief psychotherapies, behavioral medicine, medication management, support and therapy groups and an eating disorders clinic.

Assertions that phone contact is difficult and that "many students believe the services (MHS) provides are not meeting their needs" are contradicted by annual patient satisfaction surveys.

In the most recent study, 98.8 percent of respondents said they were able to reach MHS by phone, while 97.6 percent felt their clinician was helpful in addressing their problems or concerns. Equally significant is that 95.5 percent would recommend MHS to a friend.

It's also important to acknowledge UMass' efforts around issues of depression and suicide. Last year, MHS was awarded a major suicide awareness and prevention grant from the federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.

Since then, hundreds of campus staff have received intensive training in recognition and intervention, while posters, brochures, presentations and Web pages are helping increase understanding.

All MHS staff members have extensive training in working with suicide and crisis response. The MHS team appreciates every opportunity to share accurate information about mental health and the many resources available to students. We invite readers to visit us online at www.umass.edu/uhs/mental-health to learn more.

Apollo Sunshine will try and pay homage to the late Jimi Hendrix during a Halloween-themed performance.

Sunshine and Hendrix

Psychadelic pop band to play dress up as classic rock legend

BY ANGELA STASIOWSKI
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Apollo Sunshine will be channeling the ghosts of music's past this Halloween for their show at Iron Horse Music Hall this Friday.

Performing as the "Apollo Sunshine Experience," the band will be combining their experimental indie fare with the stylings of the late Jimi Hendrix for only three shows in October.

With their distinctive 60's flare and larger than life personalities, the band is a great fit to portray the enigma that is Hendrix.

In an act of true Halloween spirit and dedication to the guitar god, they plan to both perform his music and dress for the occasion.

Apollo Sunshine was conceived in the early days of the new millennium while its founding members were students at Berklee College of Music in Boston. Jesse Gallagher, Sam Cohen, and Jeremy Black released their first album as Apollo Sunshine in 2003.

Entitled "Katonah," after the city in New York where it was recorded, the album broadcasted a sound that straddled psychedelic pop and folk. It was released on spinArt Records, a recently disbanded record label that has been home to indie darlings Apples in Stereo and the legendary Pixies.

Songs like "I Was on the Moon" and "Fear of Heights" display the band's dramatically original approach at indie rock, mixing screeching guitars with hazy harmonies into a mellow, alternative sound.

Its second of three releases, the self-titled "Apollo Sunshine" album was an even greater success than its predecessor.

The catchy guitar hooks and sing-along lyrics of "Eyes" and "Today is the Day" earned the band a cult underground following, as well as features in Rolling Stone's "Artists to Watch" and Amazon.com's "Best of 2005."

The album featured their most folk-oriented tunes, including "Magnolia," which verges on country twang at times, driven by the persistence of unconventional percussion.

"Shall Noise Upon," the band's latest album, was released earlier this year to much accolade from the indie rock community. As a whole, the album possesses a brand of lighthearted freedom that is achieved through a more mature, experimental approach to songwriting.

While the title appears a proclamation of the band's intent to rock, the most astute of fans will discover that it is also an anagram of the name "Apollo Sunshine."

Iron Horse to host low-key duo

Former Toad the Wet Sproket singer to play

BY MICHELLE FREDETTI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton is known for bringing more low-key music to the Pioneer Valley, and will stay true to that reputation this Friday. Seasoned musician and former Toad the Wet Sprocket lead singer Glen Phillips will be performing with singer-songwriter Antje Duvekot.

Duvekot, the supporting act, was born in Germany, moved to the United States at 13 and has made homes in several places since then, including New York and Boston. She has become somewhat of a local folk artist, while currently based out of Somerville.

Duvekot began writing at the age of 16, but she has only recently grabbed the attention of critics with her debut studio album, "Big Dream Boulevard" in 2006. Prior to this album, she released "Little Peppermints" (2002) and "Boys, Flowers, Miles" (2005). Both of these albums derive their content mostly from live performances with some studio overdubs included.

While Duvekot may be newer to the scene than Phillips, she has already begun showing the music industry that she knows what she's doing. She has won a variety of distinguished awards, including the Grand Prize in the John Lennon Songwriting Competition for her song "Soma" in 2000. She was also awarded the Kerrville, Texas, "Best New Folk Award" and the Boston Music Award for "Outstanding Folk Act."

The tone of much of Duvekot's music is fairly somber, but she said recently that she is aiming to deal with lighter themes in the future.

Duvekot can be categorized as folk, indie or acoustic and claims to be influenced by artists such as Ani DiFranco, Dar Williams and Shawn Colvin.

At 38, Phillips is the clear veteran on this ticket. While Duvekot began writing at an early age, Phillips had already formed the band Toad the Wet Sprocket by that age. The band was signed in 1988 and found much success. They disbanded 10 years later after six albums and much touring.

Phillips' first solo album, "Abulum" was released in April 2001. In 2005, he put out the critically acclaimed "Winter Pays for Summer," and a year later released "Mr. Lemons." His most recent EP, "Secrets of the New Explorers," was released earlier this year.

Although Phillips jokingly says his influences as "gravity, inertia and electromagnetic fields," he is inspired by the work of many other artists and has taken on a variety of collaboration projects.

He teamed up with the members of bluegrass band Nickel Creek in 2000 to form the Mutual Admiration society, recording a record by that same title in just three days that was released in 2004. The group has toured together on several occasions, and the often pop up at each other's concerts.

Sean Watkins of Nickel Creek will be joining Phillips at the Iron Horse this Friday as well.

It has been said that Phillips will be doing another project with some members of Nickel Creek in the near future, along with members of

Bloodsucking on film

BY MORGAN MEAGHER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Bloodthirsty fiends, stalkers of nights and nightmares. Vampires, a perennial Halloween favorite, have been lurking in the annals of horror since long before Bram Stoker wrote "Dracula." It is that story and that vampire, however, which have become the most famous and seen the most film incarnations.

Stoker's Transylvanian Count has been haunting the nightmares of moviegoers since almost the inception of filmmaking. Indeed, there is a Dracula movie for every type of horror aficionado.

The first Dracula movie was 1922's "Nosferatu," directed by German film auteur F.W. Murnau. Subtitled "A Symphony of Horror," the film is just that. Although "Nosferatu" is based on Bram Stoker's "Dracula," the names and locations are different because Murnau could not get the rights to the book from Stoker's estate.

Thus, the vampire is called Count Orlok rather than Count Dracula, and the story takes place in Germany rather than England. Other than that, it is a fairly loose adaptation. The young real estate agent, Hutter, meets Count Orlok, and sells him a house in Hutter's own hometown.

Orlok moves in and becomes enamored with Hutter's wife, Ellen, wreaking havoc until he is eventually vanquished by the sun.

The genius of "Nosferatu" and the reason it endures as a classic to this day lies in the Expressionist style adopted by Murnau.

The film was shot in black and white, but some scenes were tinted: yellow for scenes during the day, blue for night scenes. The effect is subtle in older prints of the film, but striking on the remastered DVD recently released by Kino.

The stark shadows and the score add to the eerie atmosphere. The vampire, played by Max Schreck, glides into shots — pale as death — dressed in black from his neck to his feet.

His long, skeletal hands end in inch-long fingernails. Schreck is truly haunting; his image is one of the most enduring in horror movie history.

Murnau's "Nosferatu" spawned two other vampire movies. One was a 1979 German remake directed by Werner Herzog and starring Isabelle Adjani and Klaus Kinski. The remake, in color and with sound, is more accessible, but it lacks the artistry and the

Solos & Duos series continues

Second installment to feature mixture of jazz

BY BENJAMIN AXELSON
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center's popular Solos & Duos series is continuing its seventh season tonight with another duo concert by flutist Nicole Mitchell and guitarist Jeff Parker.

This, the season's second show, promises to be dramatically different from the first show which was Swami LatePlate's Doom Jazz. By making this huge jump, the series looks to attract jazz fans from a variety of tastes.

Where Doom Jazz was a dark rollercoaster of sounds, Mitchell and Parker's music will be filled with far more melody and soul.

These two young masters from Chicago will bring a unique blend of upbeat, positive sounds and soulful, boppy feel to UMass.

For the past three years, Mitchell has placed first in Downbeat's "Rising Star" on her instrument, and was awarded "Chicagoan of the Year 2006" by the Chicago Tribune. The founder of the critically acclaimed Black Earth Ensemble, the Nicole Mitchell Quartet and the Indigo Trio, Mitchell's compositions reach across jazz, gospel, pop and African music to create a fascinating synthesis of postmodern jazz.

Mitchell has performed with George Lewis, James Newton, Bill Dixon and Muhal Richard Abrams and has ongoing projects with Anthony Braxton, Ed Wilkerson and Hamid Drake. She is currently Co-President of the Association for the Advancement of Creative Musicians – the legendary Chicago-based musician centered self-help organization.

Last year she premiered a number of commissioned works, including, "Many Paths to the Sea: A Tribute to Alice Coltrane," "Qualities of My Father," "Xenogenesis Suite: A Tribute to Octavia Butler" and new music for award-winning poet Haki R. Madhubuti. Mitchell directs the Jazz Ensemble at Wheaton College and teaches jazz history at University of Illinois, Chicago.

Some of her other projects include Mitchell Tindanga Mama (a multi-generational, all-woman ensemble) and the Aaya Sensation (a group showcasing the talents of Mitchell's teen daughter).

Jeff Parker is a widely-traveled jazz guitarist, equally at home in soul-jazz, hard-bop, dub, hip-hop, electronic and free jazz. He studied at Berklee College of Music beginning in 1985 and moved to Chicago in 1991. Once in the Windy City, Parker joined forces with cornetist Robert Mazurek and

No need to 'Shudder'

"Shudder" is the fourth full-length album from N.Y. natives Bayside. The album is a dramatic improvement over the band's previous releases.

Bayside blends catchy melodies, heavy drums

BY MICHELLE ABBASCIANO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Just when mainstream punk rock was assumed dead, Bayside has brought it back to life. With the release of their fourth full-length album "Shudder," the four-piece band from Queens, N.Y., has produced a cohesive, catchy record that grabs the listener's attention and does not let it go until the closing note of track 12.

With their usual dark and brooding lyrics, yet upbeat melodies, Bayside does a phenomenal job of bridging the gap between their driving riffs and pounding drums.

At the same time, they appropriately walk the thin line of cliched catchy choruses, unique riffs and melodies that fans can appreciate for their musical qualities, but also to sing-along.

Guitarist Jack O'Shea continues his impressive solos and breakdowns on "Shudder." Drummer Chris Guiglielmo contributes his powerful thrashing drums and bassist Nick Ghanbarian delivers with his smooth bass lines.

O'Shea's outstanding performance stands out particularly on "Roshambo." His breakdown is truly remarkable and will make any listener want to blast their speakers to fully appreciate.

Although vocalist Anthony Raneri gives his best attempt at impersonating Smoking Popes singer Josh Caterer in a couple songs, it ends up sounding silly and forced. Raneri definitely comes off at his best while singing in his own vocal range throughout songs, such as in tracks "I Can't Go On" and "The Ghost of Saint Valentine."

"Boy," "Demons" and "Roshambo" are all new flavors, with the same great Bayside taste. When Raneri announced months ago that the band would be heading in a more punk direction with their next release, some fans cringed while others became skeptical. This album is distinctly Bayside, but with some new flair.

It is no secret that Bayside is known for writing about love, life and pain. Although some critics may label them as "emo," they should not be so quick to pass Bayside off as just another band from the mainstream mold. Their albums are relatable to someone of any age, especially with their cynical lyrics about life, love and every stab in the back along the way.

Raneri not only sings about lust and loss, but even calls himself out on the track "Have Fun Storming the Castle."

Bayside may be called many things, but one thing they are not guilty of is being untruthful. The band is brutally honest on each track. They sing about what is real to them.

"Shudder" is just as hard, aggressive and in your face as the band's previous records, "The Walking Wounded," "Sirens and Condolences" and their self-titled album, so any previous fans should find this studio effort more than acceptable.

BAYSIDE
"SHUDDER"
VICTORY RECORDS
7.5/10

Some stand out tracks include the opening song "Boy," which is fast-paced and set off by gang vocals, "I Can't Go On," a uniquely dark, slower tempo, yet toe-tapping track, and the CD's single, "No One Understands."

The closing track, "Mocsanu," is just over two minutes long, and proves to be an interesting choice for a finale that fans will either love or hate.

Songs like this have proven to be popular in the mainstream pop world, evident by Gwen Stefani's annoyingly catchy "Hella Back Girl" and Fergie's "Glamorous," so maybe Raneri wanted to try his hand at this style of song.

Whether it's a hit or miss is up to the listener, but this simple song is well done at its core, with its acoustic guitar background that will undoubtedly appeal to many.

Bayside have come a long way since their first album, improving dramatically with each release, and may have finally reached the top with "Shudder."

They should no doubtedly receive more recognition than they do, and "Shudder" may help propel them into their long deserved spot light and pull them up the charts as well.

Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers, Elvis Costello and the Imposters and others. They will be forming a new band, The Scrolls, but until then Phillips is touring performing his solo work.

Phillips says of himself, "I spend about half of my time driving around the country making music for people. The other half is spent at home with my three daughters and wife [...] I'd like to make it more like three-fourths at home, but it hasn't worked out that way yet."

It hasn't worked out that way yet because even after over 20 years of making music, Phillips is still making music that people want to hear.

Despite Phillips' heavy touring, the show at the Iron Horse will be his first in almost a month. Phillips gashed his left arm badly by breaking through a glass coffee table on Oct. 8 and was forced to cancel some of his shows. He underwent surgery Oct. 13, and though he will play on Friday, his arm will not be fully healed.

Dracula 101: fangs on film

mood of the expressionist original. The other film to be engendered by Murnau's is "Shadow of the Vampire", which claims that Max Schreck was really a vampire.

Although it does not fall under the horror genre, "Shadow of the Vampire" bears mentioning for its great cast (including John Malkovich, Cary Elwes and Eddie Izzard), good acting, and its interesting, albeit fictional, premise.

A more strict adaptation of Bram Stoker's novel is Francis Ford Coppola's "Dracula." Featuring an all-star cast – as well as Keanu Reeves – it is undoubtedly one of Coppola's best films.

Gary Oldman's performance as Count Dracula is charming and terrifying in turn. This film also has a very artistic aesthetic; many shots are more reminiscent of paintings than traditional movie scenes. Coppola covers all the bases of Stoker's tale, including how Count Dracula became a vampire by renouncing God after the death of his beloved wife.

The film features Tom Waits as a wildly insane Renfield, Reeves as the protagonist, Harker, Winona Rider as his fiance and Anthony Hopkins as Van Helsing.

The several frightening incarnations of the vampire, including an old and decrepit Dracula – a werewolf-type beast and a gruesome, giant bat-like creature – along with the sumptuous, decadent scenery help make "Dracula" one of the better vampire movies.

For fans of campier horror, there is the Hammer collection of Dracula movies. Hammer Film Productions, a British studio which made mainly horror films, released its adaptation of Stoker's novel in 1958, and over the next decade and a half produced a slew of low-budget sequels. Usually starring Christopher Lee as the vampire and Peter Cushing as his nemesis Van Helsing, these films include "Dracula Has Risen From the Grave," "Scars of Dracula" and "Taste the Blood of Dracula."

There is little continuity between films in the series; at the end of each film, Dracula is vanquished, but he somehow always returns for the next movie. By today's standards, the Hammer movies are rather tame, but they do feature some gore, including ample amounts of biting and staking.

The later sequels brought the series into modern times. "Dracula AD 1972," released that year, saw the Count preying on Londoners, including one of Van Helsing's descendents. The final Hammer vampire film, 1974's "The Legend of the Seven Golden Vampires," was a horror-kung fu hybrid set in China.

1972's "Blacula" is one of the campier feature films to feature a vampire as its main character.

The 1922 film "Nosferatu" is the first to feature a vampire. The Vampire, played by Max Schreck, wears all black and has abnormally long fingernails.

The Hammer films, though not critically acclaimed, were successful in their time. Today they are deeply satisfying to the lover of cheesy horror films for their interesting stories, lavish sets and high levels of campy drama.

An even campier film, perfect for those who shy away from scary movies, is the 1972 blaxploitation flick, "Blacula."

The movie begins with an African prince journeying to Count Dracula's castle to seek his help in ending the slave trade. Instead, the prince is transformed by the Count, who christens him Blacula. Fast forward to the 1970s. Blacula is released from his crypt to unleash destruction on Los Angeles and reclaim his lost love.

Hilarious rather than horrifying, this vampire movie is not to be missed. An interesting set of animated credits opens the film, from then on it's non-stop laughter.

Watch for Blacula's scruffy beard which – like his fangs – appears only when he is about to feast upon the blood of the living, and the coroner who inexplicably has a hook for a hand.

In addition to the album title, however, the music is also quite multifaceted, focusing more on lyrical complexity and fuller instrumentation than any of the band's prior efforts. It was initially released on vinyl only, then on CD several weeks later.

The album blends the best of various musical styles, including rock, funk, folk and punk into a truly unique cocktail. Everything from steel guitar to synthesizer to harp is featured within the confines of this album, bending the concept of genre altogether.

"Singing to the Earth (To Thank Her For You)," the album's first single, is a contagiously catchy homage to an unspecified object of affection. Both the aging hippy and the modern hipster can appreciate its lolling soundscape, complete with galloping guitar and the twinkle of Gallagher's vocals.

On the other end of the spectrum, songs like "Wolf Frog White" and "We are Born When We Die" have little melodic value, relying heavily on the diverse but full instrumentation to carry their avant-garde weight.

Evident in the meticulous production of this new album, the band has honed their ability to construct solid, modern music without losing the stylistic freedom within their songs. If anything, its latest album is the result of the band branching out far and beyond their own musical conventions.

With each new album, Apollo Sunshine has maintained their retro-meets-futuristic sound while making a distinct musical statement every time. They have traversed the area between rock and folk, and have found themselves in an entirely new terrain.

Combining the promotion of "Shall Noise Upon" with their tribute to Hendrix, the band promises to unite the music of past and present into something completely new. They have truly proven themselves as an intelligent band with a knack for the unconventional.

Apollo Sunshine will be performing at Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton on Oct. 31 at 10 pm. Tickets are $10 in advance or $13 at the door.

Bryant rout not just a win

Backups gain experience, play valuable minutes in victory

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

After the Massachusetts football team blew out Bryant, 42-7, the Minutemen gained the confidence they need in traveling to Rhode Island on Saturday.

Quarterback Liam Coen and wide receivers Victor Cruz and Jeremy Horne at their sharpest and could go a long way against the Ram defense. This game is a must-win for the No. 15 Minutemen (5-3, 2-2 Colonial Athletic Association) if they want any hope to get to the postseason.

In last Saturday's game against the Bulldogs, Coen was at his best, completing 11-of-18 passes for 389 yards and five touchdowns.

When Coen was pressured, which was a rarity due to the outstanding play of his linemen, he calmly slipped outside of the pocket, evaded tacklers while gaining more time and released his near-perfect throws.

Saturday should be no different.

Coen and his targets are going up against one of the worst defenses in the CAA.

Rhode Island (2-7, 0-5 CAA) has allowed 31.6 points per game and almost 1,700 yards rushing. Its passing defense is much of the same. 2,160 passing yards allowed and almost 13 yards per catch.

Part of the season for the lack of defensive output by the Rams is that they're very young. A large portion of the URI defensive corps is either sophomores or freshmen.

Rhode Island's leading tackler Matt Hansen is a sophomore. Hansen played in all of the Rams' 11 games last season and was second on the team in tackles (73). With the experience that Hansen got last year, the defensive linemen/defensive back used it to his advantage in his playing time this year.

Many of the Rhode Island defenders don't have that luxury. For many of them, this is their first season of seeing any live-game action and that inexperience is costing the team.

Redshirt junior tailback Tony Nelson should also have a good day on the ground. Nelson left in the first quarter of last week's game with an injury, but according to UMass coach Don Brown after the game, Nelson should be ready to go against URI.

In comparison, the Rams have allowed 171 more rushing yards than the Minutemen. Rhode Island has given up an average of 5.2 yards per carry so far this season.

Another vital aspect the Minutemen have on their side is the experience that their second-string obtained last week.

Midway through the third quarter, UMass coach Don Brown took out most of his starters and replaced them with their substitutes.

Backup quarterbacks Scott Woodward and Spencer Whipple, in addition to backup running backs Korrey Davis, Alphonsus Aguh, Jonathan Hernandez and Brandon White were some of the players that entered the game on the offensive side of the ball. Sam Besong, Anthony Rouzier and Shane Viveiros were a few of the players who played for the defense.

Redshirt freshman Jonathan Hernandez and other UMass tailbacks, such as Korrey Davis and Emil Igwenagu, gained valuable experience during the second half of the Minutemen's 42-7 victory over Bryant this past weekend.

Rams 'D' in trouble

against UMass (5-3, 2-2 CAA), as Cassidy only threw 10 passes to their 63 rushing attempts.

But that was mostly due to the cold, rainy and windy weather, which resulted in nothing but rushing attempts and a few short passes mixed in. Both teams were forced to virtually abandon the kicking game entirely, as punts and field goals didn't travel.

With a systemic emphasis on the passing game, no Ram running back has run for 300 yards or for more than two scores yet this season.

Without UMass' star cornerback Sean Smalls, who is likely out for the season due to a hip injury – the key for UMass to stopping URI's passing attack will be the pressure the defensive front can get on Cassidy. The Minutemen hope that getting defensive end Michael Hanson and defensive tackle Brandon Collier (probable) back from injury will provide the spark.

The Minutemen also expect Tony Nelson – the second-leading rusher for yards per game (101.1) in the CAA – to be at full strength this weekend. The Rams have had problems on defense this season, particularly in the ground game, so Nelson could be a big part of the UMass gameplan.

But expect a big day from the Minutemen through the air and by quarterback Liam Coen in his final trip to his home state. Coen wasn't able to [illegible] of a factor in last year's game (7-of-22 for 22 yards and one interception) due to the weather, but is coming off [illegible] game against Bryant (3-of-3 passes and five touchdown passes) last weekend in the 42-7 victory.

Field dimensions to play factor for UMass

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

A team can control how hard it works for a win, but sometimes there are outside influences that affect the result that the team is unable to control.

For the Massachusetts men's soccer team, this Friday brings a much different atmosphere than that of Rudd Field.

"We're going on the road in one of the most difficult places to play on Friday night. It's going to be freezing. How we adapt to that and how we overcome that is going to be important," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "It'll be a Friday night crowd. Halloween so you know they'll be, shall we say juiced up a little bit. It'll be a tough crowd to play in front of," Koch said.

The temperature on Friday at the 7:00 p.m. kickoff is expected to be in the high 30-degree range, and will most likely get colder as the night progresses. Yet, the weather is the least of the Minutemen's worries because last year they played in snow. Koch thinks the conditions will have a much bigger affect on the coaching staff than on the players.

The differences in the playing fields are what will affect Friday's game the most. LaSalle's soccer team plays at McCarthy Stadium, which houses 7,500 fans compared to UMass' Rudd Field that holds 2,000 fans. Although the stadium is larger, the field is significantly thinner and uses a different type of turf.

"[McCarthy Stadium] is poly-turf, which is quick; it's the narrowest field in the conference – it's like 68-yards wide," Koch said.

The movement of the ball is going to be much quicker on the artificial grass at McCarthy Stadium than the natural-grass turf at Rudd Field.

The width of the field will also have a large impact on the way the game is played. Rudd Field is 75-yards wide – seven-yards wider than McCarthy Stadium. The Explorers have a solid team, but with the smaller field it makes their defense even more effective by allowing them to press more defensively.

"They're a pretty aggressive, physical team. Now you are on a smaller field so there is going to be a lot more physical contact and when they play at home they fight like banshees," Koch said.

It is going to be important for UMass to play as close to the lines as possible to create as space in the middle of the field. Earlier in the season Koch stressed using outside channels to advance the ball and the Minutemen have used those chances numerous times for a goal. But now with the thin field, it will be even more important.

paper, having been outscored 13-26 over the course of the season.

However, the Explorers do hold a 3-2 victory over Charlotte who was ranked No. 19 coming into that game. Koch warned his team that La Salle's season is not over yet and that they will be looking to play the role of spoiler.

"They are a scrappy team, they look for knockdowns, and they're pretty good at getting [to the ball]. Are they as fine tuned as Wake Forest? No, but not many teams are. They are aggressive and they create chances and knockdowns, and that can be dangerous," Koch said.

The UMass match against Fordham Sunday appears to be much tougher for UMass, at least on paper. The Rams come into this weekend in a similar situation as the Minutemen with three wins in their last four games, and will also play a game on Friday against Rhode Island.

Koch is happy with the way his team has been performing and is confident the Minutemen will prevail, but he knows in soccer, anything can happen.

"The momentum is swinging in our favor, but every game is different so you just don't know," Koch said. "Who scores the first goal? How do we react to it? Do we keep going after a score or do we sit back? If we score real early sometimes you say 'oh this is an easy game' which is the worst thing of all. We just don't know so we have to see how the game goes."

Captain Cory Quirk is tied with Alex Berry for the team lead in assists with three and is second on the team in shots with 16 through the first four games this season.

Quirk dominating in circle

New rules give big advantage to offense on penalty faceoffs

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

Thinking of hockey and all of the nuances of the game, one tends not to immediately acknowledge the importance of faceoffs.

But in a sport based on possession, winning faceoffs are essentially for maintaining control of the puck.

The Minutemen have done well in the faceoff circle during critical situations. Forwards Cory Quirk and Brett Watson headline the red-circle winners.

On the season, the Minutemen are 543 percentage. Their outcome has played a key part in determining the results of games for the Minutemen at this early stage in the season.

In their last game against No. 4 New Hampshire (3-1-1, 1-0-1 Hockey East), the Minutemen won faceoffs near the end of the third period when the Wildcats were on the power play. The faceoff victories enabled UMass to dish the puck back to its defenders, killing time off the penalty and subsequently flicking it down the ice – again killing time.

Watson, one of the leaders of the Mass Attack's penalty killing units has stood out in these certain positions.

The junior has gone 31-25 on faceoffs in UMass' four games. His 57 percent success in faceoffs currently ranks second on the team. With Watson typically on the ice for nearly the entirety of UMass penalties, this skill is invaluable.

Quirk currently leads the Minutemen (59 percent) in faceoff percentage. Most of Quirk's faceoffs come when the Minutemen are at even-strength (5-on-5) or on the power play.

The senior gives the Minutemen an offensive boost not only with his quick shots or playmaking ability, but also gives UMass a possession advantage whether in the opposition's zone or its own.

There were a couple of new faceoff rules that were established by the Hockey East this season.

On the ensuing faceoff after a penalty is called, the puck is to be brought back, deep within the offending team's zone. That rule wasn't in affect in previous years. Prior to this year, faceoffs were held wherever the penalty happened.

This new rule would no doubt give an advantage to whatever team was on the power play. Not only would a team have the man advantage, it would also have an additional offensive advantage with the puck already being placed in the opposition's zone.

Also new to this season are the amount of faceoff spots on the ice. Instead of starting play wherever it ended, the referees can only drop the puck in the red faceoff circles.

"Unfortunately for the defensive team; instead of being faced off right there, which is about 50 feet from the goal, it's being brought in to the closest circle, which brings the advantage to the offense," UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

UMass to face strong Providence defense

typically splitting time in goal, Mannix was in net for the Friars' 4-1 loss against UMass-Lowell on Oct. 24 while Gates was awarded the win against Holy Cross.

To be successful against the Friars, the Minutemen need to play to their tempo, their speed and their tenacity. UMass has to work at competing for loose pucks and maintain the same effort Providence has, or better.

"[To win this weekend] we have to neutralize their defensemen on the offensive side of things," Cahoon said. "[They] do a good job at blocking shots and fronting the play. Being able to hopefully catch them in an over-aggressive mode so that we can chip pucks by them and create situations off of that."

It hasn't been decided who is starting in goal for the Minutemen. But Cahoon is happy with the way junior Dan Meyers has been playing this season. Meyers has been in net every game so far due to the injury of sophomore Paul Dainton.

With the absence of Dainton in the lineup, Meyers has proven to be a strong aspect of the Minutemen, averaging 1.47 goals against per game with a save percentage of .948. Now that Dainton is healed and ready to see ice time this weekend – he began practicing again in the middle of last week – Cahoon is not sure who will mind the net. But depending on how sharp Dainton is, Meyers will take the starting role once again.

"Everybody's going to be pumped up that we're playing in our own building and have the students be out and get back where we like to play most," Cahoon said. "But you can't be so excited that you forget what you're doing and you're not paying attention to detail and your execution suffers as a result of it."

Leagues changing rules for fan appeal

that the Eagles needed any help.

After 65 minutes with the Wildcats Friday, Cahoon and UNH coach Dick Umile felt their teams deserved more than a single point for their efforts, and at the same, were relieved to escape with that point. But when teams battle like UMass and UNH did, it seems irresponsible to award a third point to a team simply because it wins something as ridiculous as a shootout.

"That was a good hockey game and I don't think any team should walk out of the arena feeling like they lost because of the shootout," Umile said after Friday's game. "I don't think we needed any more excitement than what was in the arena tonight."

Like Cahoon said earlier this season, it's like deciding a baseball game with a home run derby.

Fans may enjoy watching each team's three best 1-on-1 skaters going head-to-head with the opposition goaltender, though, it's difficult to imagine anything more exciting than the 65 minutes in Durham last weekend. The teams were truly even. Foster matched Meyers save for jaw-dropping save. Assuming fans can't enjoy college hockey without a bastardized spectacle like a shootout insults them and could have truly disastrous results for the sport.

What's so bad about a tie anyway? Cahoon suggested an alternative last season: extend the overtime period from 5 minutes to 10. If after 70 minutes of hockey, there's no winner, then there isn't supposed to be a winner. It's selfish on the part of CCHA athletic directors and a pathetic ploy to make an already exciting conference even more so.

In the game between Michigan State and Northern Michigan last weekend, NMU earned a tie with a superior, nationally-ranked opponent. Awarding a point to the Spartans for winning a shootout negates the point NMU earned, and rewards Michigan State for not beating a team it should have because they won a shootout.

I understand the need to make hockey more appealing to grow the sport, but it's not worth the sport's integrity to do so.

UM to play crucial set

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This weekend may define the season for the Massachusetts men's soccer team.

A strong performance by the Minutemen puts them within striking distance of an Atlantic 10 Tournament berth. However, if they stumble, they will find themselves in a do-or-die situation next week.

The Minutemen (5-6-2, 3-1-1 Atlantic 10) will face two conference foes on the road as they face La Salle (2-10-3, 1-4 A-10) on Friday, followed by Fordham (7-6-1, 3-2 A-10) on Sunday, in a pair of games that will be crucial for UMass.

If the Minutemen falter this week, they would have to win their next two games against No. 16 Saint Louis and Charlotte, both of whom are considered to be among the top teams in the country, in order to make the A-10 Tournament.

"These games are huge," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "They are very, very important; we have to continue playing the way we have been playing. Otherwise, we come home against two of the top ranked teams in the country, and having to beat both of those teams to get in the Atlantic 10 [Tournament] is not something that we want to do."

After a rocky start to the season, the Maroon and White have hit their stride and are currently sitting in second place in the A-10. They are on a four-game unbeaten streak and are coming off back-to-back conference wins against Richmond and George Washington. In those four games, the Minutemen have outscored their opponents, 8-2, as the offense and defense have begun to play at the level Koch expects.

"We're moving the ball better, we are playing as a team much better, I think that the group is in sync and those are all real positive things," Koch said.

Forward Mark DeSantis has been on a hot streak recently, scoring three goals along with an assist over the last four games, to spark the Minutemen's recent success.

La Salle is heading in the opposite direction as the Minutemen, having lost its last three games by a combined score of 6-1. The Explorers are an underwhelming opponent on

See M. SOCCER on page 9

Junior Mark DeSantis has been a big part of the Minutemen's recent offensive explosion. The forward has scored three goals and has one assist in UMass' last four games.

Minutemen invade Rhode Island

UMass tailback Tony Nelson is second in the CAA in rushing yards per game (101.1). On the season, the junior has gained a net of 809 yards on the ground and has rushed for seven touchdowns.

Goaltender Dan Meyers has only allowed six goals through four games this season for a 1.47 goals against average. In his past two games, the junior shutout Rensselaer and gave up one goal to New Hampshire.

UMass seeks revenge, heads to last-place URI

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Weather permitting, this year's meeting between the Massachusetts football team and Rhode Island will look nothing like last season's.

The Minutemen hope that applies to the outcome, as well.

No. 15 UMass travels to Kingston, R.I. for the second year in a row as it puts its postseason hopes on the line against the Rams Saturday. The 2007 encounter was a strange one, as the remnants of Hurricane Noel resulted in severe weather and a hectic 12-6 victory for Rhode Island.

"That game really hurt us," UMass coach Don Brown said looking back on it before practice on Tuesday. "We just didn't get it done. But at the same time, the revenge-factor [for this Saturday's game] is kind of fake motivation. If we're not motivated to go down there and play our best game, how strong are we?"

The Rams are a much different-looking team offensively this time around, ditching their former triple-option offensive style to more of a spread-offense look. About the only similarity to last year in this meeting will be URI's winless conference record.

But Brown isn't overlooking the Rams (2-7, 0-5 Colonial Athletic Association), who have given some of the better teams in the CAA (New Hampshire, William & Mary and Towson) a tough time this season.

"They are in every football game, so that's concerning," Brown said. "I think [URI quarterback Derek Cassidy] has made a nice transition [in the new style of offense] and he's giving them a chance."

While still incorporating his ability to move in and out of the pocket (he's gained 326 yards and four touchdowns rushing), Cassidy has thrown for an average of 254.3 yards per game to go along with his 15 touchdown passes. He has been prone to turnovers, however, throwing 12 interceptions.

As opposed to last season, the Rams are much more of a passing team in 2008. Cassidy is averaging over 40 passes per game this season, while the Rams have cut down their rushing attempts (56.5 per game last season, 28.5 this season) virtually in half. That's a far cry from last year, especially

Maroon and White play to home and away vs. Providence, host Friars in opener on Halloween

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the first time this season, the Massachusetts hockey team will play at the Mullins Center with back-to-back games against the same opponent.

The Minutemen (2-1-1, 0-0-1 Hockey East) are coming off a 1-1 tie against No. 6 New Hampshire last weekend and host Providence Friday. On Saturday, they travel to Rhode Island to play the Friars once again.

"It's a battle that starts at 7:00 p.m. Friday night and doesn't end until 9:30 p.m. on Saturday night," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "It's a battle of wits. It's a battle of strength and endurance. It's a battle of will."

Providence (2-2-0, 0-2-0 Hockey East) is an aggressive, physical team that just keeps playing. The Friars are known for their defensive core with their most established and prolific players being part of the defense. Providence defenders tend to pinch down against the boards in their offensive zone which doesn't allow their opponent to break out the puck.

"They've got a lot of forwards that work really hard, that grind, that play both ends of the rink and really compete," Cahoon said. "But their talent is back there on the defense. A lot of their point production stems from the defensemen."

Providence's leading returning defensemen include senior Matt Taormina, sophomore Eric Baier and junior Mark Fayne. Freshmen Daniel New has also made an impact at defense for the Friars. Taormina is third on the team for points (three) with one goal and two assists. Baier has tallied an assist and New has a goal this season.

Their last time out, the Friars beat Holy Cross, 6-4, on Oct. 25. All of Providence's goals were scored by different players. This season, the Friars have tallied 11 goals, with the only multi-goal scorer coming from junior co-captain John Cavanagh, who has two.

Providence has, however, allowed 15 goals. Chris Mannix has surrendered six goals and made 50 saves while backup goaltender Justin Gates has allowed eight goals and made 37 saves.

Both net minders have earned a win and a loss this season.

See HOCKEY on page 10

UMass coach Don Cahoon and other Hockey East coaches voted against instituting shootouts to break ties. Other leagues such as the Central Collegiate Hockey Association implemented shootouts.

Overtime rules in question

Joe Meloni

No one likes ties. They leave fans dissatisfied, and teams feeling like they could've done more.

Last Friday, the Massachusetts hockey team and then-No. 4 New Hampshire played to a 1-1 tie at the Whittemore Center in Durham, N.H. It was a great effort from both teams, and ended in a draw only because Brian Foster and Dan Meyers refused to give in an inch.

Both teams could have won the game, but neither deserved to lose it. Sure a bounce here or there would have provided a winner, but that bounce didn't come.

On the same night, roughly 1,200 miles to the west, Michigan State and Northern Michigan skated to a 2-2 tie after regulation and a 5-minute overtime period.

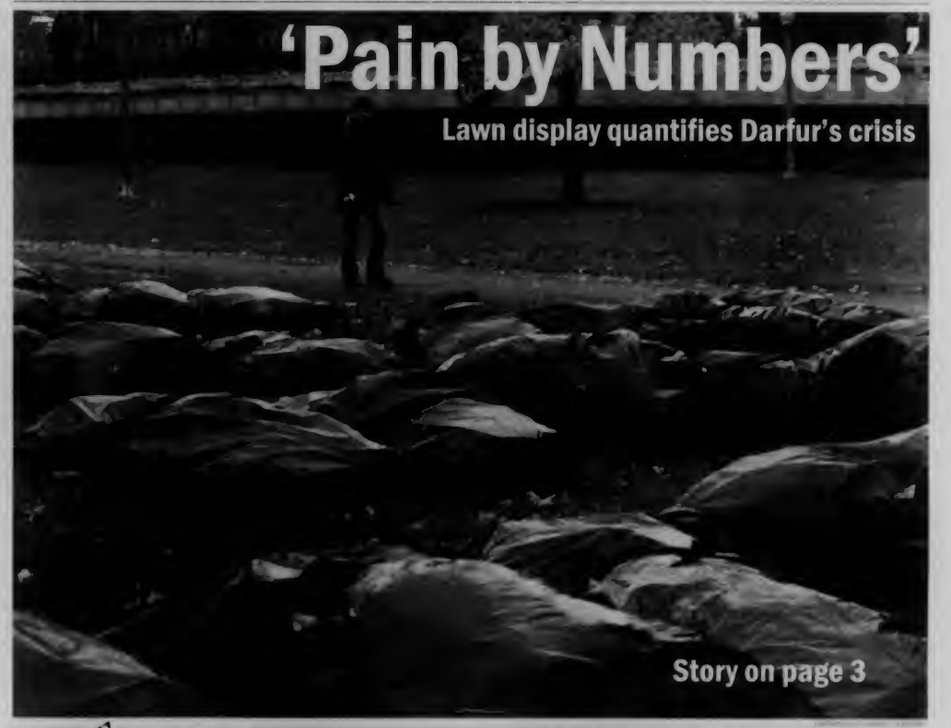
The game wasn't over, though.

Over the summer, the Central Collegiate Hockey Association (CCHA) — home to such college hockey powers as Michigan State and Michigan — instituted, after much debate, a shootout to decide games still tied after regulation and a 5-minute overtime.

The point system is exactly like the National Hockey League's: both teams receive a point for getting to the overtime. The winner of the shootout receives an extra point and the loser keeps its point despite falling short in the shootout.

The PairWise rankings — a convoluted system used to determine at-large bids to the NCAA tournament — is not, technically, affected by the result of the shootout as all games decided in this fashion go down as a tie outside of the CCHA standings.

However, a single point can completely shift the standings. Over the course of the season, four or five shootout wins means four or five more points. Those numbers often decide home ice in the conference tournaments. All of which do factor into the PairWise system. So even though the NCAA doesn't recognize a shootout win as an actual win, the shootout does affect its system. Call them technicalities, but every point, every game matters when it's time to dole out those 10 precious spots.



In 2007-08, UMass coach Don Cahoon saw his team tie five Hockey East games. An extra point or two would have helped the Minutemen qualify for the Hockey East playoffs more comfortably, but never once did he waver from his anti-shootout stance.

UMass finished one point behind seventh-place UMass Lowell in the Hockey East standings last season. With five ties in Hockey East play and an overtime loss to Maine, all those potential extra points could have pushed the Minutemen up the standings. Eventual national champion, Boston College tied seven games in Hockey East play, imagine the effects of a BC shootout with Nathan Gerbe, Ben Smith, Benn Ferriero, Joe Whitney, Brian Gibbons and the rest of BC's offensive threats to choose from — not

Panel tells women's stories

By Jennifer DeBerardino
Collegian Correspondent

All three panelists of Smith College's "Women's Narrative of Success Panel" had at least one thing in common, began Smith College Dean of Religious Life Jennifer Walters.

"Each has grappled with class in her own life and in her creative work," she said. All three were charged with sharing that experience with students on Wednesday.

Students packed the Campus Center Carmel Room for Smith's third annual panel, an off-shoot effort of the college's new strategic direction "to prepare women for rewarding lives," said Dean Maureen Mahoney.

The discussion "brings Smith students and alumnae together to promote new meanings of success."

Social class, though often the least acknowledged component of diversity, plays a large role in directing success, she continued.

Panelists offered personal anecdotes and some advice on their experiences with class in their lives and in their work.

"Class is bound up in silence," said author Lorene Cary, who attended the prestigious St. Paul's School in Connecticut on scholarship. St. Paul's is a world away from the Philadelphia public schools where she began her school career.

Part of the "black side" encountered by her Philadelphia public elementary school, a surge in African American students enrolling in schools headed by white middle class teachers, Cary said her school sentiment was one of assumed failure.

"Teachers made it clear that we were not as smart or as talented as their former white students," she said.

But 11th grade brought a scholarship to St. Paul's, an environment in which students were "cherished" and encouraged by administrators and teachers.

Cary "learned what it felt like to be among children of the upper class," she said.

Her first book, "Black Ice," is a memoir of her experiences as both a student and teacher at St. Paul's.

For Cary, education liberated her from continuing racial and class stereotypes.

"Race and class were always conflated because they were meant to be," she said.

She grew up feeling obligated to prove something about her own community, but "education liberated me from the need to prove it," she said. "I learned to understand class not in terms of money but in terms of autonomy ... that offers the possibility to change injustice."

Journalist and 1986 Smith graduate Adrian Nicole LeBlanc said class became an all-consuming and defining marker during her college years.

After a college career spent distancing herself to a working class family, she now aims through her "immigrant journalism" to complicate people's assumptions and make it impossible for people to be at ease with what they assume, she said.

LeBlanc spent 11 years among Brooklyn's poor for her book, "Random Family: Love, Drugs, Trouble and Coming of Age in the Bronx."

"Smith was a dense class experience for me," she said, which was apparent from the day of her arrival on campus. LeBlanc's mother used a van borrowed from the drug rehabilitation center at which she worked to move her daughter's things.

LeBlanc developed a hypersensitivity and almost crippling defensiveness to class issues. She may have had humble roots in a working class town outside Boston, but she was hardly representative of the working poor whose cause she adopted, she said.

Lacking a context with which to view her social class, "I spent most of my time in the library, afraid of being vaulted back into the blue collar life I didn't in fact lead," she said.

Now she's using her immersion reporting to listen and avoid making assumptions or unfair groupings, like those imposed upon herself.

The mark of an educated person may be the acknowledgement of knowing little and even doubting the self, she suggested.

"Education should help people understand you can't possibly be a leader in the world unless you invite ignorance ... and are willing to lose some of the confidence you carry," she said.

It's the kind of class disparity Carey lived and LeBlanc forced herself to live that playwright and performer Anna Deavere Smith said needs to end.

She described a recurring lump in her chest that cropped up every time she had to witness discrimination on the basis of class as a young person.

"People were divided by race and within race by class," she said.

A friend in her mostly-Jewish junior high school was tormented for not donating to a class gift – the day she felt the first chest lump.

When her grandmother exposed Smith to the untouchables of Baltimore as she volunteered in the poorest areas of the city, Smith felt a similar pain.

But she also witnessed the wealthier side of the city, like a white friend's neighborhood to which she trekked for a sleepover in high school.

"I felt foreign there," she said. "I was not allowed to spend the night in the home of upper class people."

"There were lines separating everybody in high school," she said, referring specifically to racial boundaries.

She talked about the "dark black men" who passed by her grandfather's shop in a rough area of town, who were a "different kind of black people" than her wealthy uncle.

His family "led a different kind of life," she said, one involving all the make-up, sexiness, jewelry and glamour that she came to associate with high class.

Through her childhood, Smith learned to see class, but she knows now that life need not involve chest lumps.

"I'm excited about the vulnerability that's between classes and excited about it," she said. "And I think I do my work because it's just not fair ... that we can have those lumps in our own chests."

The Tony and Pulitzer Prize-nominated author addresses that issue in her solo performances that examine race, identity and American community. She's now a professor at New York University's Tisch School of the Arts.

Author to speak on her memoir, index

By Emily Reynolds
Collegian Staff

This Monday night at 5 p.m. in Bartlett Hall room 61, author Joan Wickersham will be speaking about her new book, "The Suicide Index: Putting My Father's Death in Order."

The book is a look into the death of Wickersham's father, who killed himself in 1991. In an index format, Wickersham explores his death, and attempts to answer her own questions through family history and the people involved in her father's life.

The book has been described as "a daughter's anguished, loving elegy to her father."

Wickersham was born in New York City and grew up in Connecticut, where she graduated from Yale University with a degree in art history. She now lives in Cambridge, Mass. with her family.

Wickersham is author of one other book, "The Paper Anniversary," a novel about a marriage that may be too late to save. In addition, she's written fiction for several magazines, including Story, Ploughshares, and The Hudson Review, as well as several others. She's also written essays for The Boston Globe, Yankee and Glamour. Wickersham has also been heard on National Public Radio, reading essays for shows like "On Point" and "Morning Edition."

The writer also created a bi-monthly column for the Architecture Boston magazine, called "The Lurker."

"The Suicide Index" is currently one of the five finalists for the 2008 National Book Award for nonfiction. The National Book Award has been given to writers since 1950. Their mission is to celebrate the best of American literature.

Other awards she's received are the Ploughshares Cohen Award for Best Short Story in 2007, a Massachusetts Cultural Council artist's grant and fellowships to the MacDowell Colony.

Wickersham has said that much of "The Suicide Index" was written at the MacDowell Colony during her time spent there.

For more information about the author, to read excerpts of her work or to hear her on NPR, visit her Web site at Joanwickersham.com.

'Un-alum' relations

Class sees unique University view

By Nat Davies
Collegian Correspondent

Self proclaimed "un-alum" of UMass, writer and storyteller Bob Flaherty spent one unenrolled year on campus, squatting in Gorman Hall, eating pastries stolen from the bread truck, even taking classes – all completely off the books.

His memoir about that year, and some of his other experiences, is titled "Ass Backwards," an admittedly fitting title for his life. It comes out next year.

"I got as much out of UMass as if I was actually enrolled," Flaherty said about that year, 1970. "It was a very eye-opening and life-changing experience."

During his visit to a UMass journalism class last week, Flaherty talked about his UMass experiences, telling stories of the Red Sox and upsetting the classroom peace when he accidentally set off an emergency door alarm at the W.E.B. DuBois library while imitating a seagull with brain freeze.

The storyteller, former radio personality, comic strip artist and horror book writer, among other pursuits, is currently an education reporter for The Daily Hampshire Gazette in Northampton. He's also the author of "Puff" (2005), a story based on a search for marijuana in a makeshift Red Cross van during the blizzard of 1978 in Boston.

During major blizzards such as the one in 1978, the only cars allowed on the streets were emergency vehicles. The story gets interesting when his friends' van is mistaken for a real emergency vehicle, and they have to stop and help people in need.

Published by Harper Collins, "Puff" is currently under option to be made into a movie.

Flaherty started working in radio at Graham Junior College, a broadcasting school in Kenmore Square, which he attended in order to avoid the draft. When he flunked out of that college, he said, the radio department didn't know he wasn't a student anymore, and he kept on with his show there for a number of months. He never said anything, but played all kinds of "esoteric sets."

"People used to go to rock shows to meet the opposite sex. But I actually went for the bands," he said.

Experienced in public relations, Flaherty, who never did graduate from college but recommends getting a degree, had simple advice for aspiring writers. "Get an agent."

An agent will only cost as much as mailing a manuscript to them, he said. And publishers will reject submissions that don't come from an agent out of hand. Without an agent, none of his manuscripts ever got accepted. With one, he got two offers for "Puff" right away, he said.

As for the future of journalism, Flaherty does not agree with the opinions of the looming apocalyptic extinction of print media and the takeover of the Internet as a primary news supplier. He thinks they're two completely separate mediums where one is not necessarily superior to the other.

"I don't think newspapers are dead," he said. However, he thinks that students should learn the ins and outs of writing for the Internet despite what he feels.

"Whether or not you believe in the theory, you'd better be prepared for it," he said.

Display puts power in a bag

By Josh Wallatsch
Collegian Staff

Yesterday dozens of body bags were laid on the library lawn, representing the hundreds killed each day in Darfur.

Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG) organized the event, attempting to raise awareness on behalf of the genocidal conflict occurring overseas.

War in Darfur has been ongoing since February 2003, and is a reaction to ethnic and tribal issues. Over 400,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million residents have been displaced as a result of the war.

"These statistics are just modest estimates," said MASSPIRG volunteer Nikki Trihler.

The Sudanese government has made it difficult for journalists to gather accurate estimates of a death count since 2005. This suggests the figures are largely underestimated regarding those killed and displaced.

"I don't think people realize how much power they actually have, particularly on this issue," said Elizabeth Hawley, co-coordinator of the Save Darfur campaign. "Our senators Kerry and Kennedy are two of the most active leaders on this issue in this country because of the student movement."

Senator John Kerry has been urging the Bush Administration to recognize the conflict in Darfur as genocide in 2004. More recently, Senator Edward Kennedy has openly stated "the continuing genocide in Darfur is a stain on all humanity and needs to be addressed at once on an urgent basis."

Students have raised significant awareness internationally with the help of student-run organizations such as Students Taking Action Now Darfur (STAND) and MASSPIRG, Facebook.com groups and human rights activists. They've recently aimed to collectively influence the discussion of Darfur in the most recent presidential debates.

"There was this mindset that the Holocaust was the only recent atrocity, but since then there have been tons of civil rights violations," said Trihler. "This visual is a quick reminder to bring back to the forefront of students minds and help them realize that these atrocities have not disappeared."

MASSPIRG said students won't necessarily have the time to stop and listen to a speech going on, but walking by the body bags might be enough for someone to want to educate themselves and others on the issue at hand.

"To me, this visual display is not much different than the Republican Club's putting up giant crosses for the 2,000 babies that are aborted. It reminds me too much of that. I don't see what's wrong with having the information speak for itself," said UMass junior, Nick Ordway.

Many students asked to comment on the War in Darfur were highly opinionated but felt their comments were too controversial to be quoted.

"Regardless of how I feel about the situation in Darfur, I'm in the military it's not my duty to worry about what's right or wrong," said UMass junior, James Adams. "Originally, lots of people wanted to be in Iraq, but several years later many of those people changed their minds. Going into Darfur could turn into the same type of situation."

Today, no policy on genocide has been pursued or implemented in Darfur by government authorities and the constant threat of violence, disease, starvation and rape continues to be reported on.

"A threat to justice somewhere is a threat to justice everywhere," Trihler said.

MASSPIRG plans to hold events monthly, raising money and spreading awareness around campus. A fundraising open-mic event is scheduled for next month.

Indie record store thrives

Dynamite Records in NoHo moves to new location with continued success

By Liz Wahlman
Collegian Correspondent

The indie record store is a piece of Americana that has influenced the lives of adolescents throughout the latter part of the 20th century. It's a home where the smell of vinyl is the only air freshener, and friendships form out of a love for Glenn Danzig. It's a place where local, music-obsessed individuals can interact with others like themselves while surrounded by the thriving force of good music. However, in the age of iPods, MP3s and music piracy, this important piece of American culture is becoming as outdated as hair metal.

One independent record store in Northampton, Mass., won't let the age of iTunes bring them down. Dynamite Records opened in 1982, and is the longest running independent record store in western Massachusetts. Dynamite started in the back of a station wagon in front of the Amherst Post Office, then moved on to spend 20 years in Thornes Marketplace. Recently, it moved to 33 Main Street in Northampton, between Lucky's Tattoo and Piercing and La Veracruzana. When Dynamite was invited to use the store front on Main Street, owner Ronnie Kwon jumped at the opportunity.

"We spent 20 years in Thornes, and we had really outgrown it," said Kwon. "We wanted a more visible location, since Dynamite had become a local secret that was difficult to find."

The store is as cozy as any home, with hardwood floors and an actual living room display in the front window, and an array of artists swarming the shelves. Dynamite Records specializes in new and used vinyl records, but also carries a wide variety of new and used CDs, pins, patches and posters.

"There's a lot of love in Dynamite Records, and that's why I love it," said Kwon. "I love records, I love the way they look, the way they sound, the way they feel, just everything about them."

The music industry is at a noteworthy place at this point in time. With the emergence of MP3s and digital file sharing, shelves containing a music library have been reduced to a hard drive that can crash at any time. The current echo boomer generation has taken creativity and good music for granted. Many people have substituted quality for convenience, and face-to-face communication for computers. Buying music online is nothing like going into a store and having the power to listen to everything happening around you.

"Independent record stores allow us to bypass what's playing on the top 40 and fill our ears with something real, something with heart," said UMass senior and psychology major, Rachel Schein. "It'll change your perspective on what music's all about."

However, it seems as if more and more people are trading the experience of a record store for the cheap thrill of a download timer. It has been proven however, that MP3s have a far worse sound quality than CDs or even records. In order to fit an MP3 onto an MP3 player, the file from a CD has to be compressed to an extremely small size. As a result, the song may sound much different, and small subtleties, like key changes, can't be detected by the listener. Yet many people, both young and old, are standing by their vinyl. Kwon has faith in his store and doesn't believe he'll lose many customers as a result of this new technology.

"There's always going to be change," said Kwon. "I think you have to learn to adapt and evolve and know that people still value music. We choose our standards and we have a lot of loyal customers."

One can truly feel at ease and at home inside Dynamite. There's always good music playing as the gazes of Siouxsie Sioux and Robert Smith look down from displayed posters. The store has a very relaxed atmosphere, where no one peers over your shoulder and you're allowed to be with the music in your own way.

"I think independent record stores are a good idea; keeps the small businesses up and running, and the awareness that records are still being produced and used," said Hampshire College student Taylor "Matchstick" McNeilly. "[Records have] a very different quality of sound, and are definitely enjoyable. I'm glad such places as Dynamite Records are still around, because it really lends something to the culture."

Dynamite Records also tries to help local artists obtain success by offering them a place to perform. The shop often has artists perform in the store itself or in the display windows. This gesture is how Mr. Kwon and his employees give back to the community.

"I feel like there are fewer opportunities than before for local artists to get out there," said Kwon. "Even in New York, there aren't a lot of places where local artists can perform. Music is such an important part of people's lives and of important value in communities. Dynamite Records has always been a community store and will always be a community store."

While Kwon is giving back to the artists, the artists are giving back to the record stores. Record Store Day, which will be celebrated on April 18, 2009, aims to make people more aware of the culture and history that record stores have.

On their Web site, Recordstoreday.com, Boston native Amanda Palmer of The Dresden Dolls said, "My early record shopping experiences were my musical backdrop ... it's not just the ability to touch, see and smell an album and the artwork ... it's the fact that you're in a real place with real people ... you can't get that feeling sitting behind your computer, ever."

Kwon doesn't wait for April to celebrate his love of music. To him, every day is Record Store Day.

"I just hope people still enjoy the experience of buying music," he said. "If you don't know what that is, come on in and we'll show you."

Independent record stores, their employees and their loyal customers are filled with a passion for music. They do more than just hear music, they can see it and feel it. It's a part of them. To them, shopping for music is more than just retail therapy, it's a ritual. It's not something they do, but something they experience. Independent record stores are alive today because of the people who want to have that experience.

Dynamite Records is located at 33 Main Street in Northampton.

Halloween's cleavage

Ben Moriarty

Halloween is arguably the best day of the year. This is, of course, after Easter, Christmas, Thanksgiving, every Friday and Saturday, whenever the Patriots play, and whenever I can get Jewish holidays off by telling my professors very shyly that I'm Jewish. I'd probably tell them I was Muslim too if it wouldn't arouse suspicion. So, calculations aside, I think that puts Halloween at about the 121st best day of the year. The day of ghosts is ranked so highly, partly because it's nostalgic for people who aren't five. There was, and I venture to say still is, nothing more enthralling than getting candy from strangers. Unfortunately, the sugary sweetness of Halloween is ephemeral, and in need of replacement. So, being adults, we found more adult-oriented trims from strangers.

And there's nothing more suitable for this than an encounter with a sexy stranger dressed as a near-nude referee (where were you during those pitiful high school football games?), who you are able to share a passionate two minutes with in exchange for not candy, but reciprocated affection. For some, realizing you and your scandalously-dressed, two-minute companion do not truly care for each other ends in regretting those two minutes. This could be for reasons such as: they weren't particularly attractive, it was an ex or an ex's roommate, or you were both completely obliterated, and may have to deal with the consequences.

The consequence, of course, is having fun, not having babies. Regretted fun also confuses me.

But people are always saying you should take responsibility for your actions, which is something I have extraordinary trouble doing – especially when things simply aren't my fault. I did care for that girl in the two minutes I knew her, and I refuse to believe it's my fault.

I'm unable to dress provocatively this Halloween. I was not blessed with a female figure to ostentatiously parade to males and envious females, and I blame my parents for this. I blame my grandparents as well. The only sexy thing a guy can dress up as is Adam, covered by his aptly-placed leaf, but I refuse to blaspheme both.

So here I am, alone and spiteful, blaming my parents for my lack of femininity that would enable me to get into parties for free, admiring all the cleavage everywhere as I stand idly against a wall, becoming nervous whenever a girl stumbles by. All the while attempting desperately not to stare like a prepubescent boy at cleavage, don't forget.

Halloween is – very obviously – no longer the Halloween we once knew. It's now a day to dress up as trashy as you possibly can, get drunk and do what you do every other weekend.

Cleavage is the reason why Halloween just may be able to muster up enough momentum to enter the top 100 days of the year. That and the appallingly short skirts.

Without the short skirts – if you can call things that – and the low-cut shirts – if you want to call bras that – there wouldn't be a Halloween these days for people above the aforementioned age of five.

Nostalgia can't even do it for us anymore. It's only sex appeal that does – and alcohol. Those are two things most people won't find disagreeable, especially when mixed with childhood memories.

That's getting creepy.

I asked my friend, who happens to be a girl (yeah, I can name drops and she said that girls don't dress to dress up for the Halloween spirit, but because it's the one time of year when people won't judge them. What this means is that a girl can dress as provocatively as she would like without much commentary, which is a laughable proposition unless we've never encountered a female before. Just because nothing's said mean people don't think you look like a hooker, even if you're dressed as a hooker construction workers as well.

My other friend said it was because girls want attention, as if it's desperately hard to get a college male's attention – really, unfathomably hard to get a guy's attention. You can wear a snowsuit and get a guy's attention.

Halloween is – very obviously – no longer the Halloween we once knew. It's now a day to dress up as trashy as you possibly can, get drunk and do what you do every other weekend. It's sad when we try to delude ourselves into thinking it's okay to dress like a slut because it's a certain day. It just makes people think they aren't objectifying themselves, even if they truly are.

This holiday sucks.

Bye George W. Bush, it's been Israel

Alana Goodman

No matter who wins the election on Nov. 4, America will lose a great leader. President George W. Bush certainly isn't the most popular guy in the world at the moment. As it stands right now, the latest polls have his nationwide approval rating at a dismal 23 percent. I haven't seen UMass students so happy to see somebody leave since Mike Gargano.

But in certain circles, Bush will be deeply missed. In the past 60 years, no U.S. president has been a better friend to Israel. And for a country so desperately in need of friends, his assistance has been invaluable.

I had the honor of seeing Bush speak last February in Washington, D.C. As he approached the microphone, the man who had once famously thrown (now) Yasser Arafat's phone number, 1-800-a wave of anger grenade to Saddam) was living a term for people like Bush. We call them "Canadian United Hasidim."

"Righteous Gentiles" – and I'm proud to live in a country being led by one.

Of course, Bush isn't the first president to champion for Israel. 11 minutes after Israel declared independence in 1948, Harry Truman had the courage to make America the first country in the world to recognize their statehood.

Lyndon B. Johnson was the first president to sign U.S. and Israeli policy, helping Israel build one of the strongest militaries on the planet. Perhaps one of the biggest allies of the Jewish state was Ronald Reagan, who successfully lobbied the Soviet Union to release hundreds of thousands of persecuted Jews into Israel.

However, Bush surpasses all of them in his support for the Jewish state. Beyond just giving Israel aid and denouncing anti-Semitism, he was the only president who had the backbone to attempt to seek out and destroy terrorism all over the world.

Unlike many of his predecessors, Bush realized the danger that Islamic fanaticism posed to Judeo-Christian civilization and democratic societies everywhere.

Unlike many of his predecessors, Bush realized the danger Islamic fanaticism posed to Judeo-Christian civilization and democratic societies everywhere.

Unfortunately, not many share his view. For too long, world leaders have despicably turned a blind eye to the savage practices of terrorist groups who call for the destruction of Israel and America.

A mere 63 years after the doors of Auschwitz were flung open to reveal the living corpses they had been restraining, Bush seems to be one of the few who remembers the world's solemn promise: never again.

But where is the rest of the world in the fight against terrorism – the Nazism of our time? Where is their outrage? Where is their action?

Where was the action when Saddam Hussein passed out $25,000 to every Palestinian family who raised their own children to become suicide bombers? Where was the action when these children detonated their dirty, nail-filled bombs in Israeli nightclubs, coffee shops, schools – anywhere they could kill and maim young Jewish citizens?

Where was the action when American journalist Daniel Pearl was forced to say, "My father's Jewish, my mother's Jewish, I'm Jewish" before being decapitated on camera by al-Qaeda terrorist Khalid Sheikh Mohammed?

Where was the action when Palestinians joyfully danced in the streets after thousands of innocent Americans were murdered on 9/11?

Where was the action during the second intifada as Israelis cowered in underground bomb shelters? Did the world understand how humiliating that was – for Jews to tremble, hidden underground, in their own country as their enemies burned the proud Israeli flag above their heads?

Sure, there was condemnation – soft blasts of protest from European leaders and the United Nations. But until Bush, nobody had the courage to take global action against terrorism.

There's been a lot of talk recently about negotiating with terrorists. Barack Obama, who has expressed interest in speaking with radical world leaders if he becomes president, believes dialogue, not force, is the key to resolving terrorism.

It's easy to see why people believe this nonsense. In America – a nation so cushioned and removed from its enemies – Bush's strong rhetoric and hawkish foreign policies may seem excessive. But in Israel – a minuscule country that stands like a lighthouse of democracy amidst a sea of unrestrained barbarity – this terror is real and constant.

All we have to do is look at Israel to see that negotiating with terrorists does not work. It only emboldens them. How many times has Israel exchanged land for "peace" and received nothing but more violence? The radical Palestinians' ultimate goal is not to have a state alongside Israel, but to "drive the Jews into the sea." Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's ultimate goal is not to have a dialogue with the United States, but to endure the complete degradation of our country, our values and our society.

The world has negotiated, denounced and condemned for too long. After a while, words lose their meaning unless they are backed up with swift and decisive action.

To borrow a phrase from Rabbi Meir Kahane, "One does not deal with terrorists, one does not bargain with terrorists, one kills terrorists."

I'm grateful to have a leader who understands this. Bush will be truly missed.

Anything but the elephant again

Nick Bush

This election offers voters a stark contrast in candidates. John McCain – despite his recent alliance with the buzzword "change" – represents the status quo of GOP leadership, which after eight years has left us with a historic national debt, along with rising inflation, a shattered economy from a decade of deregulation, a failed crusade of a war that has killed many thousands of innocent women and children, and a lobbying system in Washington allowing corporate agendas to essentially write our laws for us, among other lovely things.

Barack Obama, unlike any politician in modern times, has shown an apparent ability to rise over the powerful sway of Washington lobbyists and partisan politics. It remains to be seen if he will come through on any of his promises to "change the way things are done at the Capitol," but thus far, his campaign has been a breath of fresh air in a stale political arena.

McCain knew he'd have his work cut out for him long before Barack ever secured the nomination. With Bush's approval rating hovering for months near Nixon's post-Watergate level, America is clearly fed up with government. McCain, as the election's representative of the GOP status quo, knew the best policy would be to change the subject. McCain has made the campaign a referendum on Obama – or even Sarah Palin – rather than the economy he helped to deregulate, and the Iraq War, which he pushed for from the very beginning like every other GOP hawk.

McCain has tossed an ever-increasing array of smears at his rival, from suggesting that Obama could be naive, arrogant or sexist, to even calling him a "socialist" and friend of "terrorists" and "slum landlords." If you listened to McCain, you might just believe the Democrats elected Karl Marx to be their presidential candidate.

Obama, to his credit, has deflected these attacks, which would have doomed a weaker politician. In contrast, John Kerry couldn't even go windsailing without giving Bush an opportunity to sucker punch him in the media.

From the moment Bush campaign veteran and McCain campaign senior strategist Steve Schmidt assumed control of the daily message this summer, the tone of the election has taken on a very nasty note. Dirty smear tactics, such as those employed by the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth in 2004, can be very effective.

Try not to get any moose blood stains on the $150,000 worth of Neiman Marcus dress coats, alright Sarah?

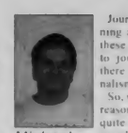
One of the McCain campaign's main distributors of Obama attacks has been Palin, who has demonstrated lately that demagoguing is one of the few things she's actually quite capable of doing.

On the other hand, the media in the past couple of weeks has reported that Palin has been "going rogue," according to unnamed McCain campaign insiders, and has attempted to distance herself from a Republican campaign that seems headed straight towards defeat. Some have noted she has her eyes on the 2012 Republican presidential nomination – as if she were a young buck lined up in her shotgun's crosshairs. Try not to get any moose blood stains on the $150,000 worth of Neiman Marcus dress coats, alright Sarah?

A note to the "advisors" that pull her puppet strings: good luck trying to make Palin into presidential timber in a decade, let alone four years. Having gone from being a nobody to having her picture in a bikini as one of Google.com's top searches in less than a month, no one can deny that Sarah Palin's rise to the forefront of the American political scene has been remarkable. Following this election, she'll find herself out of political capital, and infamous rather than famous.



After failing miserably to demonstrate even the slightest bit of foreign policy experience in interviews with Charles Gibson and Katie Couric, Palin was given less exposure by the McCain campaign. The damage has already been inflicted, however.

Despite starting out as one of the most popular of the four presidential candidates, Palin's numbers have quickly taken a dive toward George W. Bush levels, and she seems increasingly uncomfortable with the press. The idea that the GOP may not be able to scrounge up a qualified candidate in the next four years, and that we may very well face the prospect of President Sarah unrolling her bearskin rug on the floor of the Oval Office, is insane.

Even a reversion back to Mitt Romney would be a more appealing choice for the Republican side of the ticket than four years of huntin' with Sarah.

Keeping print journalism's head above water

Michael Phillis

Journalists seem to be running around without heads these days. Professors say to journalism majors that there won't be print journalism left in a few years.

So, why all the panic? The reasons are plentiful and quite frightening. Paper circulations are plummeting. The New York Times is on the verge of dropping below the coveted one million daily circulation level. The Boston Globe used to have a daily circulation of about half a million. It's now at about 323,000.

Many political scholars consider journalism to be the fourth estate of the government, along with the legislative, executive and judicial branches.

Has the Internet taken the place and provided the money for these newspapers to prosper? It's hard to say no forcefully enough. On average, a paper subscription to The New York Times brings in about $1,000, while online subscriptions provide about $20 a year for the company. The Internet is not the answer right now, and is far from becoming a profitable solution for media companies.

Some, of course, ask whether we even need newspapers. We've heard repeatedly that the mainstream media is the problem. The New York Times is the paper from hell and that maybe a world of Fox News, MSNBC, bloggers, The Huffington Post and Drudge Report are the wave of the future.

As journalists, we will never see times like the mid-1990s, when newspapers were in a dreamland age of large circulation, with a profit margin that was regularly over 20 percent. As more and more Web sites appear and 24-hour cable news networks become prominent, general print media has lost its local monopolies.

I will say without equivocation that print media is the highest quality of journalism in existence. The in-depth analysis – at least at the good papers – and the ability for a print journalist to do the work that holds elected officials' feet to the fire is incredibly important. Many political scholars consider journalism to be the fourth estate of the government, along with the legislative, executive and judicial branches.

However, as good as the intentions of journalists might have been in the past, we seem to have incredibly poor business sense. Newspapers have become the General Motors of the media world.

GM has continually made poor business decisions. The company has laid off almost 600,000 workers since 2000, according to The Wall Street Journal. GM has not put that kind of quality into their vehicles. It takes them longer to design a new model than their competitors. They are the models of poor management. Because of this, they've lost increasing percentages of market share.

Newspapers, shaken because their profit margin has decreased, have begun degrading quality and cutting jobs. Almost weekly, it seems like I read an article about how there are more layoffs at some newspaper company.

In my opinion, it's the quality of news papers that will keep them alive. The New York Times' ability to have foreign bureaus and writers tagging along on campaigns, coupled with great international coverage will keep that paper profitable for a long time.

Journalists need to stay afloat by doing their job. Do more stories on the bottom two-thirds of the population, and delve into investigative work. The New York Times had more hits and readership when they broke the story of New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer buying the services of escorts than any day since Sept. 11.

Organizations must understand that good work keeps you in business. That simple philosophy will make a difference down the line for a panicked newsroom.

Finally, the public should know that, as surprising as this may be, the mainstream media is neither the enemy nor the end of democracy. I believe, especially in print media, that journalists are well trained and provide a sense of fear in the minds of those in power that if they abuse their post, they just might get caught.

There are two lessons here. For journalists, keep a straight head and do your job even if you'll never see the money you once did. The answer is not always more multimedia. For the public, please understand that we need your readership and your money to provide you with one of the most important services in this country – accountability.

Lekman makes an exception for cause

Jens Lekman will perform on Saturday night to help raise money for Northampton High School senior, Clara Gardner. Gardner was struck by a drunk driver in August.

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

You never think it's going to happen to you or anyone you know. You find it plastered on billboards, lurking in high school health education classes and glaring at you from the news media. The truth is, it can happen. It should be drilled into the heads of teenagers: drunk driving is downright dangerous.

The "it won't happen to me" mentality was officially broken for students this year at Northampton High School, where classmate Clara Gardner, a senior at NHS, fell victim to a drunk-driving accident.

Gardner, 17, was struck by alleged drunk driver Roberto Carrasquillo, 20, a bit after midnight on Aug. 2. Gardner was hit outside Springfield's Amtrak station loading luggage behind a van after a month-long trip to Mexico.

Gardner's month-long recovery at Baystate Medical Center in Springfield was a painful one, ripe with frustration and coping with the dismal notion that life would never be the same without her legs.

"She loved to dance … she ran track and cross country," said longtime friend Althea Wilson-Berkowitz in an article by CBS 3's Justine Judge. However, according to another article by The Republican's Fred Contrada, "her spirit remained unbroken."

In a surging act of charity, the Northampton community and high school rallied to raise money for Gardner and her family to pay the bills and for other necessities, such as ramps at home for her wheelchair. The ramps were constructed with the help of numerous volunteers.

"Everyone's been really nice and helpful," said Hecza Warren, who has been close to Gardner since age three. Warren took it upon herself to help her friend's cause, sparking the idea of a benefit concert in the Northampton High School auditorium to support Clara and her family.

"We got the idea a while ago," Warren said, "but it officially came together a lot more recently."

After help from NHS' vice principal with securing the event space in the auditorium, verification from the musical guest was the only missing piece.

Within the past two weeks, Jens Lekman, whom Warren's father struck up an e-mail conversation with, confirmed the show on quite short notice. "Unite in Northampton" has agreed to sell tickets prior to the concert, starting Thursday.

"Clara and I have always really liked him," Warren said when asked about the choice of guest, and the two couldn't have picked a finer candidate.

Lekman is a suave singer/songwriter from Gothenburg, Sweden. His deep, soothing croon accentuates his dreamy, boyish persona superbly, bringing a hopeful feel to his cheerful songs while dropping to a solemn shade for his sorrowful ones.

His lyrics blatantly describe the mundane (figs, kisses, German fathers, beer, transportation, friends, etc.) and no one can do it in a more elegant and alluring fashion.

Lekman's most recent record, 2007's "Nightfall On Kortedala," saw the songwriter upping the ante on his production, opting for sweeping horn, string and percussion arrangements over simple guitar or piano ballads found on previous releases. This did not reduce his charm by a single notch. It, instead, complimented

Legendary horror classics return for Halloween

By Julie Hedgpeth and Jennifer Tuteur

That night children dress up and collect candy is also a night of frights. So what better way to celebrate the night of demons, ghouls, witches and candy apples than with some classic films that celebrate the spirit of the night?

I Know What You Did Last Summer (1997)

Like seeing teens terrorized by a psychotic serial killer? This is just the teen-scream flick for you this Halloween. Jennifer Love Hewitt, Freddie Prinze, Jr., Sarah Michelle Gellar and Ryan Phillippe are all at their finest in this 1990s classic. After running over a man on the side of the road and leaving him for dead, the main comes back one year later as a crazy fisherman-slicker-wearing mass murderer, who gets his victims with his fish hook. This is sure to make every viewer a little more responsible about who they come across on the road.

Friday the 13th (1980)

Everyone loves summer camp. It's a nice, pleasant place to escape for a few months. But for the counselors of Camp Crystal Lake, it's not quite so happy. The first of the Jason series tells the tale of Jason's mother, Mrs. Voorhees. She seeks revenge for her dead son by killing all the counselors at Crystal Lake, where he drowned years earlier. It's got everything you could possibly want for a Halloween scare – sex, violence, motherly love, and of course, young Kevin Bacon getting an arrow shoved through his throat.

The Texas Chainsaw Massacre (1974)

This genre-defining classic brings gore to a whole new level. It introduces the infamous Leatherface and his insane, cannibal, backwoods Texas family. Leatherface, chainsaw in hand, goes after a group of friends taking a road trip to visit their grandfather's grave. It still remains one of the most terrifying and violent films of all time. In fact, many cast members were injured during filming, and their blood was even used in the movie, due to the low budget.

Hocus Pocus (1993)

Bette Midler, Sarah Jessica Parker, witches, singing, immortal black cats, spells, Halloween Night, it really doesn't get any better than that. This Disney holiday classic follows the Sanderson sisters, witches from the 1690s, on their quest for eternal youth and beauty. They lure the children of the town to their old cot-

Good grief, it's a Charlie Brown pumpkin search

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

The search for the Great Pumpkin is over. If only Linus was 21 years old. He would've realized the Great Pumpkin was not a mythical creature, but was actually a beer.

Pumpkin brews are not for the Keystone Light drinkers, nor are they for the connoisseurs out there. Today and maybe this weekend is the best time of the year to enjoy this veggie beer.

To get a wide variety, I went back to the Spirit Haus this past week to make my own six-pack of different pumpkin beers.

Seranac Pumpkin Ale

Maybe because it was the first beer I tried, but good grief, Seranac fell short. Full of a wide variety of ingredients including malt, honey and cinnamon, one would never guess this without sipping slowly and looking for them. The lack of aroma from the glass should have given this away.

Lakefront Brewing Pumpkin Lager

More then 99 percent of pumpkin beers are ales. Milwaukee's Lakefront Brewing is home of the world's only pumpkin lager. Actual pumpkins give this lager a natural orange-amber color and a slight froth lacing on the pour. The usual pumpkin beer ingredients are mixed well and are not overpowering, which makes this one of the surprises of the season.

Smuttynose Pumpkin Ale

Smuttynose gets a gold star for remembering that pumpkin beer is beer first and pumpkin second. This crafty ale has by far the most ingredients. At first sip it was notably fruity, spicy and had a decent amount of hops. The pumpkin taste doesn't hit you until sip number two, but never fades.

Weyerbacher Imperial Pumpkin Ale

At eight percent alcohol by volume, this Pennsylvania beer might be your best friend this weekend as you attempt to stay warm roaming the streets of Amherst in costume. In comparison, the second strongest beer on this list, Dogfish Head Punkin Ale (see last beer on this list), is seven percent alcohol. Don't attempt this beer because of its kick, but go for the pumpkin cloves taste.

Pumpkinhead Shipyard Brewing Company

You would think after five pumpkin beers the taste would begin to be redundant. But thanks to Shipyard Brewing Company, redundancy will have to wait. Pumpkinhead tastes exactly like pumpkin pie, even the crust. As a beer, the pour is too carbonated and watery. This recipe is better off as a soda for pumpkin floats.

Dogfish Head Punkin Ale

When poured correctly, Dogfish Head Punkin Ale is the first and only beer to pour a two-finger head. The smell of pumpkin may be stronger then the actual pumpkin taste, but that's because it's actually a brown ale full of malt, hops and nutmeg. This trio gives the beer an aftertaste that will continue to linger minutes after your last sip.

The semester is half over and only a few more beer columns are left. Write one or two columns with me, if you dare.

Trick or treats can be sent to tmccall@student.umass.edu.

Shipyard and Lakefront breweries take unique approaches to their pumpkin beers by utilizing new tactics to enrich the pumpkin flavor.

Poet releases new collection

UMass alum reads at Amherst Books

By Alyssa Creamer
Collegian Staff

No plans for Halloween? Well, for those not looking to party like the wild animals their costumes represent, students are welcome to open their minds to an hour of lyrical poetry with some pretty wild elements of its own.

Amherst Books will host a poetry reading by local poet and University of Massachusetts alum Chris Carrier tonight at 8 p.m. Known more commonly as C.S. Carrier, the 35-year-old Carrier will share excerpts from his new book of poems entitled "After Dayton," which is being released today. This will be the first time Carrier will read from his new book to a public crowd.

Nat Herold, a co-owner of Amherst books, jokes that Carrier's poetry, which consistently makes interesting, and perhaps at times disturbing comparisons between natural and scientific elements, is "scary." But Herold admits that Amherst Books really pushed to get him in the first available date, and that Halloween holds little significance to the poetry that will be read.

Nevertheless, Carrier's past poetry is often cited by listeners and readers as being able to blend technology, machines, and inanimate objects with living, human emotions and features. UMass students looking for poetry that's a little more mature, and often darker than MySpace.com sob stories should enjoy the creative images molded by Carrier. Within certain poems, these images, though hardly gory, may not be for those with a sensitive stomach.

Even though Carrier is certainly not sappy or whiny, evocative of many other modern lyrical poets, his poetry still passes one of the toughest tests of poetry: it's relatable to audiences.

Despite his ability to steer clear of the depressing, Carrier does produce poetry talking about love. With poems such as "Insert Appropriate Here," Carrier's great talent for making people run lines back and forth through their head in interested contemplation shines. In this poem, students can enjoy thinking through lines such as "… What's the word for first floors that erode, but leave second floors? What's the word for land scoured so eyes ache blood?"

If you don't trust a journalist's perception of poetry, check out Carrier's work for yourself. He runs a blog titled "O Say Can You Chihuahua," which can be found at Lingauschemata.blogspot.com. This strange blogger title most likely has something to do with his ownership of a Chihuahua named Merwin.

"I'm really excited about Carrier's reading," said Herold. "Because the poetry book is so new, I've only had a chance to poke around in it, but so far I like what I've read." Herold received an advance copy of "After Dayton." The book sells in paper back for $16.

Carrier resides in Sunderland, Mass., and according to Herold, has a lot of friends in the area that will be attending the free reading.

The reading starts at 8 p.m. at Amherst Books which is located on 8 Main St. in Amherst, next to Subway.

tage by singing "Charlie Brown's Calliope." They, in turn, wreak havoc on Salem, Mass. on Halloween night. "I put a spell on you," Midler sings, and that's simply what she does as her portrayal of Winifred. The Sanderson sisters and their shenanigans are sure to leave all audiences laughing.

Halloween (1978)

This John Carpenter classic is the granddaddy to the modern horror film. Michael Myers remains one of the scariest and most recognizable movie killers. This film features a young Jamie Lee Curtis as the virginal babysitter Laurie Strode. The night before Halloween, Michael Myers escapes from the mental ward and returns home. On Halloween, he goes after Laurie (played by Curtis) while brutally attacking and murdering anyone in his way. Hot on his trail is Dr. Loomis, who has studied Michael since he was a child. This movie is the first to use the horror movie "rules" that have become commonplace in almost all slasher films today. "Halloween" also contains some of the scariest movie music in history.

Interesting trivia fact: Michael Myers' mask is actually a William Shatner/Captain Kirk mask painted white.

Scream (1996)

This brilliantly executed Wes Craven film of 1996 re-introduced the slasher film to popular culture. A mysterious killer in a mask stalks young Sidney Prescott, played by Neve Campbell. Lots of blood and guts are involved, but plenty of story backs up the violence. The movie does a great job mixing comedy and horror, and the comic relief is most evident in the character of Randy, played by Jamie Kennedy.

"Scream" gave us the list of cliché rules of the scary movie genre. These rules include such things as: You will not survive if you have sex, do drugs or drink. Only the virgins make it out alive. Don't ever say you will be right back, you won't. Do not go investigate a strange noise. Don't ask, "Who's there?" And most importantly, anyone could be the killer. Everyone is a suspect.

Interesting trivia fact: The character of Billy Loomis is named after "Halloween" character Dr. Sam Loomis and "Psycho" character Sam Loomis.

Psycho (1960)

Alfred Hitchcock is the master of suspense, and that fact is more than evident in this black-and-white thriller, which remains his most famous film. Janet Leigh (mother of Jamie Lee Curtis) stars as Marion Crane, a woman who steals money from her boss and flees the city. Tired from her drive, she stops at the isolated and empty Bates Motel, run by eccentric Norman Bates, played by Anthony Perkins in his most chilling role. The famous shower scene is iconic, but more details cannot be given away without ruining the ending. Just know this, beware of Mother.

Interesting trivia fact: The "blood" used in the shower scene is actually chocolate syrup. It gave it a more realistic look in black and white.

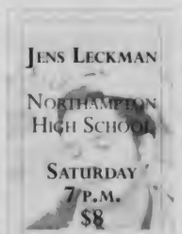
his confident vocals and clever songs.

Lekman comes to Northampton as a favor, truly moved by Gardner's story.



"I don't usually do benefit shows," Lekman said in a post on his Web site/blog, "but I was very touched by Clara's friends who came together and arranged all this for her."

"We started off just thinking he would come and visit and talk to Clara," Warren said, but Lekman chose to dedicate an entire show to Gardner and her family.

"What started as an idea to do a private show to cheer her up, has now turned into a real show in a 700-capacity auditorium," Lekman's post said.

The money raised by the show will first cover Lekman's train ticket to his next show in Washington, D.C., and the rest will go directly to Clara Northampton's Clarion Hotel has generously agreed to put Lekman up for the night, free of charge.

Another fundraiser in the form of a spaghetti dinner will take place Sunday, Nov. 23 from 1 p.m. to 4:30 p.m. at the Elk's Lodge #997, 17 Spring Street in Florence.

This gesture accurately depicts Lekman's character, one affected by tragic circumstances and the everyman. Lekman portrays himself as a sensitive lad amused by the simple things in life, and it makes sense that he'd answer the call of a victim of such a tragic crime.

Lekman can't reverse the damage that's been done, but he can comfort Gardner and aide in the community's efforts to help her family as they make their way through this hard time.

Like Lekman sings in "Another Sweet Summer's Night on Hammer Hill" from the "Oh You're So Silent, Jens" compilation: "It's hard to stay mad when there's so much beauty." Lekman will surely bring the beauty Saturday night.

The Benefit Concert for Tia Gardner, featuring Jens Lekman, will begin at 7:00 p.m. Saturday at Northampton High School's auditorium. Tickets are available for $8 at the door as well as at Unite, located at 202 Main Street in Northampton. You can reach Unite at (413) 585-5774. Northampton High School is located on 380 Elm Street in Northampton. Tickets for the spaghetti dinner are $10, available through Barbara Franklin, (413) 586-7121.

UM to play ranked teams this weekend

Two wins may lead to post-season run

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

With two victories and a little help from some other teams around the Atlantic 10, the Massachusetts women's soccer team could make its first conference tournament appearance since 2004.

The Minutewomen (6-7-3, 3-5-1 A-10), will have their work cut out for them when they take on two of the A-10's best teams in Saint Louis today and nationally-ranked Charlotte on Sunday at Rudd Field.

Today's matchup will start at 3 p.m., while Sunday's game will start at 1 p.m.

UMass could finish in a fifth-place tie with the seeding determined by tiebreakers, as only the top six teams qualify for the tournament.

The Maroon and White will look to continue its first undefeated season at home since the 1993 campaign while in the midst of an eight-game winning streak at Rudd field, dating back to last season.

UMass is currently in the midst of a three-game losing streak and have been shutout in its three past contests.

Despite a few close chances, the Minutewomen are 0-3-0 all-time against the Billikens (9-4-4, 5-3-1 A-10), who are currently tied with St. Bonaventure in fifth place in the A-10 with 16 points each.

"They're a good team, and playing them is going to be a huge challenge that's really all of our focus," UMass coach Jim Rudy said.

The Billikens need two victories this weekend to have a definite spot in the tournament, but could also make it without adding any additional points, depending on how other teams do.

Saint Louis had trouble getting off to a fast start with its conference schedule, registering one win, two losses and one tie throughout its first four games.

But the Billikens rebounded, posting a 4-1 A-10 record over its past five games with consecutive wins over Temple, George Washington, Richmond and Xavier before losing to Dayton last week.

"We're ready to have a good game where we do some stuff and get a reward for it," Rudy said.

The Billikens are led in the offensive zone by junior forwards Julia Brandenberg and Kelly Waeckerle. Brandenberg has 11 points (five goals, one assist) while Waeckerle has 10 points (four goals, two assists).

Even with Brandenberg and Waeckerle becoming quick, dynamic offensive threats, the Billikens have been inconsistent with finding the back of the net. They've scored 17 goals while allowing 13, despite not allowing any goals during its four-game winning streak.

"Brandenberg is one of the top attackers in the Midwest," Rudy said. "She's the whole package."

The Minutewomen will have to defend a potent Billiken attack that runs a 4-4-2 alignment and also features a backer position, played by senior, Lauren Olson.

The 25th-ranked 49ers (13-3-1, 9-0-0 A-10) lead the A-10 with 27 points and an undefeated conference record, along with a definite first round bye in the tournament, regardless of today's outcome at Rhode Island.

"Charlotte is playing very well, and they have a very dynamic attacking team with a solid defense," Rudy said.

"They are the cream of the A-10 crop, according to everyone."

UMass is 1-1 in the all-time series against the 49ers, with both games being played away from Rudd Field.

The 49ers are in the middle of a 10 game winning streak, and have outscored opponents 45-5 while being fourth in the nation in scoring with a 3.53 goals-per-game average.

Junior midfielder Hailey Beam is ninth in the nation and first in the A-10 with 38 points (13 goals, 12 assists), averaging 2.24 goals a game.

Right behind Beam is sophomore forward Whitney Weinraub, who is 13th in the nation and second in the conference with 33 points (12 goals, nine assists).

"We're facing the best and it's a nice challenge for our people to go out, and we would love to knock one of them off," Rudy said.

Season brings high hopes for future of Minutewomen

Return of injured to help next year

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team's chances of making the Atlantic 10 postseason are low, but the Minutewomen will look at this weekend with an eye towards next season.

The Minutewomen (6-7-3, 3-5-1 A-10) will lose many of their starters with seniors Vanessa Parry, Melissa Toulouse, Vanessa Lima and Tina Rodriguez graduating and midfielder Amy Ballew's eligibility in question.

Ballew redshirted in 2005 after transferring from Tennessee to UMass and then played three games in 2006.

All the seniors will play against Saint Louis and Charlotte regardless of this weekend's outcome.

"We have very big shoes to fill because of a fabulous senior class," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "That's the crux of your team, but I'm really a firm believer that a decent level of talent with opportunity often gets really great rewards."

UMass should be rewarded for the frustration it has had to deal with this season. The Minutewomen will be bringing back three players good enough to start if not for season-ending injuries. Juniors Sydney Stoll and Meghan Gould will play for the first time since the 2007 season while freshman Amanda Carvalho will see her first collegiate action next season.

Stoll was the understudy to alum Britt Canfield in 2007. She was second on the team in goals scored (six), but a knee injury prevented her from playing this season. Next year, she'll be the team's No. 1 option with two years of eligibility left.

Midfielder Meghan Gould has been injury-plagued for almost her entire career with the Minutewomen, however, her work on the sidelines has been proof to Rudy that she has much upside in the next two years.

The junior hasn't been allowed to head balls, but Rudy has witnessed her booting the ball 30-some yards up the field.

But the real mystery, according to Rudy, is freshman Amanda Carvalho. The forward has a very real possibility of working her way to the starting line-up, if not significant playing time. Rudy heard rave reviews of her scoring ability prior to her coming to Amherst.

"This kid was a big-time goal-scorer," Rudy said. "We know a high percentage of time, when she touches the ball, she's shooting. And her shooting percentage is very high so we know she can crack it. The question is can she get open?"

If all goes well for the Minutewomen, Rudy should have all three of his verbal commitments he's offered scholarships to and a few non-scholarship players. Rudy couldn't identify the players publicly due to NCAA prohibitions on talking about potential recruits.

What he did say was if they do sign, they'll give the returning players solid competition for playing time.

Sophomores Therese Smith, Kelsey Anderson and Ashley Hamel along with freshmen Meghan Collins and Natalie Muka are some of the younger players who played significant roles this season and will surely play a larger role next year.

That role, however, is not going to be guaranteed with more players coming in than leaving.

"They, like everyone else that's come before them, are really going to have to improve on what they have. They have to survive the onslaught of the neck-breathers," Rudy said. "It happens every year."

The uncertainty of how most of the team fits in with UMass is going to be an incentive to work hard during the winter and spring seasons. In the past, playing time has been an effective reward for playing hard during the off-season.

The non-starters will have the best chance of proving themselves as they'll play full-time in off-season matches. A solid performance will all but assure them more playing time during the 2009 season.

Rudy is looking for much of the roster to improve how they approach the game mentally while others will have to get more physical or athletic.

Although the Minutewomen didn't get the results of making the A-10 Tournament like they wanted, this season will set a solid foundation for next season with significant talent returning and promising recruits.

UMass travels on two-week road trip

Moliere, Narus earn A-10 honors

By Holly J. Galvin
Collegian Staff

Heading into a two-week New York road trip, both 1-1 Massachusetts swimming and diving teams hope to build upon a dual meet victory that earned the program three weekly Atlantic-10 honors, as well as on-campus recognition.

Both swimming and diving teams will take on Stony Brook Saturday.

Men's sprinter Juan Moliere and Minutewomen captain Christa Narus swept A-10 Performer of the Week selections after the two athletes' solid showings against Army, accounting for a combined six first-place wins.

Narus, selected for the honor along with Richmond's Katie Siebend, is the second UMass swimmer in as many weeks to be named UMass Dunn Bros. Athlete of the Week. This time around, Narus passes along the campus-wide nod to Minutemen counterpart, Joey Sbordon.

Sbordon was also named A-10 Rookie of the Week for his back-to-back wins in the 1000-yard and 500-yard freestyle, and his role in winning the 200-yard medley squad at last Saturday's dual meet. The freshman has yet to be beaten in either freestyle event during his budding collegiate career.

Despite the accolades, UMass coaches and swimmers alike stressed the importance of maintaining intensity and focus after what has only been the first third of the season.

"We've got a lot of really good things going and [the swimmers] just have to keep realizing that it's really early. We're approaching week 8 of 24," UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb warned after the Army victory.

A somewhat unheralded contributor to these early Minutewomen successes has been junior Kat Chalikis. The Flemington, N.J., native placed first in both the 100 and 200 freestyles against Army and has had strong past performances against upcoming opponent Stony Brook. In 2007-08, UMass defeated the Seawolves thanks in part to Chalikis' wins in the 100 and 200 fly. The veteran has accumulated over 40 points so far this season for a Minutewomen squad picked to finish 2nd behind Richmond in the A-10 preseason poll.

"Everyone really came together [in the Army meet] and it was awesome, but there are a few things we need to work on," Chalikis noted, stressing continued improvement on relay starts and technique heading into an intensive period of training.

Newcomb seemed to agree, pointing out that he'd planned on re-instating a tough Friday fitness program today after a recent two-week hiatus.

For Minutemen captain Nate Bromage, the season's ultimate goal remains readily defined – a third A-10 championship in three years.

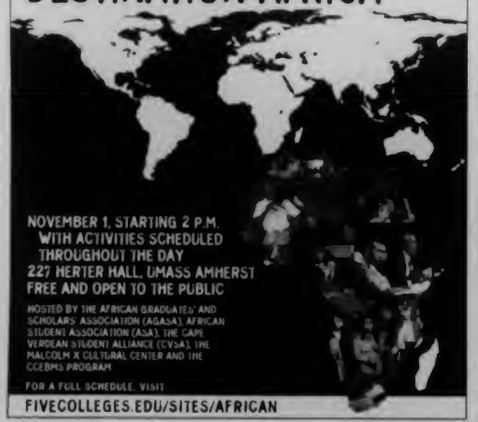
"One thing our team is really committed on is winning at A-10s," Bromage said. "So what we're really aiming for right now is just to really push through the training, and the dual meets will take care of themselves."

COURTESY OF UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior Taryn Prout swims the freestyle and the backstroke for the Minutewomen. Pratt holds UMass records for the freestyle (sixth all-time) and backstroke (ninth all-time).

To keep on top of that goal, UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth has also amplified his team's fitness regimen prior to a traditional road trip that has yet to see a loss to Stony Brook.

"We're going for volume now," Yarworth vowed. "Their reward is the hardest training cycle of the season so far and they know it's coming. You know, they earned it. They've earned hard work now, and they love it. They chew it up."



Sunday's 1 p.m. meet in New York begins the season's first extended road trip. The Minutemen defeated the Seawolves, 182-117 last year in Amherst, while the Minutewomen also dominated, 186-111.

Weekend game less imporant for UMass

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

It's said that every game is important. But after the Massachusetts field hockey team locked up the Atlantic 10 regular season championship in its stroke-off victory against Temple, Saturday's game against Providence doesn't carry nearly the weight of the team's last six.

The No. 17 Minutewomen (14-3, 6-0 A-10) go to Rhode Island this weekend to take on the Friars, who have also completed their conference play and locked up a birth in the Big East tournament.

Although UMass is going up against a team that received 55 votes in this week's coaches poll, UMass coach Justine Sowry is focusing on the upcoming tournament.

"We're trying not to take too much notice in terms of the win and the loss," Sowry said. "We're really trying to move forward for the A-10 championship. We're trying to focus on certain aspects of our game that need to be improved."

KAYLEE RAE FLEMING

Sophomore midfielder Makaela Potts has three goals and three assists this season. The Minutewomen have one more weekend until they head to the Atlantic 10 tournament.

Having the top seed going into the conference championship is a good sign for the Minutewomen. Since 1988, the winner of the A-10 tournament has either won or had a share of the regular season championship 17 out of 20 times.

With their postseason place already set in stone, coach Sowry now has the ability to focus on the conference tournament and use the only remaining game to help improve her team in what can almost be called a warm-up for the tournament.

"Providence, I guess, would be doing the same in preparation for the Big East tournament, as both teams need to win their tournament to make the NCAA tournament," Sowry said. "I think both teams will probably be experimenting with lineup and structure.

"If we go against the one game at a time concept, we're focusing on ourselves this weekend and hopefully we gain a lot from that," continued Sowry. "But then we're definitely looking forward to next week at the tournament for each of our opponents that we're facing."

Since the Minutewomen broke into the top 20 rankings at the beginning of this month, the team has won seven games in a row. However, the team's position from the rankings has not changed from its current slot at No. 17.

Although UMass has not lost a game since it ascension into the top 20, coach Sowry believes the lack of improvement in the team's rankings can be attributed to the level of play in their conference.

"We're remaining steady, but it's really a result of the teams we've been playing. [The A-10] is not the ACC and it's not the Big 10," Sowry said. "It was great when we first got in there, but it's probably where we're at right now."

Sowry says, with the current level of play in the A-10, UMass has to look out of conference to increase its RPI. With their games against then-No. 2 Syracuse, then-No.4 Connecticut and now Providence – which is on the brink of being ranked – the Minutewomen have improved their standing far beyond the rest of the conference.

Saturday's game will be a step up in competition from the rest of the teams in the A-10. UMass will face one of the best goalkeepers they've seen all season in Providence's Rachel Chamberlain. The junior currently ranks second in the Big East in saves with five per game and third in shutouts with five.

Even though Sowry does have her team focusing on the upcoming tournament, the Minutewomen will not be resting any starters. Sowry believes her team still needs work to get to the level at which they need to be if they're going to compete in the NCAA tournament.

"Going into Saturday, we need to fine tune our starting lineup so that we'll get the first nod. We will be focusing on particular things that we need to improve on if we're going to have a successful A-10 tournament," Sowry said.

UM hones skills on Saturday

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

With the No. 1 seed in the Atlantic 10 Conference now secure, the No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team can take its final game of the regular season in multiple directions.

UMass coach Justine Sowry can view this game against Providence (11-8, 3-3 Big East Conference) as a chance to hone skills the Minutewomen (14-3, 6-0 A-10) learned this season. Sowry can also treat this game as a tournament scenario, in which this game means the difference in either advancing or being dropped from a tournament.

"We need to fine tune our own play because there are definitely some areas of play that we need to improve if we're going to be successful in the A-10 tournament," Sowry said. "Anything that we do, you have to go 100 percent in order to be best prepared for the tournament. You play as you train."

UMass hasn't lost its final road game of the season since 2003, when the Minutewomen were shutout 2-0 by La Salle.

The Maroon and White are 6-1 with a five-game win streak on the road this season, including three wins against conference opponents.

Freshman goalie Alesha Widdall has been a force for the Minutewomen on the road this season, giving up multiple goals only once, while recording a shutout as well.

Junior goaltender Sarah Williams filled in for Widdall in three road games this season while Widdall participated in the Junior Pan Am Games for the gold medal-winning United States team. In those games, Williams and UMass went undefeated.

Senior forward Katelyn Orlando has padded her comeback season on the road especially. She has scored multiple goals in two road games this season, both of which led to wins for the Minutewomen.

Orlando is on a three-game scoring streak and in two of those games, was assisted by defender Jaime Bourazeris, who is just as much of a scoring threat, despite her defensive position on the field. She has three goals this season, along with five assists, which ranks third on the team.

Orlando's lone assist on the season came on a feed to Bourazeris against Siena (1-14, 1-5 Northeast Conference). Her 18 goals lead the conference, and her 27 points ties her with two other players for the conference lead in that category.

Orlando also has a conference-leading four game-winning goals, which, in part, account for UMass' current seven-game winning streak.

During this streak, the Minutewomen are recording 2.57 assists per game. The Maroon and White's 2.12 assists-per-game this season ranks first among A-10 conference teams.

With the harsh drop in temperature at this point in the season, it has become increasingly difficult for all teams in the Northeast to consistently practice outdoors. However, this puts most teams on the same level in terms of preparing for conference play.

"It makes it difficult to practice, I'm not going to lie," Sowry said of the cold weather. "This is the time of year where you refine set plays, which means a lot of standing around and it's difficult to do that when it's so cold outside. It is what it is and you just wear warm clothes and try and get the job done."

Senior midfielder Erin Parker has five goals and seven assists this season for the No. 17 Minutewomen. Parker has started in all 17 of UMass' games.

Hound racing third on ballot

BY BEN WILLIAMS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This Tuesday, people registered in Massachusetts will decide whether commercial dog racing will continue in the state by voting on Question 3.

If the initiative passes, "the State Racing Commission would be prohibited from accepting or approving any application or request for racing dates for dog racing," according to the state secretary's Web site.

A "Yes" vote would prohibit dog racing where gambling is involved, starting Jan 1, 2009, and a "No" vote would make no changes to the current laws, which allow dog racing.

There are two dog racing tracks in Massachusetts: Wonderland Greyhound Park in Revere and Raynham Park in Raynham.

The committee that organized Question 3, called the "Committee to Protect Dogs," is supported by the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and other groups.

The committee believes that dog racing is inhumane because of the conditions the dogs are kept in and the injuries they sometimes sustain in the course of their racing careers.

The Committee to Protect Dogs also cites the failing dog racing industry as a reason the tracks should be shut down. According to its Web site, the total amount gambled at Wonderland and Raynham dropped 65 percent and 37 percent respectively between 2002 and 2007.

Norms bust booze talk

BY DINAH GORELIK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Excessive drinking is not only a quandary facing the University of Massachusetts, but a national problem featured at colleges and universities throughout the United States. However, a new approach to combat this epidemic is turning heads, literally.

In an effort to reduce the amount of high-risk drinking and to break down the stereotype that UMass students drink too much, the Campus and Community Coalition to Reduce High-risk Drinking has initiated an innovative project called the Social Norms Campaign. Focusing mainly on alcohol use, the initiative targets social norms, which are expectations and cues within a society or group that tend to convince people to drink in the first place.

UMass' reputation as a party school has caused many to conclude that students drink a lot, but the campaign says that students only drink moderately, if they drink at all. By tackling these types of commonly held beliefs, the hope is that students will drink less and more safely. What makes this campaign distinct is that it tries to reinforce positive behaviors rather than showing explicit, scary statistics. Posters exhibited throughout the college and on the buses state messages such as, "9 out of 10 students know how to have fun without alcohol. Are you one of them?"

Posters like the one above push social norms to control UMass' image both on and off campus. Campaign organizers met last week to discuss strategy and the next step of the group's efforts.

OIT: behind the screen

BY KAITLYN SILVA
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Almost 26,000 students and 2,000 faculty members rely on the technology services at the University of Massachusetts Amherst, but the majority of this technology is in the hands of only one department.

The Office of Information Technologies is busy maintaining the campus network via miles of cable and wire, introducing unfamiliar technology to the campus and fulfilling the technological needs of every staff member and student, among other things.

Inside of the Office of Information Technologies, five different departments deal with the Internet technology maintenance at UMass.

The Academic Computing department runs campus systems such as SPARK and the UMass blogs. To ensure that the faculty understands the technologies it operates, the Academic Computing also offer faculty workshops showing how certain technologies can be useful in the classroom.

"We try to cover a pretty wide range of things," said Tony Sindelar, coordinator for Instructional Design and Faculty Support. "Basic things like PowerPoint, Excel, sometimes even things on Word, a lot on SPARK. We also do stuff with video and audio production. We've been trying to add more emerging technologies — new things being used around the world that people are just on the border of figuring out.

"We try to make it so that when people attend a workshop, they're actually working on materials for their course," he added. "Even if they're only coming to one workshop to work on it in the workshop, they're still walking away with something they're going to use in their classroom or online as part of the class."

According to Copper Giloth, director of the Academic Computing department, Academic Computing offers most workshop information online.

"We make available all of our services on the Web because a lot of our clients don't really want to talk to a person. They just want documentation on how to do something," she said.

Academic Computing is also the force behind all of the OIT computer classrooms and more recently, the library's Learning Commons.

Just treats for UMass

Lobster, steak and chowder fill students, DCs

It was no trick. Ken Toong and company served a top-tier meal in all Dining Commons for the seventh straight Halloween.

When one thinks of Halloween, the first things that come to mind are candy, pumpkins, skeletons and costumes. But for University of Massachusetts students, it's lobster.

The Halloween lobster dinner is now a 7-year-old tradition, and students do not claim that it will get old. The event, sponsored by the University's dining services, is "a nice treat for students for their hard work and is a great way to celebrate the harvest," said Executive Director of Food Services Ken Toong.

Tickets were given upon a swipe of a UCard to claim a prize lobster or steak. The dining commons were estimating to dish out about 13,000 pounds of Maine lobster, 5,000 pounds of New York strip steak and 300 gallons of chowder. Some 14,000 students were expected to be served with meal plans, plus the general public who were allowed to eat at the commons for a $15 fee.

Along with lobster, other food served was steak, clam chowder, locally grown vegetables, apple cider and dirt cake. Students were also entertained by tarot readers, table magicians and roaming judges for the costume contest. Such an environment gave much to be excited about.

"I was most excited about trying lobster for the first time," said freshman Amanda Winkler.

A Golden talk

Expert speaks on U.S. relations

BY DANIELLE KAHN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Hartlett Hall filled with students Tuesday Oct. 28 night to listen to Ambassador Dore Gold of Israel speak on the upcoming United States presidential election, an event put together by the Student Alliance for Israel at the University of Massachusetts.

One of the key points of his lecture was the situation with Iran and how it affects the Arab-Israeli peace process. He then went on to describe how this will affect the next United States administration.

"You expect that I'm going to stand up here and say 'this guy is good and this guy isn't' in my presentation. But what I'm really going to talk about is how we get a more stable, safe and secure Middle East," said Gold began.

Gold, the 11th permanent ambassador to the United Nations, has served as an advisor to former Prime Ministers Ariel Sharon and Benjamin Netanyahu. He also worked with President George W. Bush in the Aqaba Negotiations and participated in the Wye River negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization. Now, he is the chief advisor to Senators John McCain and Barack Obama on issues pertaining to Israel. Throughout the talk, he offered insights to the issues at hand.

"Some people still think that the Middle East would be secure if Israel had a set land line, but after the 2006 Second Lebanon War, people started to rethink this," he said.

Gold believes Iran is an important issue in this Tuesday's election.

"Iran's primary problem is using Hezbollah as a vehicle to cause problems in the Middle East. The money, training and weapons all come from Iran," he said.

Israel has already moved its settlements out of Gaza Strip in Palestinian territory, yet there is still conflict. Many thought that when Israel pulled out of this land, the Gaza Strip would

The Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students program (CCEBMS) celebrated its 40th anniversary last week.

The night was dedicated to the founders of the program and the current culture of the University of Massachusetts.

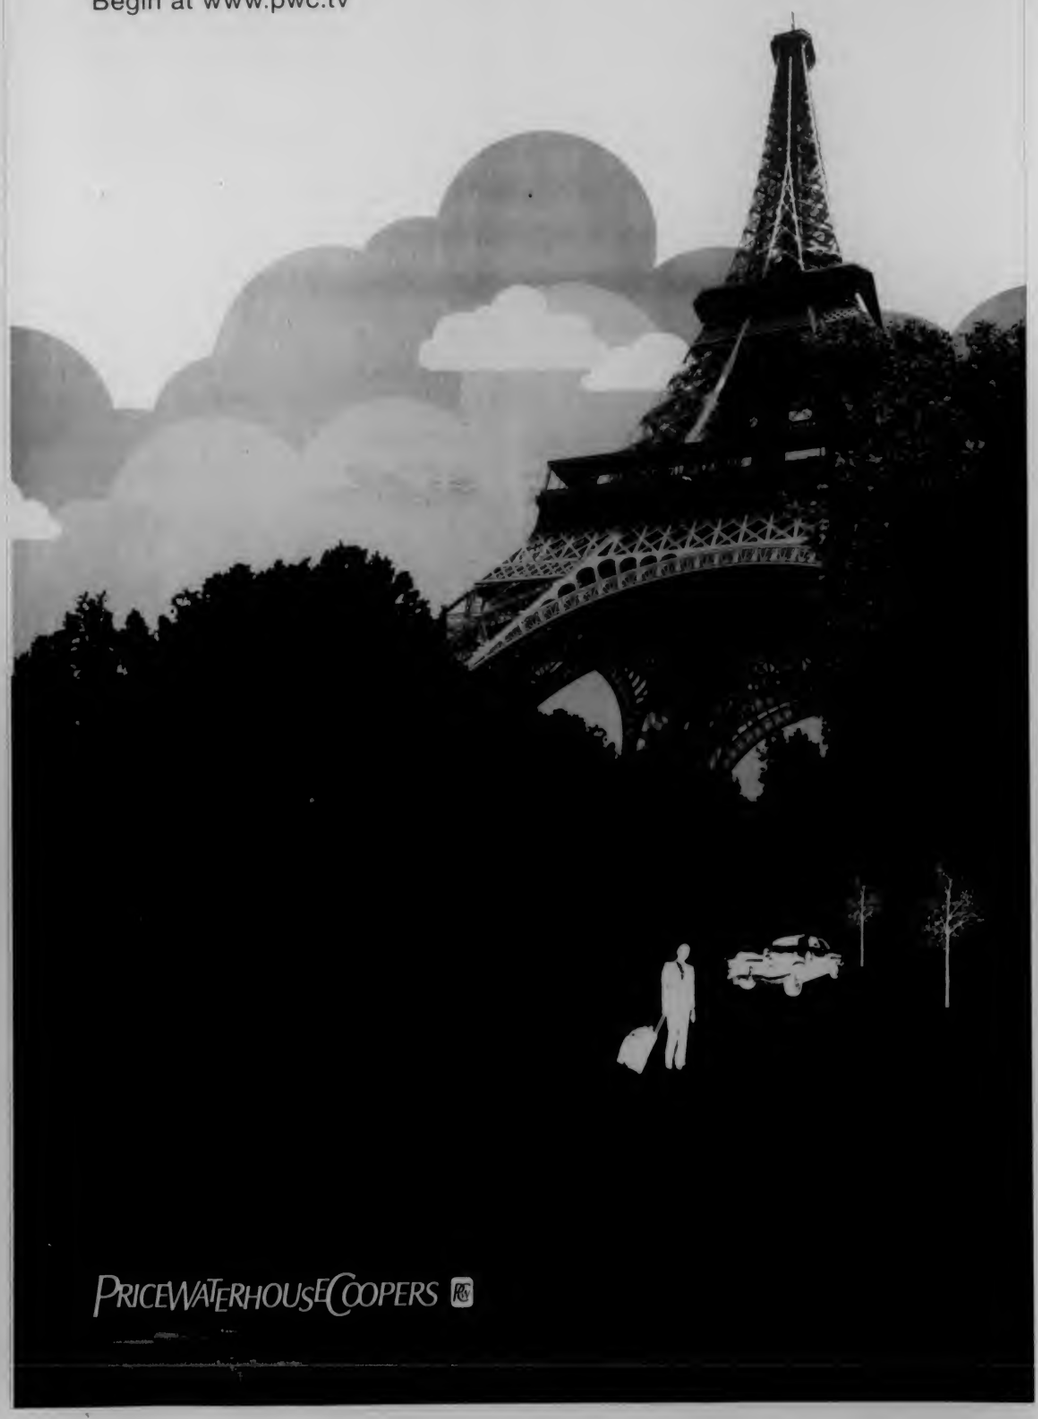
The 40th anniversary event was held in the Campus Center auditorium which was transformed into a museum, featuring pictures of former CCEBMS students in the New Africa House or participating in a homecoming parade.

The speakers, introduced by CCEBMS program graduates Mary Custard, class '82 and Sid Ferreira, class of '87, included Dr. Esther Terry, the Associate Chancellor, Vice-Interim Vice Chancellor for student affairs and campus life and a faculty member in the African American Department.

"I'm here for a very special introduction, because things being how they have been, and business happening the way it happened, we have someone new that you must meet," Terry said.

The new person Terry referred to was Chancellor Robert Holub, who addressed the attendees.

"Recruiting students is important, and recruiting students for diversity is important. [But] recruiting is half the task that we have," said Holub. "Having the students succeed is the other half."



Holub also said the program adds to the culture of UMass and expressed his support for the CCEBMS program.

become a kind of Singapore. Instead, what it caused was an unmonitored supply of weapons moving into the territory. Gold attributes this to Iran and also mentioned that many men are leaving the Gaza Strip, training at Hezbollah camps and then returning to continue the fight against Israel.

"Instead of creating a Singapore, we created an Iranian satellite," he said.

He said by 2010, Iran will have reached the nuclear threshold. He said it not only threatens Israel, but all U.S. sites in the Middle East, specifically the Persian Gulf.

"Their appetite to have dominance will only be strengthened when they reach the nuclear threshold," Gold said.

He added this is an issue that will have to be faced by the next president.

Gold believes that they can either continue to focus on the Israeli-Palestinian land conflict, or they can turn their attention to the direr situation in Iran.

"I truly believe that the instability had little to do with the territory of Israel and its neighbors," said Gold, "but it has everything to do with Iranian expansion."

Ambassador Gold closed his speech with advice for the future administration to stop trying to "bang square pegs into round holes" and to focus on the better solution to a stabilized Middle East.

CCEMBS turns 40

Student Government Association president and UMass senior Malcolm Chu provided a student's perspective of the CCEMBS program.

Chu reflected on his campus experience while acknowledging his identity as a UMass student.

"It's been about love, relationship and passion," Chu said.

According to Chu, the opportunity that he has had to build love and relationships with his fellow students, has transformed into a passion that creates spaces where these components can become productive.

Terry later reflected on the atmosphere of UMass from when she was a graduate student until now.

"Things operate in cycles, I watch television and read the paper and times are not very different," Terry said.

According to Terry, there is student-centered movement allowing new topics to join the mainstream discourse.

"There is a movement a foot in the country, people are talking about things they haven't always talked about," said Terry. "Young people are at the center of that; that is the only comparison I wish to make."

Terry then introduced UMass Chancellor from 1971 to 1979, Dr Randolph Bromery, who is one of the founders of the program.

Bromery gave a monologue of how troubled he felt the day Barack Obama was named democratic presidential nominee.

"They said it was 45 years after Dr Martin Luther King Jr.'s 'I have a dream speech,'" Bromery said. "The missing thing that's never said, it was the day after Dr. W.E.B Dubois died."

Bromery said he was only the fifth black faculty member on campus when he joined UMass the Geology Department in 1967.

Bromery said the black faculty members used to meet for lunch in the Student Union in hopes of seeing other black people, but they ended up just looking at each other.

That realization is what prompted Bromery, along with a sociology professor, to conduct surveys around campus on the amount of African American students at UMass.

The results reported that among the 18,000 undergraduate students and 1,000 faculty members there were only 36 African-American students, 72 from Taiwan and 24 from Malawi.

These results initiated the faculty members, along with others, to set up a program that focused on getting more African American students to UMass.

"So we agreed to it, while we knowing we had no political leverage because the population of the state was 4 percent black," Bromery said.

The program was incorporated and received $1 million from the Ford foundation to start the program.

Bromery said they recruited students from Boston, Pittsfield, Springfield and 128 qualified student applicants.

"Dean of Students rejected the 128 applications [but] accepted six," Bromery said.

After this, CCEBMS went to Whitmore and expressed to the administration their disappointment at the five black faculty members ratio at UMass and asked if the administration preferred to have zero.

"Somebody talked to somebody, and a couple of days later they accepted 128 applicants," Bromery said.

The first CCEBMS graduating class of 1972 graduated with a higher graduation percentage, 67 percent, than UMass' overall graduation rate of 60 percent.

African American Studies Professor John Bracey, who came to UMass from the Midwest in 1971, expressed the differences in political climates and the action that took place in the CCEBMS program.

"Given the heat in the Midwest politically ... [UMass] was a good place to retreat and kind of chill out," Bracey said.

Bracey went on to explain that at UMass there was a different kind of political pressure that made the campus and students unique.

"The student body was wacky and wild, crazy and out of the box as the students I left behind in the Midwest," said Bracey. "What makes this place different is that it never recovered from the 1960s at all."

Professor Bracey said he encourages students to take ownership of the institution and accommodate it to themselves, not the other way around. This will allow for a "steady" flow of activism.

"This is your school, this is not a white school that has colored people in it. This is your school," Bracey said.

Mary Custard, Sid Ferreira and UMass Alumni gave the closing remarks and Phyllip Farquharson opened the floor for dancing.

through a commercial software package called PeopleSoft.

"It's designed specifically for universities to do student service functions," said Heidi Dollard, co-director of ACSO. "It requires a lot of work by a lot of people to adapt it for our use."

Each of the eight University offices using SPIRE has control over their sections. They choose which features are available to students and which remain hidden.

Most often, students interact with the five different divisions that comprise Help Services. The Software Support division analyzes and repairs malfunctioning software systems.

"At the beginning of the semester, one of the big issues is getting connected," said the manager of Software Support Kevin Skelly. "In general, our biggest concern and our biggest workload comes from viruses and repairing them through whatever means we have to employ."

The Hardware Support division, which fixes and sells computer hardware equipment, serves a unique function in the Five College community.

"All of the other four colleges that are part of the Five College system don't have the support of hardware support systems on their campus, so Hardware Support on this campus serves the Five College system for hardware issues," said Andrew Vernon, Help Desk manager.

A division called LAN Support installs, assesses and maintains departments' web-based equipment.

Perhaps the most familiar aspect of Help Services is the Help Desk. "The job of the Help Desk is listening to all the people submitting questions, calling and e-mailing and responding to them," said Vernon.

Vernon noted that the Help Desk has fielded thousands of questions from students, staff and faculty, but they cannot always help people working outside of the campus network.

"Some student groups run their own independent websites let alone networks and access to all of these are only available internally," he said.

Network Systems and Services is the backbone of the Office of Internet Technologies that keeps the campus network secure. Besides providing network connections, NSS provides Internet surveillance.

When unlawful activity is discovered, NSS reports the activity to the UMass Police, Massachusetts State Police or FBI depending on the seriousness of the crime. In addition, they offer security-based consultations to academic departments looking to further secure their information.

The Telecommunications branch of OIT maintains all non-Internet networks on campus. This includes the on-campus telephone and cable networks.

Despite all of these functions, the OIT staff is not always the group to look to when technology malfunctions at UMass.

"Some of the departments have their own professional computer staff," said John Dubuch, Chief Information Officer of the Office of Information Technologies. "Some contract with OIT, some of them will do it themselves. This is true in some of the administrative offices. There's a lot more IT that goes on in this campus than just OIT."

These types of facts are meant to contradict people's opinions and generate skepticism.

"When I read some of the statistics, I honestly don't even believe it," says freshman Debbie Yang.

Critics say that the messages are ineffective, incorrect and may influence students to drink by reminding them of drinking. However, it is important to note that the numbers are accumulated through surveys filled out by students themselves.

"It is 50/50 with the messages because some statements are obvious and others are slightly interesting," said sophomore Jessica Taylor.

Since the launch of the Social Norms Campaign, the prevalence of binge and heavy drinking has subsided, according to the campaign.

Project assistant Jenn Andrade claimed that it is most effective with the combination of the other implemented programs. The University also began to take action by administering stringent regulations and enforcements.

As drinking becomes an increasingly controversial issue, UMass and other universities are looking into more ways of dealing with this problem. Lawmakers are being urged to lower the drinking age to 18, while other universities are now using the Social Norms Campaign and seeing a huge difference on their own campuses.

ed by The Massachusetts Animal Interest Coalition, said that there are strict regulations against animal cruelty and injuries to dogs represent less than 1 percent of the dogs raced. The MAIC also contend that there is a 100 percent adoption rate of greyhounds that are retired from racing, a figure disputed by proponents of Question 3.

The MAIC said dog racing employs about 1,000 people, and at a time when the economy is stumbling, cutting those jobs would hurt the state as a whole, as well as those individuals.

Consequences of Question 1

Eric Magazu

Tomorrow, registered voters in Massachusetts will have the opportunity to make a decision on Question 1. Perhaps if you have voted early by absentee ballot, you have already made your choice on the matter. Question 1 is a ballot initiative that will repeal our state income tax over a two-year period. It is my intention to make the case that it is wise for you, regardless of your political philosophy, to cast your vote in favor of this initiative.

Opponents of the measure suggest that the state will face serious financial trouble if the initiative is approved. This is in fact hardly the case, because regardless of the outcome of the election, the Massachusetts state legislature will have the final say on the matter. There isn't a plausible scenario in which we can expect the legislature to simply comply with the outright repeal of the income tax and proceed to slash the budget across the board.

There will be many positive consequences if the citizens of Massachusetts show that they are displeased with the income tax, consequences that will not occur if the initiative is rejected. If the initiative is rejected, government officials will see its rejection as a ratification of their current high tax and high spending ideology. If we manage to approve the ballot question, legislators will see this as a wake-up call on how the Massachusetts budget is funded.

As a result of passage, we can expect to see a much more careful tax regime passed to replace the current system. If legislators vote to restore an income tax, they will be quite measured in how they formulate its details. The new percentage will certainly be lower than the current 5.3 percent rate. This result will also lead our representatives on Beacon Hill to carefully consider alternative sources of revenue.

We might expect to see the development of innovative ideas in the collection of external sources of revenue or the imposition of unique forms of tax collection. For example, legislators may involve the private sector in handling state functions. If a private concessionaire is able to make a profit on the service the government usually would provide, this will not only mean that the state will no longer have to worry about this particular program, but it could result in additional income through revenue sharing agreements.

If the initiative is rejected, government officials will see its rejection as a ratification of their current high tax and high spending ideology.

We could see new ideas come in the form of the schemes used in tax collection. In the early days of our country, poll taxes were often used. Nowadays the poll tax is associated with bigotry, but this is a notion that came about in a later era. A poll tax is simply a flat amount charged to each adult citizen. The idea is that we are all equal members of a community, and thus each of us ought to pay the same amount in support of our government. The great benefit of a poll tax is that it forces taxes to be low across the board.

There are benefits on the spending side as well. Before the legislature votes in new taxes in replacement of the income tax, they will have to look carefully at current spending levels. Social programs that have outlived their usefulness will have to be reformed or repealed.

The doomsday scenario being portrayed in the media and around campus is the idea that the legislature will simply approve massive across the board budget cuts. In the unlikely event that this scenario becomes reality, we will still see positive benefits. I'm not simply talking about the idea that families can spend their money better than the government, although I agree with this idea. Instead, I'm thinking more along the lines that we would see a resurgence of the ethics of neighborhood and community.

The trouble with an income tax, and the subsequent redistribution of wealth that occurs with government social programs, is that it removes families and communities from their proper role as caregivers of people in need. I'm certain that if the state government got out of the business of providing social services, we would see individuals and families step up to the plate.

The benefit is that not only do families and communities insist on the proper spending of funds for the caretaking of those people who are in periods of distress, but families actually care about the real people involved. A government program will often enable destructive behavior to persist for a person who really just needs someone to help him get back on his feet. What is most often missing from government programs is the element of love and compassion.

I believe that tomorrow everyone ought to cast their vote in favor of Question 1. While the question itself is about the specific idea of repealing our state income tax, the broader implications are much more important. While at first this might seem to be stretch, voting in favor of Question 1 will actually work to bring us back towards a more just and moral society. Indeed, it's a vote to begin the process of restoration of the proper role of family and community in our lives.

Halloween costume recap

Nick O'Malley

Another day of the dead has come and passed at UMass. I'm of course talking about November 1, when the majority of students are dragging themselves out of bed just in time to change their clocks for daylight savings time. But since there is still some leftover costume makeup and artificially orange-colored food around, it's a good time to take a look at how Halloween is actually celebrated in college.

In case you forgot, the main theme of Halloween includes the rising of the dead, pumpkins and giving out candy. You know, stuff you did 10 years ago. If there isn't a decent presence of any sort of vampire, zombie or skeleton, it's really just a costume party. And if it's just a bunch of scantily-clad girls and guys who don't want to dress up, it's a fraternity party.

But for the most part, the types of costumes that are chosen on college campuses are either intended to look good or be funny. Essentially, the typical college costume can be placed into one of five groups.

The first type of costume is easily the most discussed – the "sexy" costume. Applying mostly to females, the sexy costume is simply a version of your ordinary costume, with less clothing.

It's nothing you've never seen before. The sexy nurse, teacher, maid, doctor, athlete, referee, prisoner, police officer, angel, devil, witch, fairy, cowgirl, hula girl, warrior princess, lifeguard, bunny, bear, nun, girl scout and pirate are all amongst your standard fare of sexy costumes, just to name a few.

You're also bound to come across a Catwoman, all four Wizard of Oz characters, Princesses Leah, Peach and Jasmine, Pocahontas and Little Red Riding Hood, as young adults continue to defile every Disney movie ever made just for Halloween.

Although a large number of girls don't go out of their way to sport a skanky getup, they're often guilty by association. It's hard to draw the line between a sexy princess costume and someone that looks good in a slightly revealing fairy costume. Because of this, anomalies like the sexy candy corn costume occur. It's happened. I've seen it.

While a large number of female costumes fall into the sexy costume category, many males choose costumes that simply show off how totally awesome they are.

The "awesome dude" costume is pretty easy to identify. Costumes like God's gift to women, the gorilla suit, the chicken suit and the Greek god of drinking are costumes that focus solely on bringing attention to the wearer.

This sort of twisted humor regrettably culminates into a combination of the sexy and awesome costumes, which would normally sound like a great idea until you see a guy dressed up as a sexy schoolgirl.

It may seem cool and ironic, but if at least five people have to ask if you're even dressed up, it's not a costume.

However, there is the extreme case where a costume arises that truly is as awesome as the wearer intends to be. So, to the man dressed as the Burger King who walked up to a complete stranger and gave them a hamburger – I commend you.

On the opposite end of the spectrum from the awesome costume, is the really lazy, last-minute costume. More often than not, this sort of costume came from someone's collection of ordinary clothes and was just named a costume. More often than not, it's just someone in their normal clothes.

This type of costume usually requires a long explanation into why it's a real costume and "totally works, dude." Examples include people trying to pass off as characters from Saved by the Bell or other 90s TV shows. It may seem cool and ironic, but if at least five people have to ask if you're even dressed up, it's not a costume.

Easily recognizable movie and video game characters, or actual undead-themed Halloween costumes are what make Halloween fun – that, and candy. But it just so happens that for every good idea, there are five other people that you'll run into with the same idea. This goes out to everyone who dressed up as the Joker, the ninja turtles, Sarah Palin, Mario and Michael Phelps.

Since it's been long forgotten on college campuses that Halloween costumes are supposed to be scary, people tend to go all out in order find a funny costumes. Unfortunately, this comes at the cost of taste. The Jamaican bobsled team is a great idea for a costume for a bunch of guys. However, when the costume includes "blackface," it's not a joke.

For whatever reason, the desire to have the funniest costume causes some people to cross the line in terms of what's just offensive. Costumes like the Crips and Bloods, variations of Hitler, terrorists and Catholic priests with babies just take unnecessary shots at people around campus.

Things like Steve Irwin with a stingray or even Michael Vick in a prison uniform aren't as bad because they're aimed at celebrities who will never see it. This is a diverse campus, so odds are that if your costume makes fun of any religious or ethnic group, someone you see is going to be offended.

With the pressures involved in having the most sexy or funny costumes, it's sometimes hard to know where to draw the line. But, with the advent of a new college definition of Halloween, such things are becoming the norm.

Long gone are the days of ghosts and ghouls. That stuff is for your little brother.

College and the youth vote

Paul Payer

By this time tomorrow, our nation's elementary school gymnasiums and church recreation centers will be filled with excited citizens eager to cast a ballot for their favored presidential and congressional candidates. Analysts predict an exceptionally high level of voter turnout building upon increased participation in 2004, in which turnout exceeded that of all presidential and midterm elections since 1968.

Even around campus, interest and excitement over this year's election has become evident as lively political debate has momentarily replaced mindless banter at tables across the campus' Dining Commons and political groups keep busy by canvassing nearby battleground states and hosting lectures and events decrying or praising the presidential candidates.

Given these observations, one would expect that our student body as well as students across the nation will be busy filling bubbles, pulling levers and punching chads tomorrow. But, as past experiences have shown us, that will in all likelihood not be the case. Despite self-proclaimed political awareness and activity, the 18-24 demographic consistently produces the lowest voter turnout of any age-based demographic.

As a group, we have become quite good at coming up with excuses for our absence. Some of them have merit and need to be properly addressed, but many excuses can succinctly be attributed to laziness and general apathy.

Despite the fact that our generation has a huge stake in the outcome of the election (who do you think is going to pay back that national debt and Wall Street bail out?), we have collectively failed to become a cohesive and active voting block.

Despite the fact that our generation has a huge stake in the outcome of the election ... we have collectively failed to become a cohesive and active voting bloc.

Traditionally, the claim has been made that candidates do not make the effort to talk to youth voters or that they simply do not understand the issues facing that demographic. Although there is some truth to this claim, recent elections have seen a marked increase in attention paid to youth voters, whether that may be through specific policy suggestions by candidates on issues such as college financing, or through outreach efforts such as the fusion of YouTube and debate during the past primary season. Moreover, one cannot expect a candidate to expend precious resources and attention on a demographic whose attendance on Election Day is less than certain.

The most cited reason for the shortage of college students at polling stations, is simply that many college students live too far away from the polling station they are registered at. The appeal of driving 110 miles back home on a Tuesday evening to wait in line for an hour to vote, does not seem appealing to a generation accustomed to a culture of instant gratification and results.

Of course there are simple remedies to this problem; absentee ballots provide voters a quick and simple voting process, and most college students across the country (including at the University of Massachusetts) have the ability to register to vote with their residence linked to their dorm or off-campus residence, allowing them to vote at a local polling station in town.

Although these options are readily available and have been advertised and promoted by various political groups on campus, many youth voters will likely remain on the outside looking in come Election Day.

Further proposals have been offered to increase voter turnout amongst 18-24 year olds. In Maryland, voter advocacy groups have called for legislation to make voting machines available on campus so that students would not have to travel home to vote or file paperwork weeks in advance for an absentee ballot. An additional provision allowing students to hold a statewide voting address would allow a student to vote from their campus residence or home address.

On-campus voting booths were available in the past at UMass, but were only available to students registered in Amherst, a requirement which led to abysmally low turnout forcing termination of the program. A provision similar to the one proposed in Maryland would undoubtedly lead to a significant increase in voter turnout.

Chancellor Holub recently circulated an e-mail encouraging professors to excuse students with voting obligations necessitating class absence. Such comments are commendable, but should be unnecessary. Many other democratic states designate Election Day as a national holiday, and there is little explanation as to why the United States has yet to accede to this idea. In addition to the argument that a national holiday would allow the 15,000-plus Massachusetts residents at UMass to travel back to their hometown to vote, it would boost voter turnout and cut down on the atrociously long lines voters suffer in crucial swing states each election cycle.

Although we may all be able to conjure up a couple reasons for not voting tomorrow, none of them should honestly carry much weight. Further reform and action is required to improve accessibility and turnout, but the importance of this election bears for more than any perceived inconvenience one may find in voting. If you live in the general area, make the trip back home to visit your parents and cast a ballot, your professor will understand if you miss class.

A (U)Mass healthcare fiasco

Hannah Nelson

Several weeks ago, I was the victim of a rather nasty surprise from my health insurance provider. My Commonwealth Care coverage (similar to MassHealth), under the Boston HealthNet Plan had been cancelled. I only found this out because I was calling to clear up a simple matter.

It was a call that was supposed to take 5 minutes. I just needed to verify that I'm a college student living away from home and that I was to be covered independently. Apparently, my coverage was supposed to have been cancelled 10 months ago when I turned 19. Somewhere in recent months, they had discovered the error of their ways and neglected to inform me. As a result, in the span of one crushing phone call, I was told that I was without health insurance in a state and at a school where that's a big problem.

"You're coverage has been cancelled." ... Is the system really so fragmented that 19–year–old student has to hear those words?

There are two details of this revelation that are the source of all my anger. The first is that in late-spring/early-summer, I received all new coverage information from Commonwealth Care, informing me of my new plan and a few forms to sign. My brand new insurance card arrived shortly after. Nowhere could I find anything on the UMass Web site or through the waiver Web site anything about not being allowed to waive the school's Student Health Insurance Plan with my Commonwealth Care coverage. It was too good to be true: two semesters of $1,161 to be eradicated from my bill with one simple waiver that went through without a problem in early July.

The second detail is one that was brought to my attention during that phone call. Commonwealth Care is not in fact a SHIP waiver equivalent. My waiver never should have gone through. Better still, my coverage should have been cancelled last December when I turned 19. I never should have gotten that new paperwork and that shiny plastic insurance card over the summer. My false hope had been a product of an error in the system.

I was told that I would no longer be eligible for Commonwealth Care because UMass offers SHIP. The newly updated Web page (differing greatly from the one I'd seen over the summer) states that UMass would not accept any Commonwealth Care plan because it isn't considered equivalent coverage. This includes Commonwealth Choice, which offers a Young Adult Plan specifically for 18-26-year-olds, the primary college student age demographic.

"Students who have coverage under a Commonwealth Choice plan are not eligible to waive the SHIP. These plans have deductibles higher than $250 and do not meet the guidelines for a qualified student health insurance plan. Becoming a full-time student may impact your eligibility for insurance under a Commonwealth Care plan. Contact your health insurance carrier to verify your status. If you are no longer eligible for Commonwealth Care, call UHS' Patient Services department to be enrolled in the SHIP."

This is an excerpt from the University Health Services' insurance info Web page, and a two-sided rejection.

UMass Amherst is the largest public college in the state. With all the bragging of UMass as a brilliant bang-for-your-buck school, why can't the University accept my Commonwealth Care coverage? Commonwealth care is a method of coverage that is supposed to help residents who can't afford required coverage under other plans, residents like college students. And Commonwealth Care tells me that, because the school offers me a more expensive plan than my previous accidental coverage, I can't be eligible for a plan that would make paying for my education easier. "You're coverage has been cancelled." Are they kidding me? Is the system really so fragmented that a 19-year-old student has to hear those words?

"Nonequivalent coverage." Is that honestly the best answer that can be given for why the University won't accept Commonwealth Care? Is Commonwealth Care's reason for dropping me that I'm not employed full time and as a student have to buy SHIP instead? I thought the state needed college graduates – then why not make the road easier? How is it so hard for a prominent state university to accept state offered insurance? The state offered insurance ought to understand that maybe it's a strain to buy the school's plan. That's what the state plan is there for in the first place.

Am I missing something?

The lesson of this story could be that I should have called Health Services over the summer about the waiver to make sure my plan was applicable. But that's what I get for trusting the system. A simple precautionary phone call then could have saved me from dashed hopes in the present, but is it so wrong that I was just too willing to believe that the state and the University were able to understand what it means to rely on the now cancelled coverage?

It means a lot for students to be able to waive SHIP with a state-funded option for those who can't mange the state's health insurance laws.

Phillips inconsistent

By Michelle Fredette
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — While Halloween isn't the best night to have a performance, with the usual costume parties to attend and pumpkins to carve, artist Glen Phillips and opening act Antje Duvekot filled the bottom floor of the Iron Horse Music Hall last Friday night.

"You could be sipping acid-spiked punch in a golden tutu, but you're here instead. Thank you," said Glen Phillips during his performance.

A select few concertgoers wore costumes, and only one waitress donned cat ears. Both performers commented on the lack of Halloween spirit inside the venue, with Duvekot saying, "It's a freak show outside."

Neither artist made any change to their appearance in the spirit of Halloween; both wore t-shirts and jeans, and Phillips sported a scruffy beard.

Phillips introduced Duvekot, who stayed true to her reputation as a performer of somber songs. Her soft melodies and almost trilling voice seemed to slowly wake the audience from their post-dinner stupors, providing a gentle rather than startling opening performance.

Duvekot began with an older song, "Dublin Boys," and continued on to two new pieces from her upcoming album, "The Near Demise of the Punch-Drunk Tightrope Dancer," due out later this year.

Duvekot also played "Dandelion" and "South" from her most recent release, which were well received, eliciting cheers from the audience. She ended with the new song "Merry-Go-Round," which Duvekot prefaced by saying, "This one has a lot of words and I start drooling at the end because there's nowhere to breathe."

Duvekot joked throughout her set, keeping her mellow tones from creating too solemn an atmosphere. Unfortunately, some of these jokes were overtly political and took away from the relaxed feel of the show.

This close to Election Day it's inevitable that politics are cropping up everywhere, and Phillips also went into a political spiel between songs.

Most of Phillips' set was spontaneous due to his recent glass coffee table-induced injury, or as he said, his "recent shark attack." Sean Watkins, who called the ambulance and put a tourniquet on Phillips when the injury occurred, covered most of the guitar work.

The pain and decreased mobility in Phillips' left arm led to some confusion and mistakes throughout the show. The most notable blunder occurred during the first song, "Whatever I Fear," leading to laughter, apologies, an explanation of the injury and starting over again.

Other issues that rose from the injury involved having to rearrange the set list, deleting songs that proved too difficult for Phillips at this time. These were replaced with songs that had simpler chords.

Since Phillips has had a prolific music career, with five "Toad the Wet Sprocket" studio albums, three solo albums, several EPs and a few collaborative projects under his belt, the limitations on Phillips' ability to play in no way limited the range of songs he performed.

The set list for the evening was a cut and paste venture from all of these sources. Phillips played a few "Toad" songs, such as "All I Want" and "Walk on the Ocean." He also used solo work from various albums, like "Train Wreck" off "Abulum," "Duck and Cover," and "Don't Need Anything," from "Winter Pays for Summer;" and "Waiting" and "Everything But You" from "Mr. Lemons."

Phillips and Watkins kept the mood light, playing songs with serious subject matter at a quick tempo, such as "True" and "Released." Despite the spontaneity of much of the show, they also managed to balance the more solemn songs out with happier ones. Phillips remarked after one particularly gloomy piece, "We've got to follow that up with a love song, right?"

Phillips and Watkins, both members of the new band "Works Progress Administration," performed several songs off the WPA album that has been recorded but not yet released, including "You Will Always Have My Love."

Phillips proved to be the kind of guy who can go with the flow and appreciate good music, as he stepped back from the mike for a few songs and let Watkins take center stage. The two played two tracks from one of Watkins' solo albums as well as the Nickel Creek song "Somebody More Like You."

Even more impulsive was when Phillips asked if "we can just skip the niceties where I leave and you clap for a while and then I come back onstage, and instead we just keep playing for as long as we can."

Despite the injury and impulsive nature of the show, Phillips performed well and with cohesiveness at the Iron Horse Friday night.

'Apollo Sunshine' electrifies

Hendrix cover band rocks Iron Horse

By Angela Stasiowski
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — There is a lot to say about a band that can get an entire audience to its feet and keep them standing until the night wears out. "Apollo Sunshine" achieved this difficult task during its Halloween show last Friday at the Iron Horse Music Hall.

Posing as the Jimi Hendrix Experience, the band filled the venue with covers of classic Hendrix tunes as well as new material from its most recent release, "Shall Noise Upon."

The album, which was released earlier this year, is a distinct cohesion of psychedelic pop and alternative rock that appeals to a variety of age groups and musical tastes.

Opening for the psychedelic rockers was "Client Number 9," a local group of young musicians who recently won the 2008 Amherst Regional Battle of the Bands.

Clearly influenced by the post-rock movement, the band drifted through a set of intricately orchestrated tunes similar to the late alt "Mogwai" or "Explosions in the Sky."

The band has found great success since the local victory, making its music available on iTunes and earning themselves a tremendous local following.

With virtuosic orchestration and the natural ability to captivate an audience, "Client Number 9" is every bit deserving of this recognition. Members received many pats on the back as they awaited the arrival of the night's top billing.

Clad in skyscraping afro wigs and psychedelic duds, "Apollo Sunshine" took the stage to an audience of jellyfish, vampires and everything in between.

The Bostonian trio kicked off the evening with a cover of Hendrix's "Manic Depression," sending the venue through a time warp to the heyday of the rocking '60s.

"Apollo Sunshine's" cover stayed true to Hendrix's vision and energy, though no artist can ever quite approach the level of organic talent displayed by the original.

Moving on to its new material, the band played several tracks off "Shall Noise Upon," including "Singing to the Earth I'll Thank Her For You," the album's first single. The song was suited well to the live show, and proved to be an excellent addition to the set list.

Another highlight of the evening was an extended rendition of "Today is the Day," a dance-worthy depiction of the carpe diem philosophy. With its jazz-inspired walking base and raucous vocals, the song brought a smile to every face and a spring to every step within the ghoulish group of fans.

"Magnolia," an equally welcome addition to the set, was the most folk-inspired song of the evening, brandishing potent percussion that cut through the twanging harmonies and acoustic guitars.

Other classic Hendrix songs like "Foxy Lady," evoked sing-alongs with the audience members.

With so many widely known songs to choose from, "Apollo Sunshine" did a commendable job of determining which songs to play without sounding too much like a cliche cover band. This effort was aided by interspersing its original material throughout.

The final song in the set, "Crosstown Traffic," featured a breathtaking drum break that employed all three musicians. The improvised nature of this addition set Sunshine's cover apart from the original and made for an interesting side note to the show as a whole.

As part of its three-song encore, the band opted to conclude the evening epically, with a cover of Hendrix's infamous take on "The Star Spangled Banner." The song featured beautifully distorted guitar cords that wandered the sonic spectrum in all the right directions.

Not a particularly talkative group, the band rarely took the time to address the audience and made little effort to accept requests. However, this lack of communication was acceptable in light of the band's independent and fiercely original nature.

More original "Apollo Sunshine" songs would have been appreciated, particularly in light of its new release. Even so, performances of both covers and originals were superb, and the costumes made for a vintage-inspired yet truly unique concert experience.

With the spirit of Jimi Hendrix at the forefront of the evening, it would be impossible for the show to be anything short of spectacular.

Swedish songster performs at local high school benefit

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Northampton High School student Clara Gardner was honored with a benefit Saturday night, featuring one of her favorite musicians, Jens Lekman, who came from Sweden to Northampton just for the event.

"I don't know what to say. I'm just so excited," the NHS senior said. "Plus we get to go out to dinner with him after."

The event, sponsored by the Clarion Hotel & Conference Center, Northampton High School, the Secretly Canadian record label and Springfield Technical Community College, saw a fair amount of attendees but didn't fill the NHS auditorium.

Many members of the community came out to support Gardner, who lost both her legs when she was hit by a drunk driver in Springfield last August.

Once the audience filed into the high school, the lights dimmed and Lekman took the stage, strolling to his guitar unassumingly. Before his first song, he asked the audience not to share the evening with the world through YouTube or other means provided by the Internet, a generous gesture to Clara, because the night belonged to her.

Lekman then broke into his first song, "Sipping on the Sweet Nectar," his newsboy cap resting atop his stern baby-face as his guitar strums echoed from his single amplifier.

Next came fan-favorite "A Postcard to Nina," before which Lekman told the humorous back-story involving a 20-hour bus ride to Berlin ("I'd only take 20 hours to ride my bike there"), the prospect of German vegetarian food ("I didn't know that existed"), and when his lesbian-leaning friend Nina revealed to Jens that she told her large German father she was engaged to him, rendering him speechless.

This and other banter was received well, prompting giggles and applause as Lekman squirmed onstage, serenading the audience through his puffy red microphone, which accurately matched his red pants. He displayed how honored he was that coordinator Becca Warren asked him to perform with finest hours after every song.

Lekman comes off as half-way between charmingly smooth and sophomorically awkward, producing a saccharine-sweet vibe which could surely warm any heart, be it of a lesbian friend like Nina or a high-school girl like Clara.

"I get a lot [of strange [event] requests," Lekman explained after his second song. "Weddings, birthdays, bar mitzvahs, funerals ... someone said to me once 'I heard you don't play weddings anymore. Can you play my divorce?' I really hate my wife."

Before diving into his third song, "Kanske Att Jag Kar I Dig," Lekman showed how touched he was by Gardner's story and her perseverance through her injuries as he declared "I wish I had any friend like Clara Gardner."

During that song, Lekman showed he was just a bit rusty, stumbling over a few lines before he revealed later that he hadn't played a show in half a year. Lyrical screw-ups aside, his Beach Boy falsetto sounded perfect permeating through the auditorium.

The quiet and pale Lekman played the next song, his classic "Black Cab," with his lone voice to start, fingering his guitar familiarly after the first verse to accompany him.

In end the first part of his set, Lekman played "Shirin," a song about a gone-by hairdresser who did everything right. In her absence, he just has not been able to get the correct hair cut, as he explained, "that's why I'm wearing a hat today."

During intermission, the benefit further extended a hand for donations with multiple items up for raffle as well as a bake sale with goods provided by Panera Bread, Barstow's Bakery, Henion Bakery, Bread Euphoria, Costco, Big Y and Stop & Shop.

The sad-eyed Lekman took the stage for his second set of tunes and brief doses of comedy.

Lekman serenades local teen

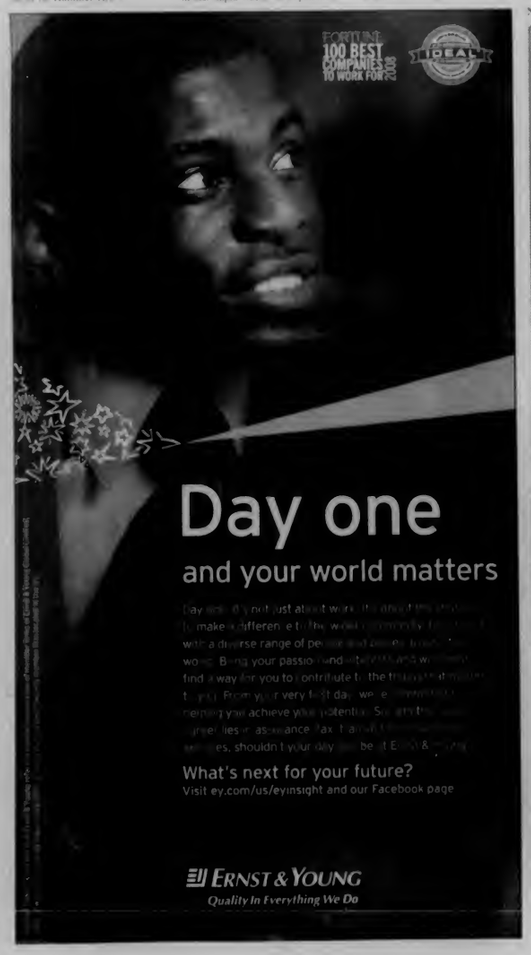
"The backstage room is in the faculty office. Want to hang with me in the faculty office?" he inquired. As the audience was anxiously left dangling on those words, he put an end to their imaginations. "Well you can't ... but I did change some grades."

Jens continued the all-star set list, including "I'm Leaving You Because I Don't Love You" and "The Opposite of Hallelujah," both expanded with strings, electronics and xylophones pumping out of his iPod, as well as a spot-on version of "A Sweet Summer's Night in Hammer Hill."

"Be my samples," commanded Lekman as the audience cheered and clapped to mimic the crowd noise of "Hammer Hill" in its recorded version. The audience also aided in the jumbled "oh no" chorus toward the end of the song and the bouncing faux-heartbeat sounds as he put the microphone to his chest.

Lekman came out for a final encore to close out the night, sporting a cover of Paul Simon's "You Can Call Me Al," a syrupy dedication to Clara. However, he yielded when he approached the chorus, opting for the simple riff over the time-tested lyrics. "I hated Chevy Chase in that stupid video," he explained.



Lekman played two more, "Your Arms Around Me" (suspiciously, a song about cutting off his fingertips) and "Pocketful of Money," which was supported by an ensemble of audience whistling and finger-snapping for the duration of the song.

Lekman seemed to genuinely feel for Clara as he thanked all in attendance and offered to shake hands and sing more songs in the lobby after the show. He provided Clara with a night to remember, yet it wasn't even close to over ... they still had to catch their reservation for dinner.

UMass held scoreless twice as season ends

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team may not have made the Atlantic 10 tournament as it would have liked, but this weekend's matches against Saint Louis and Charlotte showcased some of its talented players who will have a chance to step up next season.

UMass lost to No. 25 Charlotte, 1-0, Sunday and the Billikens, 2-0, Friday. Even with an offense that's worn down, the Minutewomen did everything possible to make it a memorable weekend for the senior class.

The UMass defense kept the most potent offense in the A-10 from putting the game out of reach. Charlotte (15-3-1, 11-0 A-10) averaged well over three goals per game prior to yesterday's match.

|---|---|
| Charlotte | 1 |
| UMass | 0 |
| SLU | 2 |
| UMass | 0 |

The 49ers scored at least two goals in every A-10 contest with exception to their Oct. 10 win over Temple. But the Minutewomen (6-9-3, 3-7-1 A-10) would not go down easily.

Both teams played physically in the first half and committed 12 fouls. Sophomore Alyssa Visconti had the task of defending Whitney Weinraub, who leads Charlotte with 12 goals.

The Minutewomen were successful getting to the end-line early on and kept the ball from getting to the defense too often.

Redshirt senior Vanessa Lima had some looks at the goal within the first 15 minutes of play. The forward took two shots from almost the exact same spot inside the box on the right side, while absorbing contact.

Both shots went wide. The one shot on goal for the Minutewomen came from freshman Meghan Collins, who booted a shot deflected by Charlotte goalkeeper Lauren Brown.

The only tally of the match came 35 minutes, 33 seconds into the game with an unassisted goal by Hailey Beam. The score came off a corner kick from the left side, which ricocheted off a UMass player onto Beam for a header inside the box.

In the second half, the 49ers targeted Lima's sensitive hamstring and bumped into her on several occasions, to limit her offensively.

"There were a couple times that I was upset with the referees for not booking my players," Charlotte coach Jon Lipsitz said.

Most of Charlotte's 14 shots were set up by corner kicks. It finished the game with eight compared to UMass' four.

"I would've liked to have gotten a few opportunities, but the credit for that goes to the UMass defense," Lipsitz said.

The defense was not so effective against Saint Louis (10-5-4, 6-4-1 A-10) as it gave up 22 shots throughout the game.

The first goal came 21 minutes into the match. Julia Bradenberg passed the ball to the left side of the goal to Ashley Hayes, whose shot slowly rolled into the far corner.

"We knew that we would be outshot but we just wanted to put them out wide. She gets everything that she should get and it's rare that she gives up a softy," Rudy said.

The lead became out of reach during the closing minutes of the game. With just under 9 minutes left in the game, Andrea Barklage made the most of a scramble in front of the net and placed the ball in the left side of the net.

UMass ended the season on a five-game losing streak with no goals since the Oct. 12 win over Dayton. However, the younger players' performance gives the team hope for improvement next season.

"[Next year's returning players] are really energetic and I'm looking forward to playing with them," goalkeeper Lauren Luckey said.

UMass senior Amy Ballew battles for the ball in a game earlier this season against Holy Cross. The Minutewomen finished their season this weekend, losing a pair of games at Rudd Field.

UMass coach Jim Rudy talks to sophomore Therese Smith (left) and senior Vanessa Patry (right) during Friday's game against Saint Louis. UMass finished its season at 6-9-3 overall and 3-7-1 in the A-10.

Seniors reflect on careers

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy had a difficult time pulling himself away from the Minutewomen's final huddle of the 2008 season.

Saying farewell to a unique senior class, that he called the finest group of girls he had ever coached wasn't easy for him.

UMass suffered a 1-0 loss to No. 25 Charlotte Sunday at Rudd Field, as the Minutewomen dropped their fifth straight game of the season and suffered their fifth straight game without a goal.

Midfielders Amy Ballew, Vanessa Lima, forward Vanessa Patry and defenders Melissa Toulouse and Tina Rodriguez were honored before the Minutewomen's season finale against the nationally ranked 49ers.

All five reflected on their careers at UMass after the game.

Amy Ballew

After playing in just 12 games last season and three games as a redshirt freshman in 2006, the Tennessee transfer started every game at midfield this season for the Minutewomen.

The increase in playing time reflected Ballew's hard work in the offseason, especially while working out with Patry.

"She took a good gamble in changing her life in order to play for us and do the things you have to," Rudy said. "That takes a lot of courage, nothing ventured nothing gained, and I really admire that [about her]."

Ballew and Toulouse played together before college on club teams, winning the 2004 Virginia State Cup.

When Ballew decided to transfer, she contacted Toulouse and was able to earn a roster spot as a redshirt freshman in 2006.

"My time here has been great and they were a very welcoming team," Ballew said.

She recorded her first career goal and first career point in the Minutewomen's first victory of the 2008 season on Sept. 16 against Bryant.

Vanessa Lima

"I'm glad she came back and came back to her real home and started with us and finished with us," Rudy said.

As a freshman in 2004, she played in 16 game and recorded one assist.

Despite starting just one game in 2005, Lima registered four goals and one assist with seven of her nine points coming in conference play.

But Lima decided to leave UMass after the 2005 season and transfer to Salem State.

She was successful there, starting 15-of-17 games while registering nine goals and three assists.

A change of heart took her back to UMass, were she sat out the 2007 season due to NCAA rules.

Lima scored the first winning goal of her career and the Minutewomen's lone goal in the memorable win against Dayton on Oct. 12. She finished her senior season with two goals and one assist.

She also shared an extremely strong relationship with Rudy, who has ties to Lima's Cape Verdean community.

"It's nice to know that he cared that much and it always feels good to hear it," Lima said. "It makes you look back and reflect on what you did to make him feel that way."

Vanessa Patry

Patry was only the second UMass player ever under Rudy to be a captain both her junior and senior seasons. She led the team in points this season with 13 (five goals, three assists).

In UMass' A-10 opener, she tallied her second two-goal game of the season and the third of her career in UMass' double-overtime win against St. Bonaventure.

She also recorded three game-winning goals, two assists against Holy Cross in a double-overtime game that featured one of her goals as a game winner.

"As seniors we kind of lead the way and team wanted to be," Patry said. "Our team chemistry was amazing and our record doesn't show it, but we put our hearts out on the field and we really appreciate that."

Melissa Toulouse

Toulouse was one of the anchors of the Minutewoman defensive unit. The co-captain started every game in each of the last three seasons, helping lead the UMass defense through her career.

Playing solely on defense, Toulouse never scored a goal in her career. That her assist in the game-winning goal in 2006 against Connecticut was a memorable moment in her career.

"She is a technical player as well as a hard, physical player," Rudy said.

Tina Rodriguez

After redshirting the 2003 season with an injury, Rodriguez came back to anchor the defense with Toulouse and also helped out on the offensive side of the ball.

She registered UMass' first assist on Lima's goal against Dayton, her first assist since her freshman game in 2004.

Rodriguez also earned her first career start in her final game in Thursday. She tied the team goal in the 2006 campaign in a season-ending 2-1 loss against Binghamton.

"What a great kid," Rudy said. "Talk about loyalty. And if she was a coach's player, there isn't one."

Toulouse summed up the 2008 seniors best in her send off statement.

"Despite the losses and not getting to the postseason, it doesn't take away that this team was a great group of girls, and a great team in general," she said.

he stayed calm, scrambled and threw with ball with confidence.

Coen was taken out of the game in the third quarter with the big lead.

Redshirt junior Victor Cruz, Coen's main receiving threat, caught seven passes on the day for 129 yards and two touchdowns. Jeremy Horne caught four passes for 86 yards.

Rhode Island on the other hand, had no consistency on offense. When it did move the ball on drives, it failed to score. On its drive after the first UMass score, kicker Louis Feinstein missed a 40-yard field goal wide-right. Feinstein also missed a fourth quarter field goal.

With a big lead in the second half, Brown replaced many of his starters – both on offense and defense.

"The bottom line is we wanted to win the game," Brown said. "We didn't come here with the intent to embarrass anybody, we took our foot off the gas in the second half."

Entering the matchup, some of the UMass players that played last season against URI still had thoughts of the tough loss in their heads.

"For us to come down here and do that, it was not what we wanted to accomplish as a team," Coen said of the 2007 defeat. "It leaves a bitter taste in everybody's mouth. I think we were pretty psyched up for this game, it was big for us to come out the way we did."

The Minutemen return to McGuirk Stadium this weekend for a home meeting against Maine in another must-win game.

Coen nearly perfect in win

COEN from page 10

Saturday's game.

"He's smart enough though, I'll listen to him," Coen chimed in afterwards.

Coen has stepped up at the perfect time, as UMass (6-3, 3-2 Colonial Athletic Association) has been virtually in a must-win situation since its third loss of the season on Oct. 18 against Richmond.

Since taking over as the full-time starter early in his freshman season, Coen is 20-11 in 47 starts leading the Minutemen to two NCAA tournament births and a national championship game appearance in 2006.

After some struggles early this season, Coen and the offense have been almost impossible to stop. UMass will need to keep that going with very tough upcoming conference games against Maine and No. 1 New Hampshire.

Both teams will be playing for rain.

UMass scores 14 goals in PC sweep

play, passing perfectly to each other, causing Providence (2-4-0, 0-4-0 HEA) forwards to challenge them and leaving Berry wide-open. Berry wristed the puck high, sophomore center Michael Lecomte deflected the puck glove-side past Mannix (20 saves). After their second power play goal of the night, the Minutemen stood at 8-for-10 (26 percent) with the man advantage.

Physical play also increased in the second period from an incident back in the first.

At the 15:37 mark, back in the opening period, Friar Ben Farrer was penalized for an elbow on Marcou. Immediately Marcou's younger brother, Michael, took notice, as did Berry.

UMass would seemingly put the game away at 12:30 of the second period on Marc Concannon's second career goal. The sophomore fired a shot into the top right of the net, skimming the crossbar on its way in, after receiving a pass from Quirk in the right circle.

Providence, though, would put the game within reach. On a wraparound attempt by Austin Mayer, the puck deflected off Paul Dainton's chest, bouncing in front of him, right to looming Friar Matt Germain who fired past Dainton (24 saves).

Dainton, in his first full game back from an injury played well. The sophomore came out of his crease, aggressively challenging Providence attackers and cutting off shooting angles. Dainton also was the Minutemen's best penalty killer, stopping all eight shots he faced on six PC power plays.

UMass has killed their last 18 penalties. Sticking to coach Cahoon's system has lead to its effectiveness.

"Just sticking with the system, working hard and getting pucks out," UMass defenseman Justin Braun said. "It's when you start running around you get in trouble."

UMass countered the Friars goal, with a goal of its own, the game-winner.

Berry, in the Friars' left corner noticed a charging James Marcou and fired the puck toward the net. The puck ricocheted off Marcou's body, past Mannix, who was pulled following the second intermission and replaced by Justin Gates.

The Minutemen added insurance on Braun's third point of the night. The junior found himself in the perfect spot to bury home a rebound that deflected into the center slot off Marcou's stick.

UMass' next game is against Merrimack Nov. 8.

Game notes

The last time UMass scored at least eight goals in a game was back in 2006 against Connecutict

The nine goals against the Friars was the most ever for the Minutemen in a Hockey East game. They joined the league for the 1994-95 season. Despite the nine-goal output, UMass only outshot Providence by one Friday (33-32). Twelve different players registered a point for the Minutemen Friday. Alex Berry had three assists for the second time this season, the first coming against then-No. 5 North Dakota on Oct. 11.

defender Sam DeNormandie, who before Sunday had never played in a regular season game, scored his first career goal off a header on a corner kick sent in by Arikian.

"[DeNormandie] worked hard in practice, he deserved to get a little bit of time on the field, so I put him in and it paid big dividends," Koch said.

His goal became the game-winner when Fordham's Brett Heyder knocked in a header with 9 minutes remaining, but it wasn't enough as the Minutemen held on for their fourth straight victory, spoiling the Rams' senior day.

Both teams had eight shots on goal, with UMass holding a 12-11 edge in total shots. UMass committed 17 fouls compared to eight for Fordham.

On Friday, the Minutemen played the Explorers (2-12-3, 1-6 A-10) in some tough conditions. Playing a road game in nearly freezing weather on a narrow field, the Minutemen managed to earn the victory.

The Minutemen controlled the contest from the outset, taking seven unanswered shots before the Explorers had one. UMass took a 1-0 lead in the 35th minute when Arikian lofted a free kick past the goalkeeper and into the corner of the net, for his third goal of the season.

Senior forward Prince Oliou scored an insurance goal on a breakaway with 54 seconds left to seal the UMass victory. Oliou leads the team with 11 points, he has five goals along with one assist.

Koch praised the defensive performance of the team on Friday, especially in the first half. The Explorers managed one shot on goal, which was saved by goalkeeper Zack Simmons.

Next week, the Minutemen will host their final two games of the regular season against Saint Louis and Charlotte. Both teams have been ranked in the Top 25 at different points throughout the season.

Forward depth a plus for UM

Berry, Quirk, Marcou lead talented group offensively

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE, R.I. – Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon has stressed the depth of his offense since the start of the season and this weekend proved he was correct.

The Minutemen (4-1-1, 2-0-1 Hockey East) scored 14 goals in a variety of ways in their sweep of Providence (2-4-0, 0-4-0 Hockey East) over the weekend. The Minutemen won 9-4 Friday at home, with 12 different players earning at least one point. It was the most goals they have scored in 12 years. They added five more in a 5-1 win over the Friars Saturday at Schneider Arena.

The Minutemen used tips, deflections, slap shots, cycling and quick passes to score their goals this weekend. That ability will continue to benefit the Minutemen throughout the season, not allowing opponents to anticipate UMass in its offensive zone.

The point-earning powers of senior Alex Berry, senior Cory Quirk and sophomore James Marcou headlined the weekend. They entered the weekend having nine points as a line, and as they left Providence on Saturday they had 19 more – earning 12 points on Friday – totaling 28 for the season. All three of their skills compliment each other and add up to many goal-scoring opportunities.

"I think we've got good offensive capabilities. You've got one line there that I think we've all hoped would be prolific. You've got Berry, who's got great puck skills, Quirk who's got a combination of skating and puck skills and is tenacious and Marcou who is just a brilliant play maker," Cahoon said.

"You've got these guys playing in rhythm with one another and they are going to produce some chances, you're hoping you are going to get goals out of them," he added.

This weekend, Berry tallied six points on four assists and two goals, Quirk had four assists and one goal and Marcou earned three goals and five assists. But Quirk's line wasn't the only line that earned points this weekend. UMass had goals from nine different players over the weekend and assists coming from eight.

Freshman Casey Wellman has shown his speed and aggressiveness this season at center. Wellman and line mates Chase Langeraap and Chris Davis have the chemistry they need to lead the Minutemen offensively.

Wellman tallied three assists on Friday. Langeraap has earned a point in every game since his return from an injury on Oct. 21 – he has two goals and three assists in four games. He scored a goal and had an assist on Friday. Davis scored two goals over the weekend, and totals four goals this season.

Sophomore Michael Lecomte, who typically centers freshman Danny Hobbs and junior Will Ortiz, tallied two power-play goals this weekend. Lecomte has three power-play goals this season and one assist. Ortiz played only in Friday's game, giving freshman T.J. Syner a chance at right wing on Saturday. Ortiz scored the ninth goal for the Minutemen on Friday on a hard slap shot in the slot.

Junior captain Brett Watson typically centers senior Scott Crowder and sophomore Brian Keane. Watson doesn't have any points this season, but plays a key role in the defensive zone and on the penalty kill. Keane played only on Friday, giving sophomore Marc Concannon an opportunity to play on Saturday, where he scored UMass' third goal of the game.

"This is a more balanced team than any other team I've ever had [at UMass]," Cahoon said. "Wellman is a talent in his own right, Lecomte is certainly an accomplished center iceman and Watson is a very good defensive center. You start with the anchors of each line, I like the composition of the forward lines and we've got some depth."

This weekend, Cahoon rotated in two players that don't see as much ice time – Syner and Concannon.

"The great thing about our team is we've got a lot of depth so far, a lot of guys that can fill in each others spots and, like I said, team speed is huge for us," Davis said. "We have a fourth line that can skate very fast and get in there and disrupt other teams defenses, so coach has had no problem switching guys in and out and everyone's been contributing."

The Minutemen have scored 25 goals this season, for an average of 4.2 per game. In four of UMass' six games, it has scored three or more goals – including a 6-0 win over Rensselaer and the 9-4 and 5-1 wins over Providence.

"[It's] great to see how many goals we're scoring because in the past few years it's been a little tough, but guys are putting the puck in the net which is huge," junior defenseman Justin Braun said.

Braun and fellow defensemen senior Topher Bevis, senior John Wessbecker and freshman Michael Marcou all contributed offensively this weekend. Braun tallied three assists and a goal, Bevis earned an assist, Wessbecker assisted on two goals and Marcou assisted on another.

UMass senior captain Cory Quirk moves in to score during Friday's win against Providence. Quirk's goal and two assists helped the Minutemen trounce the Friars in both games this weekend.

Minutewomen drop season's final game

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team lost its final game of the regular season, 4-2, against Providence Saturday, ending its seven-game winning streak.

The non-conference loss was harmless, as it didn't affect UMass' No. 1 seed heading in the Atlantic 10 tournament this upcoming weekend.

The Minutewomen (14-4, 6-0 A-10) suffered just their second road loss of the season. The Friars took the game into overtime and Meghan Holden's goal gave them the win at the Friar Field Hockey and Lacrosse Complex.

UMass (12-8, 3-3 Big East) was not at full strength, having to rest two players with illnesses.

"Amy Novak and Jackie Tait were unable to play, so that pretty much reduced us to our 11 [players] who started for most of the game," UMass coach Justine Sowry said. "We only had one player come off the bench and, because it was a physical game, we weren't able to play our high-tempo style of play for the entire 70 minutes like we normally would."

Providence outshot UMass 17-12, including a 13-9 advantage in shots-on-goal. The Friars had the advantage of a deeper bench, while UMass was limited to only Kylie Jellie as a reserve.

The goal scoring went back and forth, with Providence scoring first. Nellie Poulin tipped in her team-leading 16th goal of the season on an assist from Ashlyn Hudson midway through the first half.

Late in the first half, Katelyn Orlando scored her conference-leading 14th goal of the season on an Erin Parker feed to even the score for UMass. Poulin tested UMass goalkeeper Alesha Widdall with two straight shots, both off of a penalty corner. Widdall saved both shots until another penalty corner was awarded to Providence.

Widdall blocked and saved the ensuing shot and rebound attempt, until Hudson took another rebound and flicked it past Widdall for her eighth goal of the season.

The Minutewomen gained another scoring opportunity when a Friar defender tripped sophomore forward Katie Kelly, giving UMass a penalty stroke.

Sophomore midfielder Makaela Potts took the first penalty stroke of her career and shot it past Providence goalkeeper Rachel Chamberlain.

With Tait out, Sowry switched Potts from starting midfielder to defender and gave Jill Powers the start at forward.

Although UMass had already clinched the No. 1 seed in the A-10 tournament, Sowry insisted that if the game were of more importance, both Novak and Tait still wouldn't have been healthy enough to play.

"I don't think either was ready to play," Sowry said. "The training staff and myself both made that decision that they both weren't going to play."

Potts' penalty goal tied the game, 2-2, and sent the game into overtime. Neither goalie saw more than two shots during the extra frame but the Friars didn't need more than that. On the second shot against Widdall, Hudson sent a pass across the circle to Holden for the winning goal.

Widdall finished the game with 10 saves and with the loss, moved her record to 11-4 on the season.

The Minutewomen travel next to Philadelphia, Pa., where they will face No. 4 seeded Temple in the first round. The winner will take on the either No. 2 Richmond (9-10, 5-1 A-10) or No. 3 Saint Joseph's (11-8, 3-3 A-10).

Rhode Island rammed

UMass linebacker Josh Jennings returns one of his two interceptions during Saturday's game against Rhode Island. Jennings returned one for a touchdown to help lead the Minutemen to a 49-0 shutout over the Rams Saturday in Kingston, R.I.

Jennings, defense shut out URI in blowout road victory

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

KINGSTON, R.I. — Keeping its playoff hopes alive isn't easy, but the No. 15 Massachusetts football team is turning it into a cake walk so far.

The Minutemen shutout Rhode Island Saturday at Meade Stadium, 49-0, taking over the game from the second play of scrimmage.

|---|---|
| URI | 0 |

Linebacker Josh Jennings intercepted a pass from URI quarterback Derek Cassidy, setting up UMass' (6-3, 3-2 Colonial Athletic Association) first touchdown drive. At the 5 minute, 20 second mark in the second quarter, Jennings picked off another pass and returned it 40 yards for a touchdown.

"They like to run 3-to-5 yard cross routes, I just looked at his eyes and read the play," Jennings said.

Five plays after Jennings' first interception, Tony Nelson scored the first of seven UMass touchdowns. Nelson glided through a right gap in the offensive line, skipped through a tackle and high-stepped into the end zone.

A large part of UMass' success was the pressure put on Cassidy all game. UMass defenders brought pressure from all sides of the quarterback, forcing him to scramble out of the pocket.

Cassidy was sacked eight times, twice by Darryln Fenner and intercepted twice, both by Jennings. Cassidy was 13-for-24 passing for 185 yards.

"Obviously, we tried not to get him a chance to breathe today," UMass coach Don Brown said of the game plan against Cassidy. "We certainly made his task difficult."

Led by Liam Coen, who was playing in his last game in his home state, the offense was successful on nearly every drive. It was so successful, that Brown was able to put in some reserves once again.

For the second game in a row, Coen commanded the Minutemen down the field with precision and consistency.

The senior was 15-for-17 passing, for 241 yards and three touchdowns. Coen hit his receiver's every time, with the two incompletions coming on dropped balls. When he was pressured,

Accolades, praise follow UMass quarterback

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

KINGSTON, R.I. — Last season against Rhode Island, Massachusetts quarterback Liam Coen could barely see his own receivers on the field, let alone his friends and family in the crowd.

But the Rhode Island native had little problem finding his receivers this time around, treating his contingency with a typical Coen-like performance and a 49-0 UMass victory over the Rams.

The URI defense probably hoped for the same horrendous weather that these teams played in last year. They sure could have used it. Coen was 15-for-17 passing, throwing for 241 yards and three touchdowns. Heavy rain and gusts of 50 miles-per-hour last season resulted in 22 yards and two interceptions through the air on 7-for-22 passing.

In a career full of memorable performances and record-breaking numbers, Saturday's game was extra-special for Coen.

"My dad was behind me so I sort of had to wave, give a little fist pump," Coen said, talking about the temptations of acknowledging his friends and family in the stands.

Both coaches acknowledged his accomplishments on the field after the game.

"I have a hunch that he's going to get the chance to play beyond this year," UMass coach Don Brown said. "He's going to leave behind a great legacy but, more importantly, great character."

"I got nothing but great things to say about him," said Rhode Island coach Darren Rizzi, who recruited Coen to play at Rutgers. "He plays like a coach's son. He manages what they do, he's efficient and the ball is on the money. He's just a fantastic player."

Coen, who holds nearly every single-season and career record at UMass, nearly added another one Saturday. His 88.2 completion percentage against the Rams was just shy of Tim Day's 89.4 set back in 2004.

"You and Tim Day can have that yuck-fest when you're in arguments," Brown joked during the postgame press conference with Coen sitting right next to him. "He was special today and I'll also add less than 100 percent."

Entering 2008, only one active quarterback in the entire country has thrown for more touchdown passes than Coen – Texas Tech's Graham Harrell. But not even Harrell had a better passing efficiency than Coen's 151.88.

That number is on pace to go up even higher, as the senior quarterback has 19 touchdown passes and 2,259 yards for a rating of 163.82 this season. In the last two games, Coen has 630 yards and eight touchdown passes on 26-of-35 passing. That came in a little over four quarters of football, as Coen was taken out of both games early in the second half.

"He was mad at me when I took him out," Brown said after

Minutemen pick up conference wins

Simmons leads UM past Rams, Explorers in A-10

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Take two parts hard work, one part good goalkeeping, mix in a deep bench, add a pinch of luck and you get the recipe for a six-game unbeaten streak.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team picked up road victories over conference foes La Salle, 2-0, Friday and Fordham, 2-1, Sunday.

It took a combination of strong play and timely luck to stay unbeaten in conference play after losing the Atlantic 10 opener to Rhode Island back on Oct. 12. The wins put the Minutemen in a three-way tie for first place with Dayton and Temple.

UMass (7-6-2, 5-1-1 A-10) received excellent performances from several key players, most notably sophomore midfielder Ben Arikian who had a goal and an assist over the weekend.

"He is very difficult for the opposing teams to play, he is a big part of the engine in the midfield that makes our team go," UMass coach Sam Koch said.

For the first 40 minutes, The Rams (8-7-1 4-2-1 A-10) and the Minutemen played to a virtual standstill with neither side gaining an edge. The only major chance came 24 minutes in, when Ram forward Grant Kerr's shot hit the crosshar and the chance gave the Minutemen a scare, but no damage was done.

It appeared that both sides would enter halftime scoreless. However, with 3 minutes remaining in the first half, the Rams committed a major blunder when Fordham defenseman Steve Woicik headed a kick by Arikian into his own net. UMass caught a huge break to take a 1-0 lead going into the half.

"We went up because it went off their players head. It was a good goal for us, a tough break for them, but I think [our pressure] helped make it happen," Koch said.

Seven minutes into the second half, the Minutemen went up 2-0 as they got a goal from an unlikely source. Sophomore

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — The Massachusetts hockey team overwhelmed Providence twice this weekend, extending its unbeaten streak to five games and making a statement to the rest of the Hockey East.

UMass exploded for 14 goals in two victories over the Friars, a 9-4 home win Friday and a 4-1 victory Saturday in Providence.

James Marcou led the way for the Minutemen (4-1-1, 2-0-1 HEA) in the home opener Friday, netting two goals and three assists, leading the Minutemen to the 9-4 win.

Early in the first period, UMass found itself down 2-0 and seemingly off-balance in front of a once-enthusiastic crowd.

But the Minutemen stormed back scoring three straight goals.

On the power play, Justin Braun entered the Providence zone with a slap shot that deflected off Friar goaltender Chris Mannix's right pad, into the center slot where Chris Davis was stationed. Davis backhanded the puck through Mannix's legs for the power play goal.

"It was important, we got off to a fast start," Davis said of his goal. "Getting that first shot and the first goal was really big for us."

Four minutes later, again on the power play, UMass would register its second goal.

Marcou and Quirk started the Cory Quirk, Marcou and Alex Berry tallied 11 points on the night and 19 total on the weekend.

"They seem unselfish, they have a nice compliment of skills there that add up in them scoring goals," UMass coach Don Cahoon said after Saturday night's win.

The Minutemen opened the scoring in Saturday's contest at the 4 minute, 39 second mark in the second period.

Sophomore winger James Marcou had three goals and five assists in two games against Providence this weekend. In Friday's 9-4 win at the Mullins Center, he scored two goals and assisted on three others.

Atwood to be Troy Lecturer

BY LISA DEBENEDICTIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

World-renowned writer and poet, Margaret Atwood, will be speaking at the University of Massachusetts on Thursday, Nov. 6, in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall.

Atwood's lecture will be presented as this year's Troy Lecture on the Humanities and Public Life, in honor of the late Frederick S. Troy. He was a professor emeritus of English, an honorary professor of the University, as well as a former trustee.

"There was a fund established through one of our retired members that is used to bring outstanding writer and critics to campus," said Meg Caulsari, Secretary of the English Department. "The Troy Committee gathers a list of names that they would like to speak and Margaret Atwood has been on that list for a while."

The first Troy Lecture at UMass was in 1987, and the committee has tried to have one every year, but it has not always been possible. The last writer to speak was Salman Rushdie, in 2006.

"The point of the Troy Lecture is to bring to the campus a writer who is internationally acclaimed — and certainly Margaret Atwood fits that description, and we are delighted that she agreed to come," said Professor Joe Bartolomeo, Chair of the English Department. "The lecture is not necessarily every year, depending on speaker's availability. We were hoping to get Margaret Atwood last year, but were definitely willing to wait a year."

Atwood's talk, "A Precision of Language: An Evening with Margaret Atwood" will begin at 4:30 p.m., with doors opening at 4 p.m. The event is free and open to the public.

"She doesn't do this sort of thing very often and we are very grateful that she is coming," added Bartolomeo.

Prior to Atwood's speech, several students will also have the opportunity to meet with her.

"[Atwood] is going to be spending an hour before the Troy Lecture with UMass students. They are going to be talking with her and asking questions. We selected some undergraduate and graduate students from the English Department," explained Bartolomeo.

Perhaps best known for such novels as "The Blind Assassin," "A Handmaid's Tale" and "The Edible Woman," Atwood has also written numerous poetic works, short stories, critical studies, screenplays, radio scripts and children's books. She is one of Canada's most prominent contemporary authors, and the recipient of many prestigious awards, such as the Booker Prize, The Sunday Times Award for Literary Excellence, the Giller Prize, the Governor's General Award, the Dashiell Hammett Award and the Prince of Asturias Award for Letters, among others.

"I'm really excited about Margaret Atwood's lecture this week and encourage everyone to come," said UMass senior and Co-President of the UMass English Society, Jen O'Brien. "It will be refreshing to hear the voice of a strong female writer and activist on campus. I have a feeling though, that after the election her lecture will take on a whole new meaning."

SGA offers voter transport

Free bus rides will be given to UMass students voting locally

BY MICHAEL FOX
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Free transport will be offered for students from campus to polling locations around Amherst today, marking the end of a massive voter education effort on behalf of the Student Government Association this semester.

The SGA, along with the Center for Educational Policy Advocacy and the UMass Labor Coalition registered about 1,000 new voters for this year's election.

Their efforts, combined with a larger organization of UMass groups have resulted in the registration of over 3,000 new voters.

The voter registration effort marks the end of a election season that has seen a drastic increase in the amount of involvement by today's youth.

Secretary of Public Policy and Relations Joe Mirkin stated, "We hope that the education we've provided to the campus about the election and voting procedures will serve to increase voter turnout and encourage informed voting."

In past years, polls have been available on campus for students who were registered to vote in Amherst, but they were eliminated from this year's budget, having cost around $50,000 in the past.

This year, the SGA, along with the University Democrats and UMass Field Trip Services has organized a shuttle service running from in front of the campus center to the three polling locations in Amherst where students who live on campus vote.

The buses will stop at the Immanuel Lutheran Church for students who live in North, Northeast, Sylvan, and the North Apartments, the Wildwood Elementary School for those in Orchard Hill and Central, and the Amherst Bangs Community Center for students who live in Southwest.

The service will run from 7:00 a.m. until 8:30 p.m. every 20 to 40 minutes.

Tonight the SGA and CLPA are also cosponsoring the "Choose or Lose Jamboree" along with the participation of over 20 student groups.

There will be coverage of the election, food provided by Earthfoods and People's Market, and a round-table political discussion. The event runs from 7 p.m. to 2 a.m.

A new kind of eating disorder

BY HEATHER MAES
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Today's culture wants what is most convenient, which includes instant gratification. Food in particular can affect society.

Every problem can be fixed by a Twinkie or three. Healthy eating is difficult in an unhealthy world. But on the other end of the spectrum, too much healthy eating can have just as many harmful affects as the three Twinkies.

Orthorexia nervosa, a term freshly coined by health nutritionist Stephen Bratman, is an obsession with healthy eating. It is a unique eating disorder that separates it from other well-known eating disorders, such as anorexia nervosa and bulimia nervosa. Those with orthorexia are concerned with food quality, not quantity, and score for purity rather than weight loss.

They may cook their own meals, spend many hours in health food stores trying to find the best products for themselves and bring their own specially prepared food to social events or avoid them altogether.

What also separates orthorexics from their counterparts is that while anorexia and bulimia is usually something kept under secrecy and shame, orthorexia is flaunted like a green banner. Nobody disputes the nutrition of eating healthy considering it's what dieticians, celebrities, health magazines, health books and health television shows all promote.

Most orthorexics would not even consider that they have an eating disorder, but eating too healthy can have its downside.

Stephen Bratman, a holistic physician, was the first to coin the phrase "orthorexia nervosa" (a better name than his first choice, "cupiditas cibi salubrum" or "craving for healthy food.") In his book "Health Food Junkies," he describes the social, physical, emotional and psychological effects of orthorexia nervosa, along with relating his own experience with his health food obsession.

The problem is that eating less can transition into not eating at all. The same can be said for orthorexia nervosa, where eating healthy can be taken to an extreme.

While the orthorexic is eating healthy, and his or her selected foods are, in fact, healthy, they are forgoing a balance that is an important part of their diet.

Orthorexia has many shapes and forms. Many orthorexics construct their own diet based on their own nutritional knowledge. However, many orthorexics initially base their food choices upon well-known diets or lifestyle changes.

There is the macrobiotic diet, with rules and restrictions that deal with the yin and yang of various foods. Whole grains make up 50 to 60 percent of the diet, as well as smaller percentages of soup, vegetables and beans.

There is also veganism, for those people who specifically want to stop the suffering the animals through personal actions. It is more of a lifestyle than a diet, since it affects not only food but clothing as well. According to Vegan Action, veganism is, "someone who, for various reasons, chooses to avoid using or consuming animal products. While vegetarians choose not to use flesh foods, vegans also avoid dairy and eggs, as well as fur, leather, wool, down and cosmetics or chemical products tested on animals."

Their mission statement is, according to the same organization, also an "integral component of a cruelty-free lifestyle. Living vegan provides numerous benefits to animals' lives, to the environment, and to our own health through a healthy diet and lifestyle."

There is also a step further than veganism: fruitarianism, or the raw fruit diet. Though there is no lifestyle involved per say (its name says it all: eat fruit), it is based on the ideals of not hurting any living thing, whether it is a plant or animal.

These diets indeed provide alternatives to achieve a balanced diet, but what orthorexics may miss is that no food is just good, and no food is just bad. All foods, whether it is meat, dairy, fruit, vegetables and even the much condemned sweets, have both positive and negative qualities.

The challenges of UM's OIT

BY KAITLYN SILVA
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

On Thursday, Sept. 25, the Office of Information Technologies (OIT) staff awaited the integration of the new UMail Web interface onto the University of Massachusetts Web site.

The interface went up at 8 a.m. only to crash shortly thereafter due to an OIT server overload.

According to the Chief Information Officer of OIT, John Dubach, the staff returned the UMail interface to a Beta testing environment in the hopes of discovering what caused it to fail.

"It remains a bit of a mystery as to why the problem didn't surface in testing before it was moved into production," Dubach said. "But, presumably, when they figure out how to make it fail in the test environment, they'll be able to resolve that mystery."

Finding the safest way to introduce new technology, albeit through a process of trial and error, is a constant challenge faced by the Office of Internet Technologies, a department in which the failure of one small detail could lead to catastrophe for the entire campus community.

The UMail crash is just one example of the challenges OIT faces in an ever-changing technological environment where simply keeping network systems running is not enough.

During the major SPIRE upgrades of 2005 and 2007, the Academic Computing Support Organization (ACSO) dealt with an unstable system that often crashed.

"We weren't aware that the system – as going to have major performance problems and the system was down a lot because it just couldn't handle the load," said Heidi Dollard, director of ACSO.

Another challenge they face is keeping up with the emerging technologies and figuring out which ones are gaining the most speed.

"I guess a big part of it is trying to do what the faculty tells us they want and part of it is anticipating things," said Tony Sindelar, the coordinator of Instructional Design and Faculty Support, which offers faculty workshops on several technologies.

"We know more and more people want to use things and we try to anticipate what they want to hear about. Part of it is just doing stuff and seeing who turns up," Sindelar said.

"I think the trick question is how we will keep up with the technology being used by young people," Dubach said. "We have to sort through all of the new technologies out there and decide what will be useful for us to invest in and what we can more or less disregard."

Through the faculty workshops, OIT plays a large part in introducing technology into the classroom by teaching professors and graduate Teacher's Assistants about these tools.

"We track what workshops we do, how many faculty are there, and we look at that and we're constantly comparing what are people signing up for and what are they not signing up for," said Copper Giloth, director of the Academic Computing department.

Academic Computing has kept track of every technology workshop or one-on-one consultation by the professor's name, academic department and the technology topic discussed, according to Giloth.

Though OIT has been working on more technological features around the campus, John Dubach said the department has not seen an exponential budget increase in recent years.

Despite the OIT budget increase from roughly $8 million in fiscal year 2005 to $10 million in 2008, Dubach said that the increase only came in lieu of new OIT programs.

"I think if you compare us

Budget, copyright challenges faced

to comparable national institutions, because I've seen the documentation on these things, we don't get as much money per student," he said.

In recent years, UMass moved AIMS (Academic Instructional Media Services) and the Center for Educational Software Development out of other departments and into OIT. "This was a budget transfer of something like $600,000 to $800,000," Dubach said.

According to Dubach, at least three new initiatives began between 2005 and 2008, including a document-imaging project, which puts university data and records on the web, and the operating costs of the Learning Commons.

"OIT received new budget allocations, probably somewhere in the $100,000-$200,000 range for each of those three new efforts," he said.

Kevin Skelly, manager of the Software Support division of Help Services, believes that a better budget would more adequately serve Help Services' needs.

"It's the fact that there's so many of them and so few of us," he said.

In the Help Services department, Help Desk Manager Andrew Vernon deals with the daunting challenges of online downloading and piracy.

"There's an enormous problem with copyright on campus," Vernon said. "This fall has been great because we've only gotten about 20 copyright complaints. Typically, we get between 1,000 and 1,500 complaints through federal communications."

"Our group deals with the human reality here: talking to the human who is accused of committing the crime," Vernon said.

On the other side of the copyright conflict, the Network Systems and Services department must respond to requests for student information from the Recording Industry Association of America.

According to Skelly, the Fair Information Practices Act enacted in 2007 has complicated these interventions because so many students work in Help Services.

"We can't expose student employees to certain information about the student clients coming in," Skelly said. "We have to remove certain pieces of information that had been visible, like student ID numbers and their phone numbers."

"I think this is something new historically because society has never been changing at the rate that it is now, particularly the information technologies aspect, which is the leading edge of the society that's changing the most rapidly," Skelly said. "Here we are in the middle of it."

Obama, McCain make final pleas to voters

BY DAVID LIGHTMAN, MARGARET TALEV AND WILLIAM DOUGLAS
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

WASHINGTON — Democrat Barack Obama, says he felt "peaceful" as polls found him poised to win election Tuesday as the nation's next president and to become the first African-American to win the office -battled John McCain across crucial swing states Monday as both candidates made last-ditch bids for support.

A record turnout was expected to pick the 44th president of the United States, with Republican McCain trying to pull off what would arguably be the biggest presidential upset since Harry S Truman beat Thomas Dewey 60 years ago.

As they dueled across Florida, Virginia and other battleground states, Obama alternated between being cocky and cautious, while McCain was feisty and eager to fight.

Obama's day turned somber in the afternoon, though, as he got word that his grandmother Madelyn Dunham had died. He'd interrupted his campaign late last month for a final visit with Dunham, who'd raised him, in Hawaii.

"She was the cornerstone of our family, and a woman of extraordinary accomplishment, strength and humility. She was the person who encouraged and allowed us to take chances," Obama said in a joint statement with his half-sister, Maya Soetoro-Ng.

Obama, like McCain, spent most of Monday campaigning on familiar themes. McCain pledged to keep taxes low; Obama said he would change Bush administration policies on the economy and the Iraq war.

We are one day away from changing the United States of America," Obama told a crowd of about 9,100 at Jacksonville's Veterans Memorial Arena.

McCain was on the other side of the too-close-to-call state, trying to win its 27 electoral votes by starting a 20-hour, seven-state sprint in Tampa.

The presidential race between Republican Senator John McCain and Democratic Senator Barack Obama finally comes to an end today.

Though his talk drew only about 1,100 people -far fewer than he'd attracted at a midnight rally in Miami- the Arizona senator was pumped up by his morning reception.

"One day left, just one day left before we take America in a new direction, my friends. We need your help, we need your help and we will win," he said.

Florida was the biggest swing-state prize. However, it was a measure of Obama's strength that states such as Indiana and Virginia, which haven't given their electoral votes to a Democrat since 1964, and North Carolina, which last went Democratic in 1976, also were getting lots of last-minute attention.

Nationally, the Illinois senator had a 7.4 percentage-point lead, according to an average of 13 surveys taken in the past week, according to RealClearPolitics.com.

Part of Obama's strength is his ability to attract larger-than-average turnouts of younger and African-American voters as he bids to become the first Democrat since Jimmy Carter in 1976 to win more than 50 percent of the popular vote. (Bill Clinton's two victories split votes among three major candidates, including independent Ross Perot.)

Curtis Gans, the director of the Center for the Study of the American Electorate, predicted that as many as 135 million people, 64.8 percent of those eligible, could cast ballots in this election. That would be the best showing since 1960's 67 percent turnout. In 2004, turnout was 60.6 percent.

Thousands already have voted early, and polls indicate that Obama has benefited most.

A Diageo-Hotline poll released Monday found that 27 percent of likely voters already had cast ballots in 30 states, with Obama gaining a 51-46 percent edge among them.

A 'Facebook Effect' on voters

BY MICHELLE SULLIVAN
THE LANTERN, (OHIO STATE U.)

COLUMBUS, OHIO — Ohio college students have used mainly the Internet and its social networks this election season to learn about the presidential candidates and promote their favorites, according to a poll by CBS News, UWIRE and the Chronicle of Higher Education.

Students were surveyed in the swing states of Ohio, Pennsylvania, North Carolina and Colorado. Those who reported using the Internet to network and obtain election information were more likely to say they will definitely vote, are more enthusiastic about their candidate and are less likely to change their mind before Tuesday's election than students who do not use online social networks.

These results support the idea of the "Facebook Effect," as Newsweek calls it. Social networking sites have increased youth mobilization this election season by creating a way for students to share and access campaign information and support candidates.

" Part of this is driven by the generational divide in how we consume political information on a daily basis," said Erik Nisbet, assistant professor of communication and liaison for the study, in an e-mail.

Fifty-eight percent of students polled in Ohio reported accessing the Internet every day for election news and information. Printed newspapers serve as a daily source of political information for just 15 percent. Nearly that many say they visit online blogs and Web sites such as Facebook and MySpace every day to read and share election information.

Sixty-six percent of students surveyed in Ohio reported accessing YouTube for election videos and information.

The use of social Web sites does vary between students who support Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama and those who support Republican presidential candidate John McCain, according to poll results from all four states.

Students who prefer Obama were more likely to have reported visiting the candidate's Web site, visiting the candidate's Facebook or MySpace page, signing up as a fan of the candidate or joining a group supporting the candidate on Facebook or MySpace than students who prefer McCain.

Though most prominent, the Internet is not the only way students are discussing candidates and issues. More than 50 percent of students in Ohio, including students at Ohio State's Newark campus, say they participate in political discussions within the classroom one or more times a week.

Oddly, this is not the case for ONU students in Columbus. Just 40 percent reported political classroom discussions one or more times a week.

Slanting away from ignorance

Ben Rudnick

By the time this is published, it will be Election Day, so it would probably be a waste of column-inches to try to convince anyone to mark their ballot one way or another. Rather, I want to expound on what I think is a more important issue.

The biggest problem I see nowadays is how many people are only listening to one side or the other. There is no such thing as an "unbiased" news source. If you want to know enough to make an informed decision on an issue, you need to actively seek out the opinions of those with whom you disagree. Letting John Stewart, or Keith Olbermann, or Sean Hannity tell you what the other guys think is not good enough.

It can be hard work getting information from both sides of the debate. In any given week I read The New York Times, The Boston Globe, The Politico, but also National Review Online, Investor's Business Daily and the Drudge Report.

I garner opinions from the left, such as David Broder, Maureen Dowd and Paul Krugman, but I also read George Will, David Brooks, Charles Krauthammer and especially Thomas Sowell. On TV I watch CNN, Fox News and CSPAN. As far as I am concerned, if you don't read or hear or see something that pisses you off at least once a day, you are not paying close enough attention.

You don't have to do as I do, necessarily. One right we clearly still have in this country is the right to ignore what is going on around us if we so choose. I would hope that those reading this are doing so because they want to be engaged in the process, but if you have no real desire to be thoroughly informed then that is your prerogative.

You also have the right to only listen to those in the media with whom you agree. I know how comforting that can be – to feel like they agree with you on everything.

Close-mindedness, insults and slanted information may end a debate, but never confuse that with winning one.

I used to do it myself during the Clinton Administration. But don't delude yourself into thinking that one side or the other is always right.

However, if you want to be a part of the solution and really understand the many disagreements we have on the issues, then I challenge you to expose yourself to opposing views. You will be amazed how much easier it is to find common ground if you actually take the time to listen to those on the other side instead of dismissing or even insulting them.

Think of it this way, if you make the effort to listen to what the other side is saying and they refuse to show you the same courtesy then they are the ignorant ones. Democracy is about trying your hardest to convince those who disagree to adopt your position, but being willing to listen as they try to do the same with you.

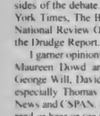
Close-mindedness, insults and slanted information may end a debate, but never confuse that with winning one.

In the coming months, I will endeavor to highlight information that you may not have been aware of, and bring up points of view that might get you to say: "I hadn't thought of it that way," about some issue or other. In the meantime, I will leave you with just a few facts about the hot topic of taxes that some of you may not have realized.

We have all heard over the course of this campaign how the across-the-board tax cuts enacted by the Bush Administration are responsible for the massive deficits we now face. However, would it surprise anyone to learn that since those cuts went into effect in 2003 tax revenues have gone up by almost 37 percent?

What about the "rich" getting all the benefit and not paying their "fair" share? Does it shock you to learn that the percentage share of income taxes paid by the top 5 percent of income earners has gone from a bit over 54 percent in 2003 to over 60 percent in 2006? How about the fact that their percentage share of all the income earned in 2006 was only about 36 percent?

This may be a simplistic way of looking at the issue of taxes, and there is no doubt that too many in the middle and lower class were not benefitting from the economy even before our recent financial meltdown.



The point is not that this proves the tax cuts were a good idea, but that the issue is almost never as simple as either side would have you believe.

The best thing you can do to arm yourself against ignorance is to do your own research. It took me fewer than 15 minutes to find this data, so don't take any one person's word when they try to tell you what to think.

Check it out for yourself, and if you really want to be fair, take some time to learn what the other side thinks while you are at it. The only thing you have to fear is that you might learn something.

Policing the police

Tina Ortiz

The University of Massachusetts Police Department Web site claims that it is "dedicated to ensuring that all members of our community live, work and learn on campus without concerns about safety." Unfortunately, officer conduct has strayed alarmingly far from this ideal for a while. I hope the UMPD sees its recent reassignment to the Department of Administration and Finance as an opportunity to improve its numerous inadequacies.

The Chancellor called for the reassignment in attempts to broaden the community in which the department protects to include not only students but also faculty and staff. UMass Amherst, in recent years, has placed notoriously high on lists ranking the nation's most violent campuses.

It's clear that our mini-metropolis is the site for a substantial amount of violence. So why, if there are legitimate crimes taking place on campus, are officers more focused on pinning people with expensive traffic citations?

Not stopping for someone in a crosswalk is an offense that carries a $200 fine, and yet I don't even feel safe walking home from the library at night.

Every student is financially spoken for here. No one goes to school for free, whether it's through scholarships or financial aid. The University above all things – even education – is a business. The fundamental purpose of a police force should not be to bring in revenue, but to maintain general public safety.

Now, if an officer sets out on patrol with the goal of writing tickets first and public safety somewhere second, it's clear that in doing so he blinds himself to real crime and allows a frightening change in his own behavior.

As a society, we understand that being a police officer is dangerous work. We give officers some authority to use at their own reasonable digression when enforcing laws that protect us all.

It's my right and civic obligation to question when that authority is being abused.

I feel that anyone who works to protect the greater good for a living is brave, but police brutality is an ugly reality in many communities. The police are here on this campus to protect, first and foremost. So the safety of a person waiting for a bus late at night should come before pulling someone over for a rolling stop.

A simple traffic violation can put you hundreds of dollars in the hole, and yet while waiting at a crosswalk I've seen cruisers bomb down Massachusetts Avenue doing at least 60 miles per hour. Invasive and disrespectful questioning is standard procedure for police officers on campus.

If you're frightened and worried about police presence in the first place then you're less likely to protect your own personal rights.

My 21-year-old friend was stopped and immediately told to "hand over your ID sit the fuck down on the curb, and shut up" last semester as he tried to bring alcohol back to his room in Southwest, a harmless action.

As I watched the officers prey on him, their aggression seemed to be driven from a place of cowardice not unlike that of over zealous hall monitors.

Time spent harassing a 21-year-old about alcohol, while someone could be in serious danger, is time wasted. Seeing those blue lights distracts me from the road and impairs my driving abilities to a significant degree.

Officers deserve respect and I'm sure that it's rare when they get the proper amount of it from the student body. But if the police helped me more than they targeted me, my perspective of them would be different. But they don't. So, it isn't.

If you're frightened and worried about police presence in the first place then you're less likely to protect your own personal rights. Every officer knows this and capitalizes on that ignorance as a means of getting you to incriminate yourself. Asking if you have the legal right to willfully deny any request without legal penalty can diffuse many situations, so know your rights and know them well.

Increased police presence means only increased surveillance on this campus. With Question 2 on the ballot, the UMPD is frantically rounding up as many stoners as they can. A recent article in High Times magazine reported that over 48 million Americans admitted to being habitual pot smokers.

Without even taking into account those stoners in denial, it's time that police forces nation wide focus on convicting and preventing violent crimes, you know, the ones that pose legitimate threats to public safety. This isn't to say I want weed to be legalized. If the best pot was grown on American soil then believe me, it would be legal. Until then, Uncle Sam better keep his grubby little paws out of my zip lock baggy.

The moral panic generated by the War on Drugs has not only caused police to waste time and public money, but also caused them to fall from the good graces of the public.

While I won't claim that all officers abuse their authority, I will say many policemen and women forget that they are just that, men and women. The badge represents a brave commitment to the public, and by no means puts you above the law. Fiscal inefficiency is an ugly habit that many public Universities can't seem to shake and it infects virtually all aspects of administration here.

A police department more invested in harassing people out of its money than preserving their safety is making a wasteful mistake, with dangerous consequences.

A record worth voting for

Greg Collins

Why should you support John McCain for president? Just look at his record.

In terms of Iraq, McCain advocated for the troop surge before it became popular even among Republicans. McCain pushed for more funding for our troops even as both Democrats and Republicans considered establishing strict withdrawal dates and funding restrictions.

If McCain had followed these suggestions, American troops and innocent Iraqis would have been put in danger by this implicit incentive structure that would have encouraged Shia militias and al-Qaeda terrorists to flood Iraq during the withdrawal.

Yes, McCain did vote for military intervention in Iraq. But given the surrounding circumstances at the time, in which the international community wholeheartedly believed Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction and was intent on using them to destabilize the Middle East, McCain's support for the Iraq War reflected less on his poor judgment and more on Hussein's malevolent ability to systematically deceive the international community.

Yet on the whole, if you are wondering if McCain will uphold his campaign proposals to make responsible decisions in regard to Iraq, all you have to is look at his record.

McCain has also recognized the importance of strengthening American allies around the world which are threatened by America's adversaries. He has a history of supporting the expansion of NATO to thwart post-Soviet Russia. He voted against legislation limiting NATO expansion only to Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic. He sponsored a bill limiting Russia's participation in the G-8.

Most recently, he voted to push for Ukraine and Georgia to enter NATO. Unlike Obama, who called on both Russia and Georgia to suspend military activity after violence broke out, McCain immediately and explicitly called for American support for Georgia, realizing that emboldening Russia could further destabilize an already dangerous international system.

Yet McCain is not a blind hawk, for he also recognizes the limited constraints of an American military presence around the world. He voted against legislation backed by Ronald Reagan that would have kept U.S. Marines in Lebanon in 1983.

You may be wondering what an Obama presidency would mean for the United States. Fortunately, you know what you are getting with John McCain.

If you are wondering whether McCain will uphold his campaign calls to strengthen America's ties with key allies and stand up to America's adversaries, all you have to do is look at his record.

If McCain's past record relating to domestic concerns is any indication, his economic policies will help Americans overcome the current economic instability more than Obama's. His past support for low or no taxes on a number of key fiscal issues suggests that he will not arbitrarily distribute wealth to where he deems fit, contrary to Obama's philosophy.

McCain voted to extend tax cuts on capital gains dividends, to repeal the estate tax, and to end the alternative minimum tax. He has supported ending the wasteful pork barrel projects in Congress which directs federal taxpayer money to local districts with little accountability for how this money is used.

If you are wondering whether McCain will uphold his campaign promises to help stimulate the economy, all you have to do is look at his record.

While Obama supports forcing Americans to give money to rich politicians to disperse themselves, McCain has a track record of supporting initiatives which give people more freedom to decide how to use their own money. He voted yes to allow personal retirement accounts for Social Security.

He voted against preventing medical savings accounts, and voted for a tax deduction for long-term care insurance. McCain's current health care plan would encourage an easier transfer of health care coverage from state-to-state. If you wonder whether McCain will make good on his promises to enable people to use their own money for health care and Social Security, all you have to do is look at his record.

Furthermore, McCain has a track record of supporting free trade with Singapore, Chile, China and Japan. He supports NAFTA and CAFTA. If you wonder whether McCain will follow through with his calls to establish better trade relations with Colombia, all you have to do is look at his record.

You may be wondering what an Obama presidency would mean for the United States. Fortunately, you know what you are getting with John McCain. Low taxes, free trade and accessible health care. A secure Iraq, a stronger NATO, and a formidable national defense. Wisdom, judgment and experience.

Don't believe me? Just look at his record.

Take action in and out of the polls

Eli Gottlieb

Today is Election Day and today we will see if we are saved or damned. However, the actual result of the election matters much less to our individual and collective futures than whether we continue the behavior that brought us here in the first place.

No candidate for any office can save us from this. The problem arises only in small part from government policy after all – and mostly from culture. Given that government in a democratic society arises from culture rather than dictating it, the government really can't do much about this problem.

Oh, you think, a lecture? Yes, a lecture. Americans have been spending years or even decades living in a manner that brought the current economic crisis upon us, regardless of political administration. The seed was planted in the Clinton era and brought to fruition by the policies of the Bush era.

Americans have – for too long – utterly failed to live within their means. I find it detestable for how long people have ignored their grandparents' most basic fiscal advice: only spend the money you actually have. The average personal debt is up.

The national debt is many times up. The average savings rate is many times down. The governmental deficit is many times up and the government has poured money that will apparently come from nowhere – leading to fears of inflation – into investment banks that have bankrupted themselves giving loans to people who could never pay them back.

For how long can we continue to use things we do not own and spend money we do not possess?

Now I admit that most of us college students have student loans. That's at least somewhat justifiable. Taking the loans and getting a good education multiplies our lifetime earning potential many, many times.

However, some professions really shouldn't even require a college education. I hate to invoke his name, but does Joe the Plumber actually need a university diploma's worth of knowledge to run his prized plumbing business? Should a talented, personable and young person who wants to manage a hotel have a degree?

And, of course, some purchases are absolutely mandatory. UMass forces us to purchase its housing and meal plans. Meal plans seem to be a fairly good deal. On the other hand, when I figured out the numbers on housing, I found that for the per-month "rent" I pay on half of a two-person dorm room – a room with only the most widely shared living-room and kitchen facilities – I could also pay for a whole bedroom to myself in an apartment that I would share with a number of flatmates I can count on one hand.

However, I simply cannot understand some of the expenses I see my fellow students spending their money on given the ubiquity of our debts, for example, automobiles.

Automobiles are not just a way for the indebted college student to damage the environment while providing transportation into Northampton. They are an expense most of us don't even need.

Unless a person wishes to go to late-evening entertainment at a pub, nightclub or concert hall, they really don't need a car in this area while the PVTA operates. In many of those cases, they really should take the bus rather than drink and drive.

Oh, and let's talk credit cards. Does anyone in college right now remember the old days of actual usury laws? There was once a limit on the interest rates firms could charge you for credit and limits on the fees they could impose for moral failures on the costumer's part, like having a bill arrive late due to the postal service blocking up.

I really shouldn't just criticize college students. Everyone seems to spend money they don't have nowadays. If they didn't, why would a decent house in New Jersey or California cost nearly a million dollars? I know some people who make very good money working in law firms or finance, but unless you're stinking rich or driving yourself into debt you probably can't afford those.

If you don't vote, by the way, the Democracy Duck won't give you any candy and the Fascism Fiend will stick needles in you while you sleep.

However, older people certainly have more money than us young folks. An analysis piece done by USA Today last year found that class at birth, race, national origin and creed no longer correlate to the income or net worth of an American citizen as well as age.

It appears we've entered an age of unprecedented wealth for the not-quite-retired Baby Boom generation while everyone else carries debt. Of course, with the economic bust this year even that has most likely changed.

Let's hope that today, as everyone goes to vote (if you don't vote, by the way, the Democracy Duck won't give you any candy and the Fascism Fiend will stick needles in you while you sleep), everyone also goes to think about how they can return to the economically sustainable lives of our forefathers – making things people need that people can buy with money they really have.

A queer community

Locals gather to share education, experience

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Staff

Last Thursday, Oct. 30, after the registers closed and the lights were dimmed, a peculiar crowd began to gather at Food for Thought Books in Amherst.

Men and women of all ages from around the valley and across the country packed into the tiny shop, hearing slogans and discussing the issues of the night. They represented every race and gender, a diverse community to be sure, but they were all bonded tightly by the common aspect of being queer.

Many people in this politically correct world may be wary or even taken aback by the word "queer," and for good reason. It has been used in the past to chastise those who were different, to label individuals who were not accepted throughout much of society.

Within the gay community, however, it has taken on a decidedly different tone. Instead of putting up walls, the term is now being used by many to break those barriers down. It does away with what is seen as unimportant delineations and combines gays, lesbians, transsexuals, bisexuals, questioning youth and their allies into one big queer community.

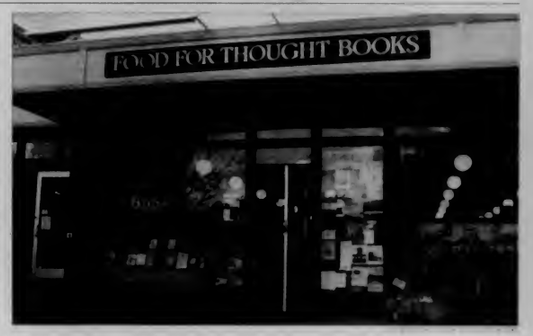
The purpose of the evening was to screen several short films produced by the Supa-Friends, a queer media group based in New York City. They are a local branch of the Global Action Project, a worldwide media organization dedicated to fighting injustice.

The goal of GAP is to provide today's youth, especially those who are on the receiving end of social injustice, with the skills, tools, and connections needed to produce thought-provoking media and raise awareness for their causes.

Before the screening, the GAP members asked a few questions of the audience to find out "where everyone is coming from." The questions focused on the challenges of the gay lifestyle, and it was evident that many present had been victims of discrimination and hate.

"The main purpose of the films is to show the different identities that we as queer people have, and to raise awareness about the different issues that exist in the queer community," said Corina Liu, a GAP member.

The first film, titled "Supa-Friends: The Movie" was a lighthearted take on the different personalities in the group, and its efforts to save the world from intolerance and homophobia. Using its awesome powers, the superhero team freed a teenage girl who was "trapped in the closet."



The second piece, titled "Letting Go and Rising Up" was a look at "bathroom politics." It followed a gender-confused individual in her very personal struggle to find a public bathroom.

While this may seem like a minor problem to some, the film successfully showed that the small bit of comfort that comes from finding a restroom can go a long way.

"We tried to go a little bit broader, branching out to issues of gender and not just sexuality," said Sarah Rochelle, one of the films' creators.

The final piece was the most unusual. "Three Queer Mice" was an animated short which started off as a colorful spoof of the classic children's song.

As the film progressed, however, it took a much darker turn. The three titular characters, all based on real people, are stomped upon by society to an increasing degree, ending with the murder of one poor, lesbian mouse.

Pioneer Valley locals rallied together in support of the queer community at Food For Thought bookstore last Thursday night. Guests watched documentaries made by "Supa-Friends" among other short films.

Although the films were produced by GAP, the evening was sponsored by another gay activist group, Project Quest.

Quest, which stands for Queer Empowerment through Solidarity and Truth, is a local organization which supports queer rights, but also focuses specifically on liberation.

"We educate ourselves and educate others on how the prison-industrial complex impacts queer youth," said Chino, a long-time member. "We do a lot of stand-outs, a lot of marches ... we have a workshop set up to help educate people and we are working on another workshop."

Several groups were represented throughout the evening, and although each came from a different place with a different point of view, their goals seemed to be the same.

Everyone gathered there, be they strangers or friends, black or white, was united by the same cause of acceptance and equality. They were bonded by adversity in a way that most people will never know, into something more than a simple bookstore gathering.

They were a community, a vibrant and loving people, and that is something to stand up for.

Hindu Diwali Nite mixes eastern and western elements

By Rivka Barrett
Collegian Correspondent

On Saturday, Nov. 1, Diwali Nite made a splash at the University of Massachusetts as people crammed into the Student Union Ballroom.

Diwali Nite opened with a video about the story of Ramayan, a myth central to the Diwali tradition and was hosted by the Indian Student Association.

In 2000 B.C.E., Lord Ram, the son of King Dasharath, was exiled from his kingdom of Ayodhia with wife Sita and brother Lakshman after his father agreed to fulfill a vow he had made to his jealous wife.

While in exile, Sita was captured by the villainous Ravan, and Ram and Ravan fought to the death over her. Fortunately, Ram won and returned to his kingdom as the rightful ruler.

According to Kartik Deshpande, the president of the Indian Student Association, Diwali is thus "celebrated as a victory of good over evil."

Diwali (also called Deepavali) is a Hindu festival and is traditionally celebrated on the 15th day of the month of Kartik, which extends from Oct. 15 through Nov. 13 this year.

It is widely known as the "festival of lights," because of the custom of lighting small oil lamps, or divas, around houses and streets. In India, people light round-shaped candles called "deep," and the name of the holiday is derived from these candles.

Diwali is a celebration of joy and faith, a time for people to express happiness and pamper themselves with flair.

The campus event did not disappoint.

There were a number of mesmerizing performances, including a skit based on the Ramayan myth, musicians and several dances presented by members of the Indian Student Association and the South Asian Student Association.

Many of the acts appeared to incorporate a mix of traditional and Western elements.

MIR (basically, a co-ed, renamed South Asian-based "hustle" dance troupe from Mount Holyoke College, also performed that night.

Maitreyee Vittala, one of the founders and captains of the troupe, commented on the inspiration for the group's unique choreography by saying, "There were elements of ballet and modern dance involved in choreography as well as some Bollywood and Indian classical steps."

Dinner was served at 8:30 p.m., and consisted rice, naan (Indian bread), palak paneer (spinach with Indian cottage cheese and spices), dal (fried lentil curry), chicken tikka (chicken curry), raita (yogurt with vegetables), and pakora (fried pastry).

Deshpande had predicted that a total of 300-250 people would attend the event. To his pleasant surprise, however, he got much more than he had bargained for.

"One of the signs of the success of the event was that we ran short of food as we had underestimated the number," he said. "It was a packed house and people were very enthusiastic about the whole event."

Generation gap in workforce investigated

By Haley Navarro
Collegian Correspondent

The title is definitely deceiving. Tamara Erickson's "Plugged In: The Generation Y Guide to Thriving at Work" has nothing to do with getting a job.

Actually, it has nothing to do with "thriving at work" either.

The underlying meaning behind this title is that Erickson strives to teach how to accomplish everyday tasks, like text-messaging or coding a Web site, to benefit her readers at work.

"Generation Y," which Erickson classifies as being born anytime between the years 1980 and 2000, apparently doesn't know how to use its resources to secure jobs. Throughout the book, Erickson refers to the generation simply as "Y", as opposed to "you kids" or "Generation Y."

Most of the content in this book can be found at any informational session offered on a college campus – but for the sake of Tamara Erickson, let's pretend her readers don't attend college.

Erickson breaks the book into three parts. Essentially, in these parts, she wants the reader to identify him or herself, find a field of study with an enjoyable career, and then instructs the reader on what to do after being hired.

In the first part of the book, she assesses what the reader is capable of. To do this, she compares people of the same age all across the globe, and somehow loses the reader in data.

She then has a series of questions to answer such as, "Do you constantly try to overachieve at your job, even if you aren't getting paid for it?" or "Do you show up to work early and not mind?"

If the reader doesn't answer these questions with "Yes," she deems that they are not happy at their job. Directly after this, she gives a description of those who have depression.

In the second part of the book, Erickson resembles a combination of a guidance counselor and a therapist. She wants the reader to identify something they enjoy, and then apply this to the work force.

This is where the title is deceptive.

She isn't going to teach how to properly write a cover letter or to jazz up a resume, but simply to inform the reader of techniques to bridge the generational gaps between employees.

The third part of the book is all about what to do at a job.

Erickson first describes the different generations one might encounter in the workplace, and what they might think of the younger generation.

To illustrate this, she uses charts. She makes the accurate point that correct grammar, capitalization and punctuation are important aspects of e-mails and memos sent throughout the company in order to look professional.

Other topics from this section include what not to wear to work, how to deal with pressure and how to react in a meeting.

To conclude the book, Erickson ends by comparing everything she's said to "The Devil Wears Prada," which didn't seem to hold much relevance to the rest of the book.

Overall, "Plugged In" wasn't a bad read, it would be great for someone who doesn't attend college, and therefore rarely hears the words "internship" or "resume."

Aspects of the books seemed to be "dumbed down" to emphasize Erickson's points, and much of it seemed to be coming from the author's own experience, as if she hadn't researched at all.

However, Erickson accredited all of her knowledge about texting and AOL to her "Ys" (aka her kids) but didn't seem to take the time to listen to them.

Not all "Ys" are proficient at using computers, send texts incessantly or instant message for most of our days, although this is a pretty accurate stereotype.

If this book were read by older people, they would probably appreciate it more, as it seemed to mock Generation Y.

But as DJ Jazzy Jeff and Will Smith of "The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air" once said, parents just don't understand.

'Deerhunter' captivates

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

It's hard to be as prolific as Bradford Cox, at least in the context of the average musician's output.

Cox has just released two new records with his band "Deerhunter," "Microcastle" and its fraternal bonus album "Weird Era Cont.," released on Kranky and 4AD respectively, his "Let the Blind Lead Those Who Can See But Cannot Feel" was released under the Atlas Sound moniker last February, not to mention endless non-profit MP3 posts, digital EPs, micromixes and virtual 7s from his blog, deerhunterthebandblogspot.com.

It's a lot to sift through, but the fact remains – it's all intriguing stuff. These most recent back-to-back releases are hardly new (they were both leaked months ago, the bonus disc having been hacked -from Cox's mediafire.com account), but they're still as fresh as anything released so far in this final quarter.

"Microcastle" is a slight adjustment from 2006's "Cryptograms" (Kranky), yet it stays true to "Deerhunter's" complex formula: decay romanticized lyrically, subtle pop arrangements and of course heavily textured guitar tracks woven into each other, countless threads producing the finest silk.

"Cover Me (Slowly)" breaks the ice, a crashing introduction which leads directly into "Agoraphobia," an ode to the desire to stay inside of doors away from the world. "Feed me twice a day/I want to fade away" Cox pleads. "I'd lose my voice, I know/but I've nothing left to say."

Fortunately, Cox does have more to say, as the next track "Never Stops" initially comes off as one of the best tracks of the 12, a 3-minute dynamic journey, citing "Doolittle" era Pixies.

"Little Kids" sounds bright and airy, a reference to Cox's interest in classic doo-wop sensibilities hidden under the characteristically churning fuzz.

The title track mopes and lopes wispily for half of its nearly 4 minutes before exploding in a technicolor onslaught, a splash of pigment in an otherwise grey record.

The next three tracks amount to about the length of a single song, neither realizing an idea completely nor making an attempt at grasping one. "Cavalry Scars" skitters along behind Cox's echoed vocal, "Green Jacket" sports piano tones seemingly blessed by Brian Eno, and "Activa" floats through some unmarked space, territory reserved for patient texture-heads.

This trio sets up for the album's cornerstone, "Nothing Ever Happened." Aside from being the longest track on the record, it could also be the most easily accessible. Its progression follows the path laid down by Krautrock-influenced offerings from "Cryptograms" such as "Octet," layering buzzing guitar noise over bent, catchy guitar phrases (possibly the sound a sick cat would make) and a Steve Shelley (of "Sonic Youth") caliber backbeat.

All of a sudden, there are only three tracks to go. "Saved By Old Times" mentions vampires and contains an extended sample out of an old horror flick, and generally stirs up the idea that everyone can use some nostalgia once in a while to break the constant consumption of the current.

"Neither of Us, Uncertainly" is one of "Deerhunter's" most epic, sweeping tracks, yet is estranged from the label "accessible" by a dreamy minute-and-a-half of murmuring tape-loops at the end of the track.

The album closes with "Twilight at Carbon Lake," another nostalgic track harkening back to the days when real-life bands actually played high school proms, like the band playing at the dance in "Back to the Future," accented by more doo-wop flares and steady rhythms.

These back-drifting sounds give way to a blistering wash of crushing feedback to close the album, an appropriate sonic punishment to offset the beauty found on the rest of the record, an example of the natural forces of yin and yang.

The record may seem too non-descript to be classified as great, but it absolutely begs multiple listens. Great albums are defined their nuance, the ability to find a new corner each time around. This opportunity is offered by "Microcastle," another infallible chapter in Cox's detailed musical journey.

The bonus disc is hardly an extra throwaway feature – it may even rival "Microcastle" itself. "Operation" sounds huge, with stadium-sized reworking potential, while "Dot Gain" provides an interesting balance of drones and repetition with frenetic drums and tambourine jingle.

Cox comes back to the retro sounds on "Vox Humana," with constant piano chords supporting his conversational vocal while the drumming apes sappy soul ballads from the days of yore. "VHS Dream" writhes unnaturally, constricted by revolving guitar phrases until being released as a black spurt of feedback.

"Deerhunter" recently released its newest album, titled "Microcastle," which is a culmination of the many types of sounds the group can produce.

"Moon Witch Cartridge" is a bouncy ditty with handclaps and yawning guitar sounds which gives way to the 10-minute sprawl of "Cavalry Scars II/Aux Out," a shining example of the Krautinfluenced slow build-up form which "Deerhunter" does so well.

"Deerhunter" will be performing Nov. 10 at the Paradise in Boston with two other bands who've recently released noteworthy material, Brooklyn trio "Vivian Girls" and Ohioans "Times New Viking."

"Vivian Girls'" self-titled record "In The Red," is a re-release of their originally sold out album, of which only 500 copies were available. Influenced by the "Wipers" and "Nirvana," the "Girls'" sound certainly does the two justice, incorporating amateurish sing-song harmonies, frantic drumming, and enough guitar haze to cite other diverse influences such as a more restricted "Jesus & Mary Chain," a modern version of the "Vaselines," or a less radio-ready "Stone Roses."

Highlights include album opener "All the Time," "Tell the World," and "Where Do You Run To," all three displaying short, upbeat pop disciplines with a knack for sounding absolutely down-to-earth and authentic.

"Times New Viking's" new "Stay Awake" EP is not for the faint of heart, atonally rumbling through five loud, lo-fi tracks in just over 11 minutes. "Pagan Eyes" comes off as a filthy garage rock anthem, morphing and deconstructing as the poor recording vibrates your subwoofers.

"Hate Hate Hate" doesn't reach the 1-minute mark, but does inflict spasms of punk rock energy upon the listener for its duration before letting up. Unfortunately, the rest is more of the same – fuzzed-out guitar noise bleeding from one track to another, with little variation between tunes or any time to reach the surface for a breath.

McMahon matures for newest release

By Haley Navarro
Collegian Correspondent

As the sophomore debut from "Jack's Mannequin," "The Glass Passenger" holds up to its reputation as a strong American rock band.

Andrew McMahon, from "Something Corporate" fame, formed "Jack's Mannequin" in 2004 and released its first album in 2005.

Now, three years later, he is still going strong.

As a songwriter and a vocalist, McMahon has evolved from his "Something Corporate" days, but his songs aren't any less musically endowed or entertaining – just more mature. His voice has also changed – sometimes melodic and sometimes off-key – yet he still manages to keep the same stature and mood throughout the album.

His vocals are best displayed on "Annie, Use Your Telescope," which almost resembles a church-like choir.

Though some of the ballads on this album aren't as enjoyable as the more upbeat songs, "Annie ..." breaks the mold with its guitar, piano and string section.

"The Resolution," the album's first single, has an additional video that was co-directed by Stephanie Meyer of "Twilight" fame. It's undoubtedly the most radio friendly single, but isn't the best of the album.

Listeners who have no previous experience with "Jack's Mannequin" can easily get into this song. It's a perfect demonstration of who they are as a band.

"What Gets You Off" and "Bloodshot" are by far the strongest songs on the album. "What Gets You Off" tells about a past relationship, as the lyrics demonstrate the point without being too revealing or raunchy, as the title would imply. Lyrics like, "That black designer dress looks better underneath our feet/Your knees in the dirt" and "It was last night/At our empty warehouse party/And there in the black light/I could see the tattoos glowing on your body," bring the song to life.

Andrew McMahon, formerly of "Something Corporate" fame, released his most recent album, "The Glass Passenger." The record includes a more mature song range, including references to drug use.

The only downside of this piece is that McMahon glorifies drug use. "I'm always coming down from the night before, but I'm doing my best to get caught."

"Bloodshot," which could be described as the most alternative song on the album, comes complete with handclaps and electric guitars. The song is a narrative of a girl and a boy and the underlying meaning of their relationship. The chorus could be improved lyrically, but it doesn't take away from the essence of the song. The title "Bloodshot" is used in reference to people's eyes, alluding to more drug use.

The record as a whole is one that could be chorused at a gathering by everyone around.

McMahon has come a long way from "If U C Jordan," yet, stays the same as an artist.

And if he knows one thing about being an artist, it's how to make unbelievably enjoyable piano rock.

Tide rises to No. 1

By Randall Mell
South Florida Sun-Sentinel

Who's the best undefeated team in the land? And who's the best one-loss team?

The answers may well frame the debate over who plays for the BCS national championship.

If you look at Sunday's release of the BCS standings, there are two distinct classes of national title contenders. The undefeated and the once-beatens.

In Sunday's standings, Alabama (9-0) ascended to No. 1 for the first time in BCS history.

Texas Tech (9-0) jumped to No. 2, and Penn State held still at No. 3.

Texas (8-1) dropped to No. 4 to stake an important claim at the head of the class among one-loss teams. Florida (7-1) is No. 5, Oklahoma (8-1) No. 6, USC (7-1) No. 7, Utah (9-0) No. 8 and Oklahoma State (8-1) No. 9.

The very notion that the strength of college football teams can be determined by polls invites debate.

Opinions, after all, are the lifeblood of the USA Today and Harris Interactive polls that make up two thirds of the formula in the BCS standings. Opinions of computer wizards are built into the six computer programs that make up the other third.

So let the weekly debate begin.

There's minimal disagreement over Alabama's worthiness atop the standings for now. Coach Nick Saban's Crimson Tide were atop both human polls and shared the aggregate No. 1 spot with Texas Tech among the computers.

But here's the big question about the undefeated this week: Did Texas Tech really deserve to leap over Penn State?

The big question among the once-beatens is whether Texas really belongs in front of Florida.

Texas Tech's jump over Penn State is a bad sign for Nittany Lions fans. While it's difficult to imagine coach Joe Paterno would be left out of another national title game with another undefeated team, there's a perception that the Big Ten's reputation beside the SEC and Big 12 hurts Penn State. Ohio State's failure in the past two BCS national title games handicaps the Nittany Lions. But the standings this week don't bear that out. The humans put Penn State over Texas Tech in both of their polls. It was the computers that were behind Texas Tech's big jump.

The good news for Penn State fans is that the Nittany Lions have the most favorable path to an undefeated season with a trip to Iowa and home games against Indiana and Michigan State ending their season.

Texas Tech will be severely tested as host to Oklahoma State on Saturday and traveling to Oklahoma in two weeks. Even if the Red Raiders survive that, there's a possible Big 12 title game.

Among the once-beatens, Florida fans couldn't have liked Texas being out front.

The humans prefer the Gators this week, the computers Texas.

Florida ranked two spots ahead of Texas in the USA Today and Harris polls but trailed the Longhorns by two spots among the computers.

Florida's 49-10 rout of Georgia helped the Gators build on the impression they may be the hottest team in the land. You see that reflected in the human polls. The Gators have won their past four SEC games by an average score of 50-10.

Texas' benefits from its strength of schedule, and the computers rewarded that. The Longhorns' one-point loss to Texas Tech ended a run of four consecutive games against ranked opponents.

Whatever November holds, get your arguments in order, because debate's sure to be a part of this finish.

Alabama's Javier Arenas hits Kentucky's Dicky Lyons in a game earlier this season. Alabama is one of the few undefeated teams left in the nation and has earned the No. 1 spot in this week's BCS rankings.

Gators get revenge on UGA

Meyers uses timeouts late in rout, Tebow enjoys moment

By Randall Mell
South Florida Sun-Sentinel

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. – Florida coach Urban Meyer knows the truth in the old proverb about revenge being a dish best served cold.

With time running out in the Gators' 49-10 rout of Georgia on Saturday at Jacksonville Municipal Stadium, he froze the moment.

He called timeout with 44 seconds left and again with 30 seconds left.

This wasn't so he could run it up with another score, but something more cunning.

It was so his team, coaches and fans could enjoy this giant victory a little bit longer, and maybe, just maybe, so he could prolong Georgia's misery.

Meyer wouldn't admit as much afterward, saying coyly that he just wanted running back Emmanuel Moody to get a couple more carries.

But everyone knew.

"I didn't know what was going on when he called the first timeout," strong safety Will Hill said. "When he called the second timeout, I said, 'That Urban's a funny guy.'"

The Gators enjoyed the giddy revelry in those late timeouts as reward for all the hard work they put into gaining their retribution. No matter how this win's couched, that's what it was. Meyer called the intense media focus on Georgia's bench-clearing Gator Stomp after that first score here a year ago "nonsense," and players insisted the insult they felt went deeper than that stunt.

The Gators said their summer was built around reps of 42. That's how many points the Bulldogs scored against them in their 42-30 victory last year. Whether it was push-ups or sit-ups or some exercise, the Gators used that number to remind them and drive them.

Nobody relished those late timeouts Saturday more than Florida quarterback Tim Tebow, who hopped in front of the stands waving a towel. He got Gator fans to whoop it up even more.

"Enjoy the moment," Tebow said when asked what he made of the meaning of Meyer's timeouts. "We didn't do anything wrong. We were just enjoying the game."

Give Meyer credit that he could use the highly charged motivation from last year's loss so effectively and efficiently. We've seen lesser coaches fail to control their teams in ugly paybacks. But there was no brawl here, or overheated taunts or excessive celebrations, just ferocious football.

"That's a sign of grown men when they take a challenge to heart, and instead of using their mouths, they work," Meyer said.

Meyer said work was the right answer, the only answer to what happened a year ago.

"College football is a great sport," Meyer said. "We didn't invent it and our guys aren't the first to play it. You always respect the game of football."

Florida linebacker Brandon Spikes set the tone on the second play, jolting Georgia's dynamic Knowshon Moreno with the hit of the game. He picked up Moreno and planted him on his back.

Florida quarterback Tim Tebow soaks in the moment after the Gators crushed Georgia 49-10 this past weekend.

Meyer had another clever answer to Georgia's bench-clearing celebration in the end zone after the Bulldogs' first score a year ago.

He answered with a parade through Georgia's end zone this year.

The Gators' 49 points were their most against the Bulldogs since coach Steve Spurrier put 52 on them in 1994 and again in '95.

What Meyer found most satisfying in the end is that Florida is in position to play for the SEC title and perhaps an even greater title. His Gators have been an indomitable force since their stumble against Mississippi five weeks ago. They've beaten Arkansas, LSU, Kentucky and now Georgia by a cumulative 201-43.

The play of the defense really stands out. A year ago, Meyer said the unit looked "soft" against Georgia, but he heaped love on them after intercepting Matthew Stafford three times, forcing a fumble and limiting Moreno to 65 yards.

"It doesn't get much sweeter than this," Tebow said.

Big 12 earning recognition

By Mike Jones
McClatchy Newspapers

OKLAHOMA CITY – Kansas basketball coach Bill Self slipped away from a trailing parade of minicams long enough to pour himself a cup of coffee before he took the dais at last Thursday's Big 12 men's basketball media day.

Asked if he'd had many such private moments since the Jayhawks won the league's first national championship in April, Self shook his head.

"Uh-uh," he said. "Not many," he said.

"And I hope I'm busy every off-season like this. That means we probably had a pretty successful run."

It's been fun, noted junior guard Sherron Collins, the lone returnee from Kansas' seven top scorers last season.

"Like a roller-coaster ride that stayed at the top," he said.

By any measure, the Big 12's season-long ride was its most successful ever.

The conference stood alone with two teams (Texas was the other) in the Elite Eight. It led the nation with 11 victories against nonconference teams ranked in the AP Top 25, in overall nonconference winning percentage (.756), in NCAA Tournament victories (12) and tournament winning percentage (.706). A league record 10 players were drafted by the NBA.

No other conference has landed as many teams (six) in the Final Four the last seven seasons. But the Jayhawks' national title served as final validation from a national perspective.

"From my vantage point, it's ridiculous that the Big 12 had to validate the play of our league ... when you've had so many teams in the Final Four and Elite Eights over the time the league has been in existence," Self said.

"I don't think the coaches felt that ever. But from the outside, the media perspective, it's something that probably needed to be done."

And so, one less question was asked.

"So we'll give everybody a chance to come up with another question to ask," Longhorns coach Rick Barnes said. "What do we need to do now?"

Simple. Follow 2008.

That of course, will be hard to do in what amounts to a transitional year as the league awaits the anticipated influx of talent out of the star-studded recruiting class of 2009. More than 15 percent of Rivals.com's Top 150 have committed to Big 12 schools.

And as Kansas reloads, the balance of power appears to reside in the Big 12 South. Coaches voted Oklahoma as the team most likely to win the conference, followed by Texas, Baylor and KU (in a tie), and Texas A&M.

"I think if you talked to the coaches in the South, they will say that the balance of power has been in the South for a while," Self said. "If you talk to the coaches in the North, they will say the coaches in the South don't know what they're talking about.

"But I do think on paper the South appears to be very, very strong."

Self cautions not to dismiss his team. He rattled off five of his new players "that I think can play most places." He's right.

But the league's somewhat dimmed starpower shines brightest in the South, led by OU's Blake Griffin and Texas' A.J. Abrams and Damion James.

Griffin's decision to return for his sophomore season was the biggest off-season news.

"What I wanted was the opportunity to play on a team like we have this year, having these expectations and hopefully being able to fulfill them," Griffin said.

Sooners coach Jeff Capel's program has experienced a meteoric rise in three seasons, because of Griffin's decision to stay and the addition of guard Willie Warren.

"I think this year is up for grabs more than any year I've been here," Capel said. "The past two years you looked at Kansas and Texas being the two schools that were probably a little bit better, more talented than anyone.

"And this year you look at those two teams again. But Baylor is as talented as anyone. I think we're a pretty talented team. A&M has some guys back.

"And so it is up in the air for everyone. Everyone has a chance. And that's what makes this year really, really exciting for everyone."

Well, maybe just really exciting. Last season was really, "really" exciting.

Stanford crushes Washington State

By Bud Withers
The Seattle Times

STANFORD, Calif. – Someday, perhaps Saturday's dreary tableau will merely be a faded memory of an unspeakably bad time.

Steady rain descended, the clock expired and a Washington State assistant coach barked at a handful of WSU players slogging off the field toward the locker room, to remind them to shake hands with Stanford.

Water spilled from a roof as Cougars explained their latest crime against competitiveness, while in an adjoining room, Stanford players engaged in a happy chant after their fifth victory.

Stanford 58, Washington State 0, the worst WSU defeat in the history of the series. And on the first day of November, the Cougars had given up a total of 350 points to six Pac-10 opponents, more than any Pac-10 team ever.

"Like coach (Paul) Wulff says, you have you and 10 other people counting on you," mused starting quarterback Kevin Lopina. "Right now, we can't count on everybody."

Judging from this latest implosion, what WSU can count on is an early, vague hint of a pulse, followed by dropped passes, missed blocks, missed tackles and after a couple of scores by the opposition, the inevitable collapse of whatever wisp of a positive psyche existed.

"That's pretty fair to say," nodded Wulff, when asked whether this is a team with a fragile mental makeup right now. "It's that old saying, you've got to have kids you can lose with."

As they say in Nevada, the oddsmakers haven't caught up with the Cougars yet. Seemingly, it's impossible. As outrageous as it looked when Stanford was installed a 30-point favorite early in the week, Stanford, a team whose starting QB has a 7-9 touchdown-interception ratio – the Cougars can only dream of covering a spread. They trailed 31-0 at half in this one.

It's obvious this is a shattered team, one without enough Pac-10-level talent and seriously bereft of resolve. As to the question of whether coaching is part of the deficit, it's honestly hard to tell, inasmuch as the Cougars execute so poorly, it's almost as though they can't move the debate to that next level.

As Wulff noted, early on they did appear to have benefited from a week off. On their first four possessions, they got the ball into Stanford territory, which this season seems worthy of a sticker on the helmet.

But on their initial series – the Stanford 45, Lopina chose to throw on the move for tight end Ben Woodard when he could have run for a first down, and that drive died. Next series at the Stanford 49, Lopina threw behind freshman Kevin Sorsdal on an incomplete middle screen that looked like it could have gone for a score. On the next play, Lopina throws perfectly to stalwart receiver Brandon Gibson, he muffs it and Stanford intercepts at the Cardinal 36.

This is a bad team that needs certain the next negative play is right around the corner.

J.J. Levenseller got one connection and played passably, allowing the Cougars to be more than the shell of an offense they presented against USC. But one is not an outfit that is going to be saved by a true freshman.

Afterward, Lopina repeated some of the comments he made recently, about not everybody being on board. If that's a problem, clearly it hasn't gone away and won't probably not under what would be a miraculous turnaround offseason.

"We have some people on the team that are counterparts, and they'll get down about that," Lopina said. "And there are some that want to quit. We don't have that. We have to have everyone on board as a team."

"Being a competitor, you're going out against a good Pac-10 team and putting up no points," to me, that's embarrassing."

Outside the WSU locker room, longtime assistant coach Mike Levenseller greeted a player from a bygone day, receiver Shawn Finn, one of the Lab Five of the 1997 Rose Bowl team.

Levenseller has more perspective than anybody, having coached during two Rose Bowl seasons, sandwiched by a three-year, 3-21 siege in Pac-10 games from 1998 to 2000.

"I'm looking forward to this," he said doggedly. "Paul has a very solid plan. It'll get there. I guarantee it'll get there. Sometimes you get in a situation where you've got to battle through this stuff and it feels like you're never going to get to the other side."

The chilling possibility is that WSU recruiters can't continue what appears to be solid work to date because of its disastrous season on the field.

"I see where it's going," Levenseller continued. "It's a great staff, good guys, and there's a vision. Every day we work hard for that vision.

"I see the future."

Good thing. It can't be as distressing as the present.

UMass stays perfect against Stony Brook

By Kyle Predki
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts swimming and diving teams improved their records this weekend as they traveled away to Stony Brook and came home with victories.

Both teams (2-1) had never lost to Stony Brook, and kept their clean records against the Seawolves intact with nearly identical scores. The men came out on top, 176-123, while the women won 176-124.

Freshman Joey Sbordon, honored as last week's Atlantic 10 Swimming and Diving Rookie of the Week, continued his success for the third week in row. Sbordon, who has mostly competed in distance this year, placed first in the 200-meter freestyle (1 minute, 45.45 seconds) and the 100 freestyle (48.94). In placing first in both events, Sbordon remains unbeaten this year in his individual events.

Standout junior Juan Moliere, part of the men's first-place 200 medley relay, competed in only one individual event this weekend. In his signature race, the 50 freestyle (21.72), he took first and also remains unbeaten in the event this season.

The men's 200 relay, that also consisted of Nate Bromage, Andrew Willbrant and Brian Schmidt took first showing the Minutemen's strength in the event.

In diving, both the women and the men secured the top ranks in the 1-meter and 3-meter diving events. Freshman Jason Cook took both first-place spots for the men, as UMass filled the top three in each diving event. Byron Johnson finished second in the 3-meter and third in the 1-meter, as Adam Duffield placed second in the 1-meter and third in the 3-meter.

For the Minutewoman diving team, Anne Fogarty took first in both the 1- and 3-meter events, as Sarah Hortsmann was at Fogarty's heels by claiming second place in the two events.

Junior Elizabeth Walsh stood out this week in both her individual and in her relay event. Walsh, along with Kathryne Chalikis, Jessica Starostelic and Jennifer Corriveau placed first in the 200 relay (1:50.61). Walsh also placed first in her two individual events in the 100 and 200 backstroke.

Along with the 200-relay finish, Chalikis and Starostelic also took first place in their individual events. Chalikis won both the 50 (25.12) and the 100 (54.33) freestyle sprint events. Starostelic took first in the the 100 (1:08.69) and the 200 breaststroke (2:27.17).

Freshman Chelsea Downing earned her first collegiate first-place finish this weekend. Downing topped the 400 IM (4:40.09) and clinched second in the 1,000 free (10:41.65).

UMass dominated in the pool this weekend, with 13 first-place finishes for the women and 10 top finishes for the men. The strong display from the two teams is an example of how the teams hope to compete. The all-around performance that is stressed as the UMass game plan was the key for this week's victory.

Both teams will continue their New York road trip as they head to Binghamton, N.Y., this Saturday, Nov. 8 to take on the Bearcats at 11 a.m.

Kyle Predki can be reached at kpredki@student.umass.edu

Senior Nate Bromage was on the UMass 200-meter medlay relay team that took first place this weekend at Stony Brook. The rest of the relay team consisted of Andrew Willbrant, Brian Schmidt and Juan Moliere.

points between first and second. It was a little closer than that."

Pierce finished first for the Minutemen, ninth overall, with a time of 24:22.8. He is known as a very consistent runner that works hard, especially during the off-season. Pierce usually finishes between third and fifth for the team, but he peaked at the right time to contribute to UMass' championship title.

"He had a great race on Saturday, it was his day, exactly when we needed it," O'Brien said. "It was the first time he was number one and it came at a very spectacular time."

Mulvaney also had a stand out performance. He finished fourth for the Minutemen, 18th overall, with a time of 24:48.9. He hasn't been in the top three for the team, typically from fourth to sixth place, but Saturday his performance beat out Duquesne's Scott Van Kooten who finished fourth for his team, 20th overall.

Race notes

O'Brien was named Coach of the Year for the second time in his career after the Minutemen's A-10 win. ... Senior Nils Fischer finished second for UMass, 11th overall with a time of 24:32.0. ... Junior Nicolai Naranjo took third on the team, 16th overall. ... Senior Jesse Regnier finished fifth on the team, 21st overall. ... Pierce and Fischer were named to the A-10 All-Conference team after their performances.

The Minutemen have a weekend off before traveling to Van Cortlandt Park Park in the Bronx, N.Y. for the NCAA Regional Qualifier.

Melissa Turtinen can be reached at mturtinen@dailycollegian.com

Jonathan Pierce finished ninth overall - first for the Minutemen - in this past weekend's Atlantic 10 Championship and helped UMass win the conference title.

CAA FOOTBALL from page 10

Jonathon Grimes leads the CAA with 164.9 all purpose yards per game, while the receiving corps of senior Elliot Mack, junior D.J. McAulay and sophomore Chase Hill allows Phillips to spread the field. Junior Adrian Tracy continues to be a force on the defensive end, with a CAA leading 8.5 sacks on the season. The Tribe will try to continue their winning streak on Saturday against Northeastern.

CAA Players of the Week

Punt returner Scotty McGee of top-ranked James Madison was named the special teams' player of the week for his record-tying performance in the Dukes' 41-7 rout over Delaware. McGee returned three punts for 67 yards and one touchdown, his fourth kick return for a touchdown of the season (three punt returns, one kick return). The touchdown tied the CAA single-season record for punts returned for touchdowns, set in 1995 by Cy Butler of Rhode Island.

New Hampshire defensive back Dino Vasso earned Defensive Player of the Week honors for his massive effort against Hofstra. He recorded 12 tackles, forced a fumble and had two interceptions. He returned the latter interception 66 yards for a touchdown and increased the Wildcat lead to 45-7. Vasso now has four interceptions on the season, tying him with teammate Ryan Hinds for the second in the CAA.

Landers keeps running

James Madison senior quarterback Rodney Landers maintained his spot as the CAA rushing leader after another dominant performance against Delaware on Saturday. Landers rushed for two touchdowns and 185 yards on 23 carries. The 185 yards is the second most by a James Madison quarterback in school history.

Landers now has a total of 1,115 rushing yards and 10 rushing touchdowns (second most in the CAA) on the season. The second best rusher in the conference, Richmond's Josh Vaughn trails Landers by a remarkable 232 yards. Landers has also been effective through the air this season, throwing for 938 yards and 11 touchdowns.

against George Washington. Junior Mark DeSantis has scored three goals this season — the first two coming against St. Bonaventure on Oct. 17, the other in the 2-1 win against Richmond. DeSantis and Hogan led the Minutemen in goals last season.

Playmaker

Sophomore Ben Arikian, a key performer on set pieces, has played an important role in every UMass win this season. Arikian has three goals and four assists this season.

Most recently Arikian assisted on DeNormandie's goal and caused Fordham to score on themselves in UMass' 2-1 win last Sunday. He tallied a goal against LaSalle in UMass' 2-0 win on Oct. 31.

In UMass' Oct. 26 win against George Washington, he assisted on Stuart Thomson's game-winning goal when he took the corner kick and placed it perfectly for Thomson to head it in.

On Oct. 17 Arikian scored the first goal of the game in UMass' 4-1 win over St. Bonaventure. In UMass' 1-0 win against Siena, Arikian was awarded the assist when senior Chris Brown headed in the game-winning goal off of Arikian's set piece. Arikian scored the game-winning goal just minutes into the second over-time in the Minutemen's 3-2 double overtime win against Boston University on Aug. 31.

This season, Arikian leads the team in assists (four), and has three goals this season, good for 10 points, the second most points on the team behind senior Prince Ofosu. Arikian can be seen on the field for practically the entire game. On Sunday he played the full 90 minutes and totals 1,419 minutes this season, playing in all of UMass' 16 games, starting in 15 of them.

Remember 2007?

Koch has said that this year is a different team. It's a different season and will have different results. But, the way this season is wrapping up resembles the 2007 Minutemen's season.

Last year UMass entered A-10 play with a record of 5-4-1, this year UMass started the A-10 schedule at 5-5-3. The 2007 Minutemen went 6-3-0 in A-10 play and this year they are 5-1-1.

Grass stains

The Minutemen have won four straight games ... The Minutemen have allowed four goals since A-10 play began, while they have scored 12 ... Senior Prince Ofosu continues to lead the Minutemen in goals (five) and points (11) after netting a goal in UMass' 2-0 win over LaSalle on Oct. 31 ... Senior goalkeeper Zack Simmons tallied another shutout against LaSalle. He has 28 career shutouts.

UMass wins Atlantic 10

Beat Duquesne by single point, Pierce, Mulvaney lead charge

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It depended on the day, but on Saturday it was the Massachusetts men's cross country team that came out and performed to win the Atlantic 10 Championship by a single point over the weekend.

Since the start of the year, there have been up to six schools that have rotated through the first- through fifth-place spots in the A-10 polls depending on how they had done the weekend before. And the A-10 Championship was no different, but UMass was the team that outperformed and came away with the championship title.

"We're very happy to come away the winner of the championship of what I would consider to be one of the deepest team championships that we've had in recent memory," UMass men's coach Ken O'Brien said.

With the help of juniors Jonathan Pierce and Andrew Mulvaney having what O'Brien considers "monster performances" the Minutemen took first place in a meet that was closer than anyone could have expected.

The Minutemen averaged a time of 24 minutes, 40.62 seconds to earn a team total of 75 points. Although Duquesne averaged a time of 24:40.12 (good for 76 team points) they took second in the championships. The Minutemen had more runners finish at the top to earn them the win.

"The fact that we were a little deeper, had a little bit more depth than the other schools, I think that allowed us to find that necessary point scoring," O'Brien said. "I thought with a good race we would be able to win the championship. I knew it would be close – five or six

The Massachusetts men's cross country team won the Atlantic 10 Championship with only one point seperating them and second-place Duquesne. The Dukes finished with a better average time, but UMass had more top finishes to take the title.

Senior Chris Lowe practices the dribble-drive offense during the Minutemen's media day on Monday. New coach Derek Kellogg has brought the new offensive style with him from Memphis.

UM hosts media day

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's basketball team held an open practice for the media yesterday as it prepares for the start of the season.

Like many coaches at this point in the season, UMass coach Derek Kellogg feels the team isn't quite ready to play at the level that brought the Minutemen to the final game National Invitation Tournament in 2007-08.

UMass won't have its first regular season action until the game against Arkansas-Monticello on Nov. 11. Kellogg is still pleased with his team's effort in practice as it has increased the level of intensity as it comes closer to the opening of the regular season. He keeps practices competitive by having almost every drill tied to a game, where the loser runs.

Yesterday's session was devoted to executing the new offense that Kellogg is bringing from his previous assistant coaching job at Memphis, the dribble-drive motion.

Kellogg emphasized running the offense at a faster place by asking all of his players to go at full speed in every drill. The tempo will mainly be dictated by point guard Chris Lowe.

Last season the Minutemen ran a similar up-tempo offense with former coach Travis Ford, but Kellogg's style will require even more from his point guard. Lowe believes that the style of play will be more beneficial for him because it allows him to play his style.

"It helps my game even better because my game is getting to the basket and getting fouled," Lowe said. "Everything about this offense is about getting to the rack and hitting open threes."

Kellogg made it a priority as soon as he was hired to bring the program back to the national spotlight. Recruiting is part of what he plans to do to make UMass a national program.

This off-season, the Minutemen brought in transfers Sean Carter, Hashim Bailey and Doug Wiggins. Kellogg prefers to bring in freshmen as they are better long term.

Lowe believes that Kellogg's offense will make UMass an attractive school for potential recruits.

"He won't hold back anybody's skills and that's why a lot of kids are going to come here," Lowe said.

Kellogg expects the guards to get most of the scoring, although the offense doesn't necessarily prevent big men from getting shots as well. However, with a lack of depth in the front court, he won't have much of a choice this season.

UMass will look at Lowe, redshirt sophomore Anthony Gurley and junior Ricky Harris to take on the bulk of the scoring responsibilities.

The big men are going to be asked to take on more of the rebounding effort than they have in the past. Forward Tony Gaffney and center Luke Bonner will play the bulk of the minutes for the Minutemen in the front court.

Gaffney averaged 4.8 rebounds a game last season while Bonner averaged 2.5. But without the depth that UMass had last season with Dante Milligan and Etienne Bouwer sharing the rebounding duties, the redshirt seniors will have no choice but to step up.

"They've been very good players in practice. They're going to have every opportunity to step forward and make names for themselves," Kellogg said. "If one guy could put up double-digits [in rebounding] and the other came close to [double-digits] that would be great."

Kellogg has increased the number of rebounding drills that the Minutemen are used to seeing in the past. He has emphasized using their feet and grabbing the ball with both hands rather than trying to shove the opponent out of the way.

"We've done more rebounding drills than a seventh grade basketball team," Kellogg said.

Maine close to Top 25 birth

BY MIKE MASTONE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Maine continued its charge toward the Football Championship Subdivision Top 25 with a 55-7 thrashing of Iona on Saturday, earning its fourth consecutive victory.

The Black Bears ran wild on a weak Iona rush defense. Freshman tailback Pushaun Brown leading the way with 136 of the team's 375 rushing yards and one of their six rushing touchdowns.

CAA Football

Maine's (6-3, 3-2 Colonial Athletic Association) victory moves it one step closer to becoming the seventh CAA team to break the Top 25. However, its upcoming schedule is not one to be taken lightly.

Although it has an easy matchup with Rhode Island in between, the Black Bears must square off against two ranked conference opponents. They travel to Amherst on Nov. 8 to take on No. 13 Massachusetts and host No. 8 New Hampshire on Nov. 22. The matchup with UNH is sure to take center stage, as the Wildcats' rush defense (second best in the CAA) tries to contain Brown and the Black Bears prolific rushing attack.

TRIBE WINS FOURTH STRAIGHT

William & Mary continues to be the one of the biggest surprises in the FCS this season, defeating Towson on Saturday to earn its fourth consecutive win.

Towson held a 14-7 lead heading into the second half, but could not contain the William & Mary offense. Senior quarterback Jake Phillips threw for two touchdowns in the third quarter as he and the Tribe offense rolled for 27 unanswered points in the second half.

The Tribe (6-2, 4-1 CAA) jumped seven spots to No. 16 in last week's FCS poll, and another two this week to No. 14. They lead the CAA in total offense with an average of 427 yards per game. Freshman running back

Bryan Hogan and the Minutemen hope to clinch a spot in the Atlantic 10 tournament this weekend. Currently, UMass is in second place; the top six teams make the tournament.

Playoff hopes

Minutemen in second place, A-10 tourney birth in reach

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Every game is important, but now with two games left in regular season play, the Massachusetts men's soccer team has a lot riding on the upcoming weekend.

Atlantic 10 standings are closer than they have been all year; even the teams toward the bottom of the standings have a chance to earn enough points this weekend to qualify for the A-10 tournament.

UMass Soccer

This weekend, the Minutemen will have to play well if they want to qualify for the top six and make the A-10 tournament. The Minutemen (7-6-3, 5-1-1 A-10) are in a close tie for second with Temple (16 points) and have two games against tough opponents – No. 19 Saint Louis (15 points) and Charlotte (13 points).

If the Minutemen win or tie both of their games, they will need Dayton to lose in order to be regular season champions. If they lose both of their games this weekend and the other top six teams win, UMass has a slim chance of not making it to the postseason.

IT STARTED WITH THE BONNIES

UMass coach Sam Koch has stressed since the beginning of the season that once A-10 play begins, his team must win six of its nine games to advance to the A-10 tournament. The Minutemen have won five of the seven games they've played, and have the chance for win six on Friday – which nearly guarantees them a spot in the tournament.

UMass is on a six-game undefeated streak that started on Oct. 17 in the Minutemen's 4-1 win over St. Bonaventure (4-6-4, 2-4-1 A-10). The game marked the end of a four-game dry spell where the Minutemen didn't score a goal. It also ended a six-game winless streak that started after their 1-0 win over Siena on Sept. 6.

HITTING THE NET

Finishing has been the Minutemen's problem for most of the season. Before A-10 play began UMass had tallied 10 goals, but after Oct. 12 the Minutemen scored 12 more goals for a total of 22 this season coming from 10 different players, including many career firsts.

Sam DeNormandie has played 10 minutes in his career at UMass, but made them count. On Nov. 2 the redshirt freshman scored the game-winning goal against Fordham. Freshman Chris Reswess scored his first career goal Richmond on Oct. 24 and junior Stuart Thomson also tallied his first against George Washington on Oct. 26.

Junior Bryan Hogan earned his first point of the season when he assisted senior Prince Ofosu's goal

Obama wins presidency

BY MARK Z. BARABAK
LOS ANGELES TIMES

Barack Obama, the son of a father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas, was elected the nation's 44th president Tuesday, breaking the ultimate racial barrier to become the first black American to claim the country's highest office.

A nation that was founded by slave owners and seared by civil war and generations of racial strife delivered a smashing Electoral College victory to the 47-year-old, first-term senator from Illinois, who forged a broad, multiracial, multiethnic coalition. His victory was a leap in the march toward equality. When Obama was born, people with his skin color could not even vote in parts of America, and many were killed for trying.

Obama was winning in every state his party carried four years ago, including Pennsylvania, which McCain worked vigorously to pry from the Democratic column. Obama was also making significant inroads into Republican turf, carrying Ohio and Virginia, the latter voting Democratic for the first time in more than 40 years. He was also winning the swing states of New Hampshire, Iowa and New Mexico, which backed President Bush in 2004.

The major TV networks and The Associated Press called the race for Obama within minutes of the last polls closing in the West, sparking a raucous celebration in Chicago, where hundreds of thousands of celebrants gathered in Grant Park along the city's waterfront.

Giant video screens at the scene were tuned to CNN. Each time the network projected a state as an Obama win, the crowd erupted in cheers. The battleground states produced the loudest roars – first Pennsylvania, then New Hampshire, then Ohio, then, finally, victory.

Moments later, the Obama campaign announced that McCain had called the president-elect to concede.

Voters also handed Obama a fortified congressional majority, as Democrats picked up several seats in the Senate and in the House. The party knocked off at least two GOP incumbents, including North Carolina's Elizabeth Dole.

McCain, burdened by his party's toxic image, prevailed in a band of states that comprise a shrinking Republican base, mainly in the South, the Plains and parts of the interior West.

In winning the White House, Obama to a large degree remade the electorate in his own image. About one in 10 of those casting ballots Tuesday were doing so for the first time. While that number was roughly the same as four years ago, most of the newcomers were under age 30, about a fifth were black and a fifth were Hispanic. That was greater than their share of the overall population, and those groups voted overwhelmingly for Obama.

Overall, he won the large majorities of women, black and Hispanic voters. Although he lost among white voters, Obama narrowed the margin significantly from 2004.

For most voters, the sagging economy was the topmost concern, a dynamic that played strongly to the Democrats' favor. Six in 10 voters said the economy was the most important issue facing the nation, according to exit polls, far more than energy, Iraq, terrorism or health care.

Voters flocked to the polls in record numbers Tuesday, continuing a pattern of electoral exuberance that started in the primary season. There were scattered voting problems reported throughout the day, including long lines, malfunctioning voting machines and mislaid ballots.

But there was nothing like Florida's infamous "butterfly ballot" fiasco, which sent the 2000 presidential contest into several weeks of overtime before the U.S. Supreme Court stepped in to settle the race.

Mostly, there was patience, good cheer and, for many, pride in taking part in a slice of history, whatever the result, had McCain won, his running mate, Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, would have been the first woman to serve as vice president.

Lines began forming across the country before the sun had risen, with queues starting at 4 a.m. in New York City. The outcome across most of the Democratic-leaning Northeast was never in doubt, but many felt it was their responsibility – and privilege – to vote.

"I needed to cast my own ballot today, not just because it's my duty as a citizen but because for once it feels like it counts," said Eric Schwartz, 36, a computer specialist on New York's Upper West Side. "It's a more global feeling. Like I needed to make a mark on a day when things matter. Today, everyone matters."

In Arlington, Va., Takia Williams, 25 and black, wrestled with her frustrated 2-year-old, who wanted to play on the slide in the back seat of their car. But nothing could damp her spirits after casting a ballot for Obama. "I couldn't wait to vote," Williams said.

Obama will be one of the youngest presidents in American history, the first born outside the continental United States (in Hawaii) and only the third to move directly from the U.S. Senate to the White House.

He burst on the national political scene just more than four years ago with an electrifying keynote address to the Democratic National Convention in Boston. Obama's soaring speech previewed themes he would reprise in his presidential bid, including a call to end the partisanship symbolized by a country divided into Republican red and Democratic blue.

Months after that address, Obama won his U.S. Senate seat, and there was immediate talk of a run for president. The speculation, however, ultimately underrated the challenge facing Obama, who, by his own admission, entered the crowded Democratic field as a decided underdog. His victory over New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton after a long, contentious primary season was, in itself, one of the great political upsets of all time.

President-elect Barack Obama addresses the nation at Grant Park in Chicago after defeating Sen. John McCain on Tuesday, becoming the 44th president of the United States and the first black American to serve as commander in chief.

Massachusetts voters decided to leave the state income tax as it is and chose to decriminalize marijuana by answering "no" to ballot Question 1 and "yes" on Question 2.

During Election Day, Amherst voters, including town residents and students from the University of Massachusetts, were asked how they felt on the top two propositions.

All of the 14 voters questioned at the Immanuel Lutheran Church polling station on North Pleasant Street said they voted "no" on Question 1 to repeal the state income tax.

Students rock Election Night '08

BY ANNA BRIARD
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Cape Cod Lounge was alive with election fever last night as students and faculty attended the Election Night '08 event from 8 p.m. to 1 a.m.

The event was presented by the Political Science Department and the Political Science Undergraduate Board, with food provided by the People's Market and Sweets N' More. Televisions lined the walls, and an area was set aside where speakers held discussions with students about issues concerning the election.

One of the guest speakers, Professor Jesse Rhodes, discussed the challenges facing the new president and asked students to voice their opinions on issues and potential actions.

When he asked if they thought that there would be a scaling back of foreign commitments that would enable us to focus more on the crisis at home, students had mixed replies. One voiced, "Well, when there's a crisis at home, you have to tend to that before anything else. It's the government's duty." Another student wasn't as optimistic. "It's a nice thought, but I don't see that happening anytime soon."

Although there were representatives of both parties present at the event, it was clear that the popular vote in the room went to Senator Barack Obama. Cheers erupted when it was announced that Obama had won Pennsylvania, with a few chants of "Go McCain" coming from the coffee table. A few students felt that McCain had been less effective in reaching out to the general public than Obama.

During the discussion with Jesse Rhodes, one student stated that "Obama is more idealistic, McCain is more realistic. But people like the idea of hope and change. That's why Obama is so much more appealing to people."

An area of interest raised during event was the role that race played in the election this year compared to past years. Newscasters on the television brought up the fact that during this particular election period, African Americans had registered to vote in higher proportions than usual. Concern rose in some conversations that the decisions of these voters were based on race rather than on politics.

University of Massachusetts students gather at the Student Union Ballroom to listen as speakers discuss election issues and watch nationally televised voting results are announced.

M.J. Peterson, who attended the event, offered an explanation to this issue.

"There is still enough racial segregation in some parts [of the country]," she said. "You can still just read off how people will vote in those areas, but you can't just base it on that. If you really look at history, it's been a trend that most African Americans vote Democratic. Obama might have just pulled more in than usual."

The candidates' election strategies were also a topic of discussion.

"Both candidates used the 50-state strategy, where they tried to gain supporters in every state," Peterson said. "Normally, this meant that a candidate just had a campaign area in the state, but around the end of the election period, the candidate would focus more in areas where they could pick off states. The difference with Obama is that he had a very thick and excited organization in every state."

The issue of foreign policy surfaced as an area of interest among students. They agreed that they were unhappy with the way that America had been represented in the world during the Bush Administration.

"The president is one of the most powerful people in the world," UMass student Vincent Hyland said. "There has to be more respect for that power, respect that wasn't there during George W. Bush's presidency."

The biggest issue that intrigued students concern-

Now awake, students recognized in election

William McGuinness

John Langford watched Barack Obama's election speech alone from a couch near the escalators in the Campus Center basement. His longish white hair fell over the collar of his old sweater, and he solved math problems as Obama said, "God Bless America."

He spent a lot of time in the lobby upstairs, talking to the University of Massachusetts Democrats and Republicans alike. At a student debate, he asked who was there to represent Ralph Nader. He told me students got excited about the campaign this year because of Obama – that they were disgusted with the way Republicans were running the country.

Given last night's results and the run up of student activity before it, I think he got it right.

Whether they were swept in a wave that was the audacity of hope or could simply recognize a message with which they could identify, the campus reacted to an election cycle with more than a passing interest and the perception that the result could possibly affect them someday.

UMass saw a contest in which the student body could participate. The chants were still there. They held signs and rallied with their candidates toward the promise of victory. Yet some stormed the field further. They acted like actual Minutemen and marched to battleground states. They poured over policy and educated others so that we didn't have to, and they prepared for Tuesday.

Voting for students goes beyond civic duty and obligation. It's a nuisance and complicated. The system is flawed for those who register in towns other than their own, and receiving the absentee ballot one has asked for is slightly better than hit or miss.

But instead of resigning to a flawed system, absentee ballots were distributed at bus stops, and voting advocates asked to interrupt classes in order to register those who weren't. Student groups put money together and rented buses and a van to bring students to the polls. They were packed and carried an estimated 1,000 students to make their choices.

The UMass Dems called about 2,300 people from the University and the states of Pennsylvania and Virginia. They enjoyed the support of an active and well-populated base of volunteers who pushed the vote by wallpapering the campus with posters and a last-ditch rally through campus to round up those who had not already passed in their ballots.

The UMass Republican Club had a much smaller group, but the group's vice president, Brad DeFlumeri, said its last few weeks of tabling changed many minds that were wrestling with Question 1.

The election season discourse moved from lecture halls and classrooms to inhabit the Cape Cod Lounge and the Student Union Ballroom. Debates were must-see-TV in area bars and common knowledge by morning.

Tracie Konopinski, a campus organizer for MassPIRG, said students made their local presence felt.

"We've been talking to community members that have been voting at Bangs [Amherst Community Center] for over 10 years, and they said they've never seen this many students come out," she said.

Dave Sullivan, an Obama campaign organizer for Hampshire County said students were the true grassroots of his efforts – and that of the national push too.

"No one has been telling students what to do," he said. Sullivan added that they were the initiative.

He said we won our own democracy.

Call it a youth revolution, a takeover, an awakening. No, fireballs of toilet paper weren't lit in the Southwest Mall, but the State Police horses didn't rest in their stables. Regardless of who won and the reaction, many UMass students responded as participants in the contest rather than spectators.

Students get free ride

Malcolm Chu and Brendan Bowen rally students towards buses that gave University voters a free ride to the polls. An estimated 1,000 people used the service.

SGA buses UM residents to polling stations

By Lucas Correia
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association (SGA) organized rides for students from the University of Massachusetts campus to their respective polling places yesterday.

"The transportation is an exciting project of the SGA, and one which we put as a priority this year," said SGA President Malcolm Chu.

The effort has encouraged many on campus to take political action as U.S. citizens, and to utilize the power put in the hands of the masses.

"I'm taking advantage of what little power I do have in this country," said junior English major Hilary Gardiner. "I think there's a lot at stake in this election."

"I want to vote because I feel this is one of those elections where the young vote really could make it or break it," said sophomore astronomy major Patrick Ashland. "I feel it's very important we have such a high turnout of young voters in this specific election."

The SGA and other Registered Student Organizations have been politically active through the entire semester. Between September 2 and October 15, a coalition of the SGA, the Center for Educational Policy Advocacy (CEPA) and the UMass Labor Coalition, in a movement called "Get Out The Vote," registered roughly 1,000 UMass students to vote in Amherst and over 300 to vote in their hometowns. The coalition was formed with the goal of providing Amherst with UMass' largest voter turnout to ing the election, however, was the economy.

"I think the economy is on everyone's minds right now, just because it's so bad," said Patricia Johnson, a UMass student and Obama supporter. "Obama has a better economic plan. He's going to work to counter outsourcing jobs, and he won't raise taxes for people making fewer than $250,000. Basically, he's going to give us tax cuts, and that's a good thing."

Johnson was not alone in her opinion. Peterson gave her input on the role that economy would play in deciding the fate of the candidates.

"I economy, when it really tanked, was a new campaign," she said. "The out-party always has an advantage: it can blame the in-party."

However, she tried to make it clear that the economy was not going to be the deciding issue in the final results.

"Obama energized a lot of people, they would have been energized without the economy, but the economy made it so that he could grab independents and hurting Republicans," she said.

Overall, students felt comfortable with the way the election was heading after 9:30 p.m. Obama was leading the race with 207 electoral votes to McCain's 94, despite the fact that the popular vote was almost equal.

The event brought UMass students and faculty together to share in the excitement of this historical election. Hyland ended the night with a smile on his face, saying "I'm happy with the way things are going, the best man looks like he is going to win."

State votes to keep income tax and decriminalize marijuana

Eleven of those same 14 voters said they were in favor of voting "yes" on Question 2 to decriminalize marijuana. Two others planned to vote "no," while another said he was still undecided on Question 2.

Most of those opposed to Question 1, a proposal which would eliminate personal state income tax by 2010, noted the state's and country's declining economic status in explaining their vote.

"The budget is bad enough as it is," said Amherst resident Eric Johnson. "I think it [passing Question 1] would just exacerbate the situation."

Funding for state education was also a common concern.

"I don't want there to be cuts in public education," said Amherst resident Eboni Rafus.

Bryan Mari, a UMass senior majoring in plant and soil science, said he had a name for Question 1.

"I call it the 'shoot-Massachusetts-in-the-foot bill,'" he said.

The UMass Republican Club held an on-campus rally Monday and set up tables in the Campus Center Tuesday to encourage students to vote in favor of abolishing the state's income tax.

"Realistically, there is more focus on Question 1 than the candidates at this point," said Republican Club president Greg Collins. "The majority of the Republican club supports Question 1."

The UMass Democrats also did some last-minute campaigning in the Campus Center.

"We're all about Obama, but also very serious in our opposition to Question 1," said Charlie Felder, campaign coordinator for UMass Democrats.

Several of those who voted "yes" on Question 2 felt the penalties for marijuana possession were unfair.

"The penalty for marijuana possession is too steep and is focused more on penalizing than on reform," said Rafus. "I think our prison system is clogged up with too many drug offenders. We should focus on other, more serious crimes."

Others agreed that state law enforcement should focus on other priorities.

"I think the police arresting people for having marijuana are wasting time and money," said Lucy Perkins, a freshman biology major at UMass.

"There are lots of legal things that are worse than marijuana," said Zac Wolfman, after his first-time voting in a presidential election. Wolfman, a freshman at UMass, said he voted "yes" on Question 2 along with his parents, fellow Amherst residents Jeffrey and Bonnie.

When asked how important it was that he voted yesterday, 19-year-old turf grass management student Jarrod Shirley said, "Extremely important. Due to personal issues involving Question 2, I felt strongly that I needed to vote in favor of this question."

"Being in a college town, and with recreational use of marijuana prevalent in this area, I felt it was necessary and my obligation to vote on this issue," said Shirley a native of Norwell, Mass.

Though campaign paraphernalia and clothing is not allowed within 150 feet of any polling station, according to precinct constable Willie Wheeler, Brendan Bowen, a junior biology and economics major, found his own way to display his feelings on Question 2.

"On Question 2, let's be serious, I have hemp shoes on," said Bowen. Others opposed the ballot's second proposition.

"Marijuana leads to much worse drug addictions," said Johnson. "If 99 percent of the police force are against it, then so am I because they know better than I do."

UMass Dems 'rally for hope'

By Alyssa Creamer
Collegian Staff

Megaphone in left hand, Sen. Barack Obama promotional sign in right hand, University of Massachusetts freshman Guy McGuinn and his troupe of fellow UMass Democrats gathered a small following as they marched through campus reminding students to vote.

With high-fives from Obama supporters, and a few stray catcalls from McCain devotees, the group dubbed itself the "Rally for Hope," on Tuesday.

McGuinn planned the rally and he said his main goal was to "remind college students that it is their responsibility to mobilize and get out there and vote."

"Some people really did not know what was going on," he said. "Some student asked me just yesterday when he had to register to vote by. A lot of people, unfortunately, do not really care about politics until they feel that it affects them personally.

"The stereotypical image of the college student is that they live in this bubble and don't realize what is going on outside," McGuinn continued. "For this election particularly, it is no longer a matter of 'oh, I go to school, [politics] don't affect me.' We are all going to feel the pinch of economic crisis. Hopefully, that will mobilize students and encourage them to vote."

Starting at the Southwest convenience store at 10:50 a.m., the rally participants shouted "Vote Today" reminders as they walked to the Campus Center.

They also informed students that SGA was providing free bussing from the Campus Center circle to voting booths until 8 p.m.

At the Campus Center, the UMass Democrats and other volunteers began phone banking to encourage UMass students. They also called citizens in swing states Virginia and Pennsylvania. By 8 p.m. they had contacted nearly 2,300 people; 300 calls being to UMass students.

"Phone banking was pretty exhausting, but it has been very, very rewarding," said secretary of the UMass Democrats, junior Molly O'Grady. "As soon as we finished making calls to Pennsylvania, we heard that Pennsylvania got called for Obama. We were all so excited. It was great timing. It feels like all of the hard work that we put in has finally paid off. It's really surreal and amazing right now."

"The rally was a little smaller than I hoped for," said McGuinn. "But that doesn't matter. The people that were there really cared about what we were doing. All of us had been working tirelessly on this campaign. We were showing people that we're here, we care, we're changing history, and we're changing the world today. It's an incredible feeling to be a part of that."

In addition to countless hours of phone banking and the rally, UMass Democrats drove to New Hampshire the past several weekends on canvas trips to talk to people face-to-face about the election.

McGuinn said that he and other UMass Democrats spent a great deal of time discussing how "Obama represents a quality of leadership that has not been in American politics in a long time. He inspires people."

Texts answer voters' queries

By Gary Tarantino
Collegian Staff

The decision for the U.S. presidency was announced last night and the big question puzzling the minds of the voters is where did Democratic candidate Sen. Barack Obama meet his wife, Michelle, and where did Republican candidate Sen. John McCain meet his wife Cindy, right?

This may not have been a factor in deciding who we selected for the president, but it would be interesting to know the answer, wouldn't it?

Well thanks to a program called "kgb," questions not discussed in front of the cameras can be answered.

Kgb is the world's largest independent provider of directory assistance and enhanced information services.

This service provider answered voters' questions concerning the election with its text product, "kgbkgb!"

Kgbkgb is a text-based information service that uses real humans, "kgb agents", to answer voters' questions. By texting the number 542542 on a mobile phone, users can send their questions to a kgb agent who will then research the question and will reply a real response, as if the candidate was asked personally.

The service is available to any mobile service provider and comes at a cost of $.30 per question.

Text messaging service "kgb" provides voters with answers to election-related questions.

and answer, as well as standard text messaging rates apply.

Kgbkgb is available around the clock and can be a helpful assistant to those who are on-the-go and need immediate updates concerning the election.

Users have the ability to ask any type of question concerning the election, such as the candidates' viewpoints on certain key issues, or interesting trivia questions, such as personal information about the candidates.

To answer the question from above, Obama met his wife Michelle while she was employed as a corporate attorney with the law firm Sidley Austin.

McCain met his wife Cindy in an airline bathroom and said he immediately fell in love with her.

Other potentially interesting facts about the candidates the text messaging service provided were that Obama attended Columbia University in New York and McCain attended the United States Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md.

Also, the service said Obama prefers the tunes of Miles Davis and Bob Dylan, while McCain prefers the sounds of Neil Diamond and ABBA.

More relevant issues, according to kgbkgb, include McCain's government plans on the economy to maintain the tax cuts put in place under President George W. Bush.

Obama, on the other hand, plans to provide a tax cut for working families, and provide tax relief for small businesses and startups, said kgbkgb.

Concerning education, McCain plans to remove exces bureaucracy, empower parents, teachers and principals, while Obama plans to put billions of dollars into early childhood education, pay teachers more money and treat them more professionally, the service said.

In regards to the "War on Terror," McCain said, "It's not worth moving heaven and Earth, spending billions of dollars just to catch one person."

Obama plans to give health insurance to 47 million Americans immediately affected by the war, kgbkgb said.

Long lines for student voters

By Nina Heikkinen
Collegian Staff

At 8:15 a.m. on Election Day, the presidential election was in full swing. The line outside Precinct 2 on Eastman Lane wrapped around the side of the fitchburg as voters cast their ballots before starting their day.

Precinct warden, Isterica McGill, said that the polls were much busier than normal.

"I'm sure it's going on in all precincts, there are lots of new voters" she said.

The scene was similar down the road in Precinct 9 where many Central and Orchard Hill residents cast their ballots yesterday.

"I have never seen a line in my life to vote for president and I've been voting in Amherst for president since 1980," said Dade Singapur, 75, who said she waited 35 minutes to cast her ballot.

By 9 a.m. a steady flow of students from the University of Massachusetts turned out to vote at Precinct 9.

"I'm very excited to vote," said Elizabeth Maynard, sophomore who was voting for president for the first time.

Some voters cited their candidate of choice as a motive to make it to the polls on Tuesday.

"Obama is the leader for these times, I passionately hope that he will be elected," said John Coull as he exited the polls at Precinct 2.

"I like everything about him and it is historic to elect a black man who represents spectacular change," added 48-year-old John Swanson.

Keith Shannon, junior, didn't vote for either Obama or Republican candidate Sen. John McCain. Instead, he said he supported Cynthia McKinney, the candidate for the Green Party.

"I think the party system is the reason this country has as many problems as it does," said Shannon.

For Amherst voters like Cyrus Cox who grew up in the segregated South, this election was especially poignant.

"I picked cotton. I sat in the back of buses in the South," said Cox. "I had to drink at public fountains where colored and white were divided. I never thought I'd see this day. I never thought I'd see it."

Cox said he was 12 years old when Martin Luther King first came onto the scene.

"Voting was the first thing I did today," he said.

Voters also focused on ballot questions like Question 1, the proposition to eliminate the state income tax.

"It would be ridiculous to abolish the state income tax, we need to support social programs" said Swanson.

Charlotte de Vries 22, considered the prospect of Question 1 passing terrifying.

"School systems and health care would be negatively impacted. It's not going to benefit people," she said, estimating that any monetary benefits that people would receive from not having an income tax would be outweighed by harm eliminating the tax would cause.

Some supported Question 2, the initiative to make the possession of one ounce or less of marijuana a civil instead of criminal offense.

"It's just seems unfair that people get into too much trouble for not such a big deal," said senior Jesse Gordon. She said she thinks that most college students would support a change in the law.

However, some supporters of the Question 2 felt that those most likely to benefit from a change in the law would also be the least likely to go out and vote, potentially hurting the measure's chances of passing.

Sophomore Marissa Grenham said she voted against Question 3, an effort to make dog racing illegal in Massachusetts.

"I voted against it for economic reasons," Grenham said. "People will lose their jobs if they get rid of dog racing."

Grenham said she felt pressure to vote "yes" on Question 3 as an animal science major, but felt that, given the current state of the economy, economic concerns outweighed concerns about the welfare of the greyhounds.

Green question voted down

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts senior Jessica Ripley said she voted no on Question 4 because she did not want to see a hike in the Community Preservation Act surcharge.

Fellow senior Allie Losentloff said she voted yes on Question 4 because it's important to preserve open historic sites and open spaces. Amherst residents yesterday sided with the former and rejected the measure that would have doubled the CPA surcharge to three percent. The increase would have enabled the community to receive an additional $300,000 in matching funds each year from the state to pay for affordable housing and preservation of historic lands and open spaces.

The initiative narrowly failed at the voting booth yesterday, with 5,294 votes against and 5,122 in support, according to Gazettenet.com. The result resembled the Select Board's 2-2 split on the issue.

Opponents feared that the hike would put a further strain on families already on a tight budget due to a sour economy as well as enable potentially wasteful government spending, according to an Amherst Bulletin article by Stanley Gawle, spokesman for Amherst Taxpayers for Responsible Change.

In his article, published on Oct. 24, he touched on 11 reasons why he thought residents should vote no.

He argued that Amherst does not need any additional CPA tax money because if the CPA funds are not used to purchase the apartments on Main Street, there will be a surplus of $270,00 in the CPA account. He also said that Amherst taxpayers pay the second-highest property taxes in western Massachusetts, and that over the next four years Amherst's budget deficit is estimated to be $10.5 million, which could potentially result in a $2.5 million override and cost the average Amherst homeowner $400 more in property taxes each year.

Supporters said an increase would have cost an extra $48 a year – or $1.07 a week – for an owner-occupied $300,000 home and go toward creating affordable housing, making renovations to Amherst Town Hall and purchasing land for greenways and playing fields. Lower income residents and the first $100,000 of property value would have been exempt.

UMass business professor Anurag Sharma, a resident and Amherst Town Meeting member, said he voted yes because he saw the value an increase in the surcharge would have done.

"I think it's good for the town. It's going to preserve open spaces; it does community-friendly things. It's a little bit more expensive for the taxpayers, which was my one hesitation, especially with everybody feeling a little tight right now," he said. But he added that the increase would have been worth it.

Dana Gordon, who works at Berkshire Dining Commons, said, "I think that spending the money on preserving open land is a good thing." That's one of the things that nice about living in Amherst – we have such a broad stretch of open land, be it owned either by the town or also by Amherst College."

Students phone for Obama supporters

By Josh Walovitch
Collegian Staff

The student-run organizations UMass for Barack Obama, UMass Democrats and Massachusetts Student Public Interest Research Group have been working collectively to generate an impact on the presidential election.

UMass for Barack Obama, a chapter of a national organization comprised of hundreds of high school, college and graduate school students. Their mission is to change American politics by electing Sen. Obama.

This past week, the UMass chapter held two phone banks totaling thousands of calls to potential Obama voters, handed out hundreds of flyers around campus and bused students to New Hampshire, all in support for Obama.

"This is the easiest way students can make an impact on the election without devoting a whole day to it," said Matt Cadwallader, chapter coordinator for UMass for Barack Obama and vice president of UMass Democrats. "Phone banking allows students to take an hour between classes and actually make a substantial impact on the race."

Phone numbers were gathered directly from the Massachusetts Democratic Party and students reported to them every three hours informing them of the number of people contacted.

One phone bank was designated to calling students registered to vote by the SGA, MassPirg and UMass Democrats, and reminded them to vote, as well as provided them with information about the SGA-sponsored free rides to the polls.

Another phone bank focused on calling swing states, making sure they know where their polling locations are and what time their polls close.

"New Hampshire has been our greatest focus over the course of the campaign due to sheer proximity," said Caldwallader. "We have made several trips up there over the course of the campaign and have spent a lot of time calling New Hampshire voters. Recently, we've expanded our efforts to other states as well. I have spoken with folks from North Carolina, Colorado and Montana."

Media and publicity coordinator for UMass for Barack Obama, Ashley Coulombe commented on the idea that some students believe their vote is insignificant because of, what she said, is Massachusetts' political tendency to be very liberal.

"Yeah, we're probably going to go for Obama, but elections aren't solely about the top office," Coulombe said. "There are several races and questions that will have an enormous impact on Massachusetts residents. Question 1 could destroy the Massachusetts economy and Question 2 could save many non-violent marijuana users from a criminal record, thus saving their financial aid and ability to adopt in the future."

UMass students may be affected by this election on both a local and national level. Funding has recently been cut due to the recent economic crisis and some critics are concerned with the potential of more budget cuts.

"For a long time politicians have ignored the plight of young people in general and why shouldn't they?" Cadwallader asked. "Politicians rely on the support of their voting constituents and young people simply don't vote. Your voice won't be heard if you choose not to speak. That could change in this election, and I sincerely hope it does."

Campus gets a lift to cast election ballots

"Active citizens take action to hold our politicians, systems and government accountable, but the first step is voting," said Chu before directing the carpool at Campus Center Circle with a megaphone. "I'm really excited about the turnout so far, and I look forward to the rest of the afternoon."

He also said the SGA has collected between 2,500 and 3,000 pledge cards during the "Get Out The Vote" campaign.

"It was really about getting out awareness as well," he said. "Thousands and thousands of students are seeing this presence [of free rides]. I think there's a psychological piece to it when people think 'Oh, I can do this. It's accessible.'"

"I feel like it's part of my duty as a SGA member," said junior astronomy major Shane Coleman, secretary of diversity for the SGA. "The students are who we care about... part of our general cause is to help students know what's going on."

Other RSOs on campus, including MASSPIRG, University Democrats and the Cannabis Reform Coalition, have also registered students, bringing the total number to roughly 3,500 new voters registered for Amherst and about 1,000 absentee ballots.

Efforts to increase voter awareness included speaking in lecture halls before class, going door-to-door in residential halls, or "dorm storming," posting flyers and phone banking to remind people to vote on Election Day.

Some students on campus feel the effort has made a genuine difference in the number of UMass students who turned out to vote.

Senior plant and soil science major Bryan Man said if the SGA did not provide rides, he probably wouldn't have voted.

"My day is pretty busy, and I don't know where to vote," he said. "I don't know if I ever would've filled out the paperwork if not for student organization efforts on campus."

"I would've walked there if I had to," said sophomore history major Chris Negro. "But I think a lot of kids wouldn't have the incentive to vote if they didn't have an easy way to get there."

"I think it'll make a big difference [in UMass' voter turnout]," said junior plant and soil sciences major Tim Drake, who drove students to their polling locations for Field Trip Services this morning. "I think it's great to provide this service, it'll make more people want to go out and vote."

The buses and vans, funded by the SGA in coordination with Field Trip Services and the University Democrats, ran from Campus Center Circle to the three designated polling locations for the UMass campus from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m. Buses transported students to the Bangs Community Center and Wildwood Elementary School, while vans took students to the Immanuel Lutheran Church.

"Hopefully this will get everyone to the polls," junior biology major Brendan Bowen said on his way back from his polling location. "It's easy, and takes virtually no time out of the day. I met a bunch of great people in the van, and it's a good time."

Students pack into a bus rented especially for Election Day. Three routes took them to area voting areas.

Few know local candidates

Local reps. unknown to voters

By S.P. Sullivan and Shalini Jayarama
Collegian Staff

Incumbent John Olver (D, Amherst) may have won the race for state representative of the first congressional district, but many students at the University of Massachusetts didn't know who he was.

UMass students arrived in droves – many in busses paid for by the Student Government Association – to polling places in the Amherst area, including the Bangs Community Center and Wildwood Elementary School.

But while many turned out to vote for their preferred presidential candidate or to weigh in on ballot questions, few polled were well-acquainted with candidates running for the House or Senate.

Area voters had the opportunity to vote for the Senator in General Court of the Hampshire and Franklin District. Incumbent Stanley C. Rosenberg overtook Republican Keith C. McCormic, a UMass alum.

Olver ran for re-election to the House against Rep. Nathan Bech, a U.S. army veteran and West Springfield native.

Elisha Preston, press secretary for the Bech, said the campaign saw an influx of student involvement in the summer months.

"College-age people put in an enormous effort at Nathan's office, especially in the summer months," said Preston. "We've had people working for as volunteers, interns and filling paid jobs."

But many students polled at precincts yesterday were in the dark.

UMass student Alyssa Solomon said she hadn't heard about either House candidate until right before the election.

"I started asking people in my dorm who they were voting for and why," she said.

UMass student Keith Boyle said he hadn't followed the representative race.

"Originally I was going to vote absentee," he said.

Boyle, a McCain supporter, said he voted for the challenger Bech to offset the Commonwealth's tendency towards blue.

"The state's too Democratic," Boyle said.

Several students also admitted that they were not familiar with the two Senate candidates.

"Honestly, I haven't heard of either candidate. I didn't [vote] because I didn't know," said senior Vlada Ushrenkl.

Ushrenkl was among several students who opted out of voting for Congressional candidates for lack of information.

"I left it blank because I have no idea who they are," said Chakdor Lokyitsanj. "If you don't know it defeats the purpose."

"If you get people voting for someone they don't know, it makes the results faulty," said UMass student Aron Tansae.

UMass students Meagan Day and Evan Serio, standing outside the polling location at Wildwood Elementary School, said both candidates missed an opportunity to gain easily-obtained votes from the University's 18,000 students.

"Even if a candidate said to a student, 'Hey, I'm running,' that student would say, 'Well, I met that guy, so I might as well vote for him,'" said Day.

Serio said that while campaign literature for both candidates and the first two ballot questions were readily available on campus, information on state and local candidates and local initiatives was hard to come by.

"I was literally 30 meters from Wildwood property when my friend asked me, 'Do you know about questions one through four?' and I didn't know," he said.

Education: cost and value

Parisa Saranj

The current state of economy is affecting every aspect of our lives. Though it might seem a minor effect or even invisible at times, many future decisions are evolving around the affordability of things.

I chose to pursue a journalism major at any school on the East Coast in order to experience the vibe of media and communication at its center. I decided that no matter what, I would not allow money to become a hindrance.

For many, however, cost is a primary concern in choosing college. According to an article on Boston.com by Peter Schworm, "Some educators fear that a sustained economic downturn will make colleges, particularly smaller schools that depend heavily on tuition, more dependent on students who can pay full freight, and less able to meet full financial need."

There are some other colleges that are looking forward to continuing their already existing financial aid practices, and do not fear any major changes in their admissions.

According to a survey by MeritAid.com, more than fifty percent of students are considering less costly colleges, no matter how prestigious. Another survey, conducted by an online college admissions counseling service, suggests that half of all families "are limiting their child's college choices to less expensive options and more than half are considering in-state, public colleges."

In the midst of this economy crisis, and different predictions for the future of the financial crisis in colleges, even our own UMass has been somewhat effected. Schworm writes that UMass' fall open house brought more than 5,000 prospective students to campus, which exceeds the numbers in previous years.

On the other hand, the Oct. 15 Statement from Chancellor Robert C. Holub on state budget cuts, which addressed the campus community, was not as scary as it could have been. With all the confidence that Holub had in a team-work effort including student, staff and faculty, he announced "one-time cuts to campus units" and "a halt to most hirings."

This meant that there will be no change in the fees or financial aids in the middle of school year. Yet, even Chancellor Holub wasn't sure about the future.

Schworm acknowledges that the enrollment at state public colleges rose sharply this fall. Administrators believe that this increase is due to the slumping economy.

I have come to realize that one can find good education anywhere. If one is willing to hunt for it, the resources will not be rare.

For UMass in particular, the enrollment number for total undergraduates is 20,539 ,with a total cost of $18,346 for in-state students. With the required average GPA of 3.5 and SAT score of 1,155, there is a question of what makes students enroll at UMass. The claims some have made might seem like it is the state of economy which leads to the final decision. But it is notable that, despite the increasing amount of applications sent to UMass in recent years, only about 63 percent of students are accepted, which is less than in the past.

Do these numbers mean that UMass is a cheap place to get a degree from, or a credible institution to be educated in?

I have been told by some graduates that UMass is a good school. But not only they have expressed their satisfaction over the cost of education at this institute, but also they have pointed to the value of education this place has been to giving them their knowledge. At the same time, there have been graduates who were happy enough to pay for school. To them, once a student is decades away from college years, it is the real life experience that matters, not where a degree was earned.

At the same time, I have come to realize that one can find good education anywhere. If one is willing to hunt for it, the resources will not be rare. This, of course, does not mean that educators and officials can take advantage of such a fact and fail to provide the best of education and resources to the student. It is just that the younger generation seem to be looking for excuses to not learn. For example, the American Council on Education reported in its 23rd annual status report on the diversification of American colleges and universities, in August, that the younger generation of adults in the United States has lower educational attainment than the older generation.

Here are many questions that come to my mind. Is this decrease in seeking knowledge via higher education due to the cost? Or is this due the lack of motivation, which is replaced by video games and iPods among our youth?

Whether it is to choose a school based on its valuable education or attend college for the sake of a cheap degree, it is important to note that all these aspects function hand in hand and not separately.

This brings me to a quote by the vice president for enrollment management at Northeastern University, Philomena Mantella: "With a doubt, price will be on families' minds. But they are sophisticated consumers. They will look beyond the price. Value is what really drives decisions."

9/11 forgotten, a look at national security

Brad DeFlumeri

As of this writing, we do not yet know who the next president of the United States will be, but the celebration from all across the media for Barack Obama's seemingly inevitable victory has been pronounced and consistent for about a week now. And, regrettably, Senator McCain has surely fought an uphill battle with a campaign organization as ineffective and disoriented as President Bush's was formidable in 2000 and 2004.

It appears as though Senator McCain's 2nd biggest political liability in this election season – his first being the unjustified unpopularity of President Bush and the administration's tenuous, Democrat-concocted connection to our slumping economy – has been his own campaign.

In this sense, if you are reading this, wondering how Senator Obama snatched defeat from the smiling jaws of victory, then Senator McCain will have triumphantly won a close election in spite of his own campaign's performance.

In particular, the Republican National Committee and McCain's campaign glaringly failed to make the connection between liberal Democratic policies under Presidents Carter and Clinton and the implosion of the housing market which started the economic downtown thereby propelling Senator Obama to significant leads in many battleground states in September. Had Senator McCain's team more aggressively portrayed Senator Obama as the cookie-cutter radical leftist that he is and leveraged the political capital available after the economic downtown against the Democratic Party, then this election ought to have broken sharply in Senator McCain's favor.

But to his credit, Senator Obama used his smoke, mirrors and class warfare approach to run an historically well-financed and well-organized campaign, and, win or lose, his campaign will be remembered favorably for the way it propelled a first-term Senator with no legislative achievements of which to speak, to international superstardom and domestic presidential campaign legitimacy – no small feat.

An attack on a major American city tomorrow would clarify this thinking and refocus us on the world in which we currently live.

Nevertheless, regardless of who has emerged in what many consider an 'epic' presidential election, my instinct tells me that the next president will deal with a significant and transcendent event within the first year of his presidency, as President Bush did nine months after taking office in 2001.

And contrary to Senator Biden's irresponsible pronouncement about this issue a few weeks ago, this event will not necessarily be in response to Senator Obama's inexperience and lack of foreign policy expertise. Instead, this humble scribe sees a remarkably dangerous turn in our national dialogue from collective patriotism and American resolve – as best demonstrated by President Bush's inspiring response in speeches and memorials to 9/11 - seven years ago to a sense of self-pity, defeatism, and hysterical self-analysis.

America needs to be fixed so badly, the media has told us, that domestic issues clearly trump national security concerns in this election. An attack on a major American city tomorrow would clarify this thinking and refocus us on the world in which we currently live – one in which our enemies are sensing our weakness and clamoring for an Obama victory.

Public opinion polls suggest that Americans are at a national low point both in terms of confidence in their government and optimism for the next four years. As our military fought bravely in Iraq and Afghanistan, the climate of political dialogue during the last presidential debate in mid-October failed to produce even the most scant mention of our ongoing wars and the national security challenges that the next president will face. The collective pessimism about domestic issues is partly to blame for our turn away from national security discussions, but the liberal media has no doubt done its part to shape these discourses. One poll that I found conspicuously absent during election season was this: which president candidate makes you prouder to be an American?

And this mindset shift has contributed to the popularity of Senator Obama, who has made clear his willingness to tell us America's faults before its strengths. More importantly, our inability to remember how the nation felt on 9/11 and in the months after will imperil us during the next four years to an extent that we do not yet realize. Our collective resolve seven years ago has disintegrated into a liberal-induced hysteria over how badly we need to fix America and pull our troops back within our borders. Our enemies, as evidenced most recently by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's happiness over a potential Obama presidency, could not be more thrilled by the status quo in this country of fear and uncertainty.

The change in our national temperament and failure to recognize national security as the defining issue for our generation is best expressed by this wild-eyed screed from Tuesday's New York Times editorial page: "We don't know all of the ways that the administration has violated Americans' rights in the name of fighting terrorism."

And, we don't know how many American lives have been saved by the Bush administration's aggressiveness in fighting terrorism around the world. His leadership on this issue has been legendary.

Sadly, our media ensures voters will not have this on the forefront of their mind, and an Obama administration – which running away from President Bush's policies and philosophy at warp speed – may not be nearly as successful in keeping our country safe.

At UMass, finding freedom in fraternity

Max Leabo

I am a frat boy. And yes I live in one of 'those' frats, where there are clothes, empty beer containers and occasionally car parts strewn on our lawn, even on a weekday morning. It's a breeding ground for the alcohol-fueled denizens of UMass's nightlife. It's the kind of house so thick with filth that many of the stains on the wall are now load bearing. It's a place where decorum and decency are just words. It is my home.

To be a frat boy at UMass is to be idealized, exaggerated and vilified simultaneously. There is always a series of half-truths and myths attached. I have never paddled anyone, nor have I or anyone in my house ever even seen a rookie. I am not failing out, but am in Commonwealth College and will likely graduate Summa Cum Laude in a heavy science major.

But there is some truth to stereotypes. I am hung-over while writing this. I have a strong weakness for women which tends to manifest itself as womanizing, and my relationship with UMass Police is less than amiable. I am typical, if not tame. Many of my friends in the house are on probation, and their drinking and sexual exploits put me to shame. They are people though, not to be measured by their police record or bedpost notches.

I've seen hippies and conservatives pass through our doors, geniuses and idiots alike. We have faithful boy-friends and non-drinkers walking among the standard debauchers. We have tutors and ComCol members sharing the same house as self-proclaimed dropouts. The residents of the house are future artists, farmers, engineers, businessmen and politicians, returning exchange students and students coming from abroad first experiencing American culture.

The question "why?" arises. Why do these often respectable students choose to spend some of the best years of their life here? Why not go elsewhere and attempt a normal life? It's because the frat house is freedom and it's one of the few remaining true bastions of freedom at UMass.

In 1984 the drinking age was raised to 21 across America as an attempt to reduce drunk driving. The attempt failed but the law remains, and students across UMass suffer the consequences every weekend. Marijuana is no more toxic and far less addictive than a cigarette habit, and less debilitating than heavy drinking. Yet, barring a certain outcome in yesterday's vote, it is a criminal charge that results in black market dealings, arrests, expulsions, ruined futures and, on a bad day, stabbings.

Behind these seedy frat house walls there is freedom. There is no chance of anyone searching and seizing without consent.

We live on a campus patrolled by two police departments, and arrests are made in batches. It's a place where you should always smile, because you are always on camera. I've seen cops search dorm rooms with no warrant, relying on intimidating green students. I've seen plain-clothes officers push passing students after a good night for the Sox and gas students trying to get back to their dorms, nearly starting a riot themselves. I've heard police call peaceful protests from the G&O riots and sweep dorm floors with drug-sniffing dogs.

It's a crime to make too much noise, to walk outside with a Solo cup in hand, to do anything counter to the propaganda that graces nearly every PVTA bus. This overregulation goes double for the dorms, where candles and hotplates are contraband, and an empty bottle is the equivalent of a smoking gun. These rules do not guard us, and they do not help us. They save no lives. Cops have come to my old dorm room when we called to help a passed out puking friend. After taking names and ID numbers they left; no ambulance ever arrived. RAs have sent friends of mine, who never drank a drop in their life, to alcohol training because they were in the wrong room at the wrong time. These are not laws for the greater good, they are rules for the sake of rules.

But behind these seedy frat house walls there is freedom. There is no chance of anyone searching and seizing without consent. No one knocks on doors demanding that the volume be turned down. There is no discrimination based on your past or personal habits. There is no need to close doors because there is no reason to hide.

Yes, you can drink in the open and smash the bottle. Or you could, as one brother has, use the remnants of every party, remnants that would be damning evidence dorm side, for a final art project. We cannot judge because we are stunt definitely not without sin. And thus, any transgressions we will have to let slide. On this small piece of property there are no cameras and no intrusion. There is peace.

When UMass is no longer suspicious of any student it admits there will be no need for us. But until then there will always be students of any color or creed who need to escape. And as long as our door isn't boarded up we will offer what liberty we can to anyone who passes under our letters. Just don't ask about the smell.

An open discussion, an honest response

Matt Kushi

Throughout the school year, we, the students of the University of Massachusetts, are sometimes subjected to boring lectures. Other times, we may find a class to be very interesting and inspiring. When a class achieves the latter status, it means that the professor has delivered the lesson in an interesting manner that deviated from the structural norm of a monotonous lecture.

This past Thursday, the students of Management 301 were treated to such a lecture. It was a lecture that deserves to be applauded and deserves to be noticed in a public manner.

Instead of going over PowerPoint slides and talking about the theories of management, the class listened to a panel of University of Massachusetts professors and staff talk about their lives.

As a student in this class, I was subjected to this simple yet powerful discussion about life in general.

The members of this panel were Dr. Steve Jefferson (Undergraduate Director for Sport Management), Mr. Melvin Rodriguez (Director of Academic Support and Diversity in the Isenberg School of Management), Mr. Larry Zacharias (Associate Professor of Management in ISOM), and Mrs. Susan Milne (Manager of Information Technology). The discussion was moderated by Mr. Scott Nielson from the Department of Education at UMass.

Each of these individuals brought a unique story to the discussion that showed what has made them who they are and the obstacles that they have overcome to become successful managers. The topics that were covered in this moving discussion were overcoming stereotypes, religious divides, racism, sexism, and social prejudices.

What this panel represented to me was the hope and the future fights for our generation.

While I commend this panel for being rich with enlightenment, there is another thing that could have been added to this panel to make it more complete. That would be to have somebody on the panel to discuss the obstacles faced by those with disabilities and how one can power their way through that obstacle and inspire the world just like any other person fighting a prejudice.

While there were many lessons that I learned from this discussion, for I cannot speak for others, one that struck me was the personal level that these individuals went to convey their inspirational message.

We know these panel members as heads of departments, advisors, or professors. As students, we tend to only see them as that; we forget that they are humans just like us and that they have had people inspire them, hurt them, and drive them to be better. We sometimes lose sight of the fact that they have had to work as hard as we work now to get to where they are at.

I have found that it is easier to understand a professor when they are interesting and you know a little bit about them. It makes them seem more human, I suppose. With this discussion, our class got to know these individuals better.

What this panel provided was not only insight about themselves, but about the world as well. These individuals that make up this panel are only small representations of millions of people in the world. That is another lesson that this discussion was meant to show us.

The point of this panel was to teach us the life lesson that anything is possible if you work to accomplish your goals. It also shows the prejudices that exist in this world through the event of those that teach us.

What this panel represented to me was the hope and the future fights for our generation. Just like the generations before us, we are on the brink of inheriting a lot of the world's wrongs.

These are problems that we must solve and the recent events within our own country show this. Even President Abraham Lincoln who once said, "a house divided against itself cannot stand." A message that I took from this panel was that it was supposed to inspire us to fight against the wrongs of the world and within our own country that hold so many people prisoner.

For in the end, it does not matter whether a person is white or black. It does not matter where a person comes from or what obstacles they may have to face. It doesn't matter if a person is a gay, lesbian or straight. In the end, the common factor that bonds us all is that we strive to matter – if not to others than to ourselves. That is a message that this panel was trying to convey.

What this panel was ultimately about was to inspire us to be our best, just like the individuals on this panel are. It was also a view of long term goals for us to shoot for within ourselves and in the world.

The Breakfast dressed in costumes and encouraged their fans to come out in costumes on Thursday night at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton. The theme for the night was cartoons and the band took it upon themselves to play theme songs from cartoon television shows.

Breakfast and cartoons all in one concert

BY ELLIE RULON-MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NORTHAMPTON — The Breakfast played their tenth anniversary show last Thursday at the Iron Horse Music Hall. It was the band's first show since the replacement of former keyboardist Matt Oestreicher with Todd Stoops, keyboardist for RAQ.

The Breakfast played some of their earliest shows ten years ago in the Butterfield dorm at the University of Massachusetts.

Having been scheduled at the end of October just before Halloween, the show had a theme for attendees to dress up in costume. The theme was cartoons, but some chose to extend their options to television shows in general.

Standing in line outside were three yips from "Sesame Street" and a bald man with Homer Simpson's hair drawn around his head in black marker. Waiting to use the bathroom, another man was dressed as Mr. Cheese from the "Wacky Deli" episode of "Rocko's Modern Life" — he had a sign on his back reading "I am the cheese. I am the best character on this show. I am better than the salami and the bologna combined."

The band was also in costume. Guitarist and vocalist Tim Palmieri was dressed as Inspector Gadget. Bassist Chris DeAngelis was clad in an apron and a chef's hat as Chef from "South Park." Drummer Chris DeAngelis was a Smurf. Stoops rocked the keyboard as Superman.

The set list went along with the show's theme. Aside from original songs, The Breakfast also played songs from several old cartoons. "Beavis and Butthead," "Duck Tales," "Mighty Mouse," "Pink Panther" (Palmieri also played saxophone for this one), "Transformers," "G.I. Joe," "Ren and Stimpy" and "Alvin and the Chipmunks."

Seeing The Breakfast live is a unique experience to have. A lot of the people who go have seen the band dozens of times. Fans know each other either from seeing them at shows or from the band's message boards, which often give live updates during concerts. There is generally an easygoing sense of community among fans.

There were several complaints had by fans, however, though they did not reflect the band's performance. The Breakfast has an archivist at every show to record and later post the recording online for free download. After some coercion from the band, Iron Horse management allowed the archivist to record, though he could not use any microphone stands and subsequently had to stand still, holding up microphones for the duration of the show. The venue also takes a percentage of profits from the sale of merchandise, and the doors opened a half hour later than was planned.

Though fans were displeased with the venue and its management, the response to The Breakfast was overwhelmingly positive. They jammed from their original song "Rufus" into the "Beavis and Butthead" theme song and then into another of their own songs, "What The Funk."

The band jammed on their song "Buquebus" for what felt like thirty minutes — this was a half hour of pure perfection and face-melting rock. The Breakfast is a jam band that can actually jam. They do not sound repetitive or boring, even when they are going on the same song for an extended period of time. Don't let the "jam band" connotation fool you, though. They are by no means a rip-off of Phish or The Grateful Dead.

The Breakfast are a genre in of their own, and are experts when it comes to improvising music.

Franchise keeps on rolling

'Saw V' is another poor sequel in series

BY JUSTIN GAGNON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

What do "Halloween," "Friday the 13th," "A Nightmare on Elm Street," and "Saw" all have in common? They are all successful horror films turned franchises that started with a bang and declined with every sequel.

This trend is far from being a coincidence. John Carpenter (Halloween), Sean S. Cunningham (Friday the 13th), and James Wan (Saw) each, with the exception of Craven (Nightmare on Elm Street) who directed one more Nightmare film called "New Nightmare," did not direct any sequels.

The latest in the "Saw" franchise is directed by David Hackl, the previous Production Designer for "Saw II" through "Saw IV." It is his first time behind the camera and it really shows.

Returning for the fifth time in the series are both Shawnee Smith (Amanda) and Tobin Bell (John Kramer / Jigsaw). For those who do follow the series faithfully and haven't seen "Saw V" yet, don't worry, they don't come back from the dead. They simply appear in flashbacks.

Other returning cast members include Costas Mandylor (Detective Hoffman), Betsy Russell (Jill Tuck) and Scott Patterson (Agent Strahm). There are, as always, quite a few new no-name actors added to the plot, but the only slightly notable one is Meagan Good (Stomp the Yard, You Got Served).

The film starts off with a quick recap of the endings of "Saw IV" and "Saw III." Agent Strahm ends up in the "Sick Room" of "Saw III" where Jigsaw had just been killed.

Sure enough, he finds himself in a life or death game of his own. Hoffman, who of course we find out in "Saw IV" is now Kramer's apprentice, walks out of the building in which all of the commotion had just happened as the "only one to survive." To his surprise he turns and sees Strahm on a stretcher. During Strahm's recovery, he begins to put the pieces together to solve the riddle of who is Jigsaw's new apprentice.

Avid and loyal "Saw" fans want answers. The best thing about this franchise is its puzzles and cliffhangers. The worst thing about the latest "Saw" is that it opens more doors than it closes. This is simply setting up more movies in the "Saw" franchise. Some things they didn't tell the audience before are revealed, but it is only to press the series into new possibilities.

The series doesn't have much going for it with its D-list actors and outlandish plot lines, so it is imperative that it at least keeps its fans interested in what is going to happen next, while answering questions left up in the air in previous movies. "Saw IV," while a pretty bad movie, did both of those things and kept its fans satisfied. Whereas "Saw V" does neither.

See SAW on page 8

Scott Patterson plays Agent Strahm who tries to solve the mystery of who is Jigsaw's apprentice in "Saw V." The movie works as another part in the franchise allowing for more sequels.

Political tactics being used to market soccer across America

BY PATRICK GOLDSTEIN
LOS ANGELES TIMES

HOLLYWOOD — Since he closed up Revolution Studios, Joe Roth has kept his hand in the movie business. He's got projects at Sony, Fox and Disney, where he's producing Tim Burton's vision of "Alice in Wonderland."

But he's spending most of his time with his new love, commuting up to Seattle, where he's the majority owner of the Seattle Sounders FC, the new Major League Soccer expansion team that begins play in spring 2009. A lifelong sports junkie – he spent years coaching his son's soccer team, has courtside Los Angeles Lakers seats and knows lots of obscure baseball stats – Roth has discovered that soccer is a great laboratory to test out both Internet-community-based marketing and Hollywood-style glitz.

Roth also makes the tantalizing case that the popularity of soccer in America has a lot in common with the groundswell of support for Sen. Barack Obama's presidential campaign. Roth is not a neutral political observer. It was Roth, along with David Geffen, Jeffrey Katzenberg and Steven Spielberg, who organized Obama's first major Hollywood fundraiser early last year, when Obama was 20 points behind Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in the polls. Roth sees soccer as appealing to the same fast-growing demographic groups that have been at the center of Obama's campaign.

"If you took a map of America where Obama is strongest and laid it over a map of where soccer has its biggest appeal, you'd see an incredible overlap," he said. "The blue states on both coasts are very soccer-friendly as well as huge areas of support for Obama, whereas the center of the country is full of people who are the enemies of soccer and Obama – white, 50-and-over guys who listen to talk radio and only care about football or basketball."

Before he bought the Sounders, whose minority owners include comedian Drew Carey, Microsoft co-founder Paul Allen and Adrian Hanauer (who owned Seattle's minor league soccer franchise), Roth did homework into soccer's key areas of demographic appeal. "The way America is changing in its ethnicity – becoming more Latino and African-American – is going to make soccer a major sport in the same way those ethnic shifts are helping Obama. Soccer's fastest growth is in liberal, better-educated cities, places like Seattle, Portland, Boston, Vancouver, Montreal and Los Angeles. All you have to do is look at the MLS crowds – they're young, they're noisy and they're not that different from the youthful spirit you'd see at an Obama rally."

If Obama wins Tuesday's election, analysts will give much of the credit not just to the candidate but also to his enormously effective political machine, which has used the Internet to boost fundraising and create a loyal, engaged community of potential voters. Roth has been using similar techniques to launch his soccer club, which has already set an MLS record by pre-selling more than 17,000 season tickets. When it came time to make the new team's pitch to soccer fans in Seattle, Roth soaked up the lessons his partner Hanauer has learned as a Web entrepreneur.

A longtime Seattle community force, Hanauer was an early investor in aQuantive, an Internet ad company that was sold to Microsoft in 2007 for $6 billion.

"Adrian taught me we had to give the fans a real stake in the process," Roth explained. "When we were debating what to name the team, we finally agreed to let the fans decide. Whatever they come up with is fine."

The fans voted overwhelmingly to keep the Sounders name, which had been the name of the minor league team.

Roth also adopted a model used by Spanish soccer clubs. Sounders ticket holders are part of a membership group that meets on a quarterly basis in a 7,000-seat theater next to the club's stadium. It's not just a way for them to idly voice complaints or advice; every four years they are allowed to take a vote deciding whether the team's general manager keeps his job.

"I told Adrian: 'The good news is that you're my general manager,'" Roth recalled, "'but the bad news is that you have a bull's-eye on your back.'"

'Saw V' missing many pieces

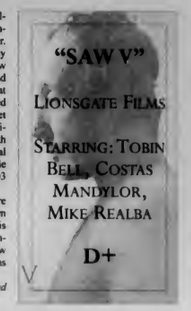
The Richard Roeper-coined phrase "torture porn" has been directly associated with the "Saw" franchise. A lot of people see the series as trash because of its excessive gore and torture sequences.



The "Saws" are unique in a sense that they are less formulaic in their plot scheme. The idea of Jigsaw not actually killing people, but rather trying to give them a twisted opportunity to repent for their personal flaws is quite distinct from classic thrasher movies where there's one villain who kills for the sake of killing and/or revenge.

While the gore is undoubtedly extreme, it is artistic in its creativity and realism.

The low budgets of these movies makes for another quite astounding feat. According to fear.net, the "Saw" franchise is merely $30 million away from become the highest grossing horror franchise ever. Considering "Saw VI" is already in the works, and rumors of a "Saw VII" fluttering around blogs and threads all over the Internet, that $30 million seems to be reached inevitably. "Saw V" had a budget of just $10.8 million, and nearly tripled that it's opening weekend with just over $30 million. The original "Saw," which had an unbelievable $1.2 million budget, grossed $103 million worldwide.

Many may not enjoy the gore or torture scenes, and just deem the series as stupid, but it truly is remarkable what the "Saw" franchise has done with a very low budget, bad actors, tons of gallons of fake blood and a great idea.

Writer brings Lincoln to life

BY BOB THOMPSON
THE WASHINGTON POST

WASHINGTON – It doesn't look like much, this modest patch of green in Washington. There's a flagpole, a couple of Civil War artillery pieces and a few yards of carefully reconstructed earthworks. Stand behind those Fort Stevens earthworks with James McPherson, however, and you can time-travel back to the bloody summer of 1864.

And imagine this: The tall guy with the gaunt face and the awesome responsibilities is standing right beside you.

"Lincoln was here, and he watched real infantry fighting going on out there," McPherson says. He gestures past Rittenhouse Street toward Georgia Avenue, which was open farmland at the time.

The occasion of the fighting was the sudden, scary move toward Washington of some 15,000 Confederates under Gen. Jubal Early. Lincoln rode out to Fort Stevens on both days of the encounter, July 11 and 12, to observe. Each time, someone had to tell him politely or otherwise – to keep his fool head down.

McPherson is maybe eight inches shorter than Lincoln, but the bright red shirt he's wearing would make him a pretty good target himself. The nation's best-known Civil War historian has the silver hair befitting a man of 72 but the energy of someone at least a decade younger – a payoff, perhaps, for a lifetime devoted to work he loves.

He's driven down from Princeton, N.J., as part of the tour for his latest book, "Tried by War: Abraham Lincoln as Commander in Chief." And he's been lured to Fort Stevens because it's as good a place as any to ponder the way Lincoln performed that sometimes overlooked role.

By July 1864, McPherson says, the president "had been sending men into combat for three years." In the course of those years, he'd "learned that the professionals weren't that much smarter than he was in terms of formulating strategy, even operations, even tactics."

In the aftermath of Fort Stevens, Lincoln saw the professional soldiers fail him once again.

Over and over, when a Confederate army took the offensive, Lincoln saw it "as an opportunity rather than a threat," McPherson says. Over and over, most famously after the battles of Antietam and Gettysburg, slow-moving Union generals failed to destroy their overextended enemy. Now here was another target of opportunity.

Once Early's surprise thrust had been blocked (by troops dispatched from Virginia by Gen. Ulysses S. Grant), Lincoln wanted him taken out.

Didn't happen.

In the end, McPherson says, the frustrated president did get some results. He demanded a meeting with Grant, who put the youthful Gen. Philip Sheridan in charge of a reorganized force that eventually destroyed Early's army in the Shenandoah Valley.

And none too soon. For to consider Early's attack on Washington is to highlight another aspect of Lincoln's perilous situation in the summer of 1864. If the commander in chief couldn't report some better military news, angry Northern voters seemed likely to relieve him of his job.

"Coming off the victories of the second half of 1863," McPherson says, "and now with Grant and Sherman in top commands, there was widespread expectation in the North that these two heavy hitters were going to win the war by the Fourth of July." But both appeared bogged down, with Grant taking horrific losses in Virginia.

Then came the Early raid. Northerners went to bed one evening "thinking they were about to capture Richmond, and suddenly they find that the Confederates are threatening Washington."

"I mean, that's a shock. And the shock is a political shock."

Lincoln's political opponents, the Democrats, nominated Gen. George McClellan for president and adopted a platform that called for an armistice so peace negotiations could begin.

Meanwhile, Lincoln was under enormous pressure to drop the second of his stated preconditions for any negotiations: that the South agree to restore the Union and abolish slavery. He refused. "What he's saying in August of 1864," the historian explains, is that "he'd rather be right than president" on the issue of emancipation.

As McPherson writes in "Tried by War," this decision was both principled and practical: "Lincoln pointed out that one hundred thousand or more black soldiers and sailors were fighting for the Union," and he would be "damned in time and eternity" if he betrayed them.

Fortunately for Lincoln, Sherman captured Atlanta in early September and, before long, Sheridan was winning dramatic victories in the Shenandoah. Lincoln's re-election was assured.

As it happens, McPherson's great-grandfather served as a white officer in a black regiment, the 22nd U.S. Colored Troops, with whom he saw fighting on the Richmond front. But McPherson didn't learn this until he'd already become a historian.

He got turned on to history at Gustavus Adolphus, a small liberal arts college in Minnesota. In grad school at Johns Hopkins, he began to home in on the Civil War. "I was there during the civil rights movement," he says, and the fact that it was "trying to achieve the unfinished business from the 1860s" intrigued him.

His first book was on the abolitionists. After it was accepted for publication, he got a call from Andre Schiffrin at Pantheon Books. Schiffrin had noticed that during the noisy public celebration of the Civil War centennial, blacks were barely mentioned.

"Why don't you do a book about the black role in the war?" McPherson recalls the publisher asking. So he did.

He was teaching at Princeton by then, and for the next couple of decades, he had a nice, solid academic career going. Then, in 1988, he published a thoroughly researched yet readable one-volume history of the Civil War era – and hit the kind of jackpot most academics can only dream of.

"Battle Cry of Freedom" sold vastly better than expected, won the Pulitzer Prize and, along with Ken Burns' famed public television documentary, which aired in 1990, helped spark a revival of interest in the Civil War.

McPherson is reluctant to claim credit. "There had to be something out there to start with. I struck a vein," he says. Nonetheless, "Battle Cry" established him as the preeminent historian of the Civil War.

Asked about McPherson's stature, University of Virginia historian Gary Gallagher says simply, "He's the man."

Gallagher also points to the importance of McPherson's current subject. Analysis of Lincoln's role as commander in chief, he says, is seriously underrepresented in the "vast outpouring of books" being published in anticipation of the 200th anniversary of Lincoln's birth, on Feb. 12, 1809.

"This really is the main thing Lincoln did during the Civil War," Gallagher says. "If he doesn't preside over winning the war, then nothing else happens." Yet the most significant previous treatment of the subject – "Lincoln and His Generals," by T. Harry Williams – is more than 50 years old.

The reasons for historians' neglect of Lincoln as commander in chief are historical themselves.

By the mid-1980s, as McPherson was working on "Battle Cry of Freedom," social history had superseded political, diplomatic and military history among academic historians. Many were hard at work on the previously ignored stories of nonwhite, non-elite, non-male Americans. Military history was especially marginalized, in part because of fallout from Vietnam.

"Battle Cry" tried with considerable success to treat social, economic, political and military issues as conjoined. Since then, McPherson is happy to report, history has become more integrated.

"Military history is now seen as much more important," he says, "and much of the military history of the Civil War is really social history."

Joe Roth is the majority owner of the next expansion team in MLS, the Seattle Sounders. He is using data from Barack Obama's campaign to help him promote the sport of soccer across the country.

Sounders FC use new tactics

Roth's most intriguing idea sounds like a page lifted out of Facebook. When new ticket holders go online to pick out seating preferences, they have to fill out a questionnaire about their predilections. Do they like to stand or sit at games? Chant? Cheer? Who are their favorite players? After giving the answers, they see what Roth described as a horizontal thermometer (the left side glowing red, the right side glowing green) that helps them find their ideal seat selections based on their rooting behavior.

"It's a way for you to be placed in a section with like-minded fans, so that each section could become a miniature version of a supporter's club, just like they are in Europe, with their own blogs, their own pubs, their own scarves and T-shirts," said Roth. "I'm a computer idiot, but when I explained it to my daughter, she said, 'Dad, I get it. It's just like Facebook.'"

The team has also lifted an idea from another successful fan-based institution – "American Idol." To drum up interest in the team, the Sounders are airing a live TV show on Seattle's NBC affiliate immediately after the 2009 Super Bowl. It will feature "Idol"-style soccer tryouts in three Washington cities with players executing various performance drills. Fans voting on the Web will pick a winner who will be awarded a position as a player on the club.

As anyone who saw him run studios in Hollywood can attest, Roth is a fierce competitor, so he won't be simply relying on fans to stock his club. Expansion teams are notorious also-rans in their debut seasons, but Roth knows that for all the talk about a like-minded community, what fans want most is a winner.

MLS teams are allowed to sign one designated player above their salary cap. Roth recently landed Swedish star Freddie Ljungberg, who has played in three World Cups, was Calvin Klein's first European underwear model and, at 31, might still be at the peak of his game.

To hear Roth tell the story, his wooing of Ljungberg wasn't so different from the way he'd persuaded Julia Roberts or Bruce Willis to star in a new movie. As usual, when it comes to star talent, CAA was involved.

"I was talking to one of CAA's sports agents who said Freddie was going to be in town the next day," Roth recalled. "When I asked why, they said, 'He's getting a tattoo.' When I met him, he had a huge new tattoo that went all the way up his right arm to his elbow."

Ljungberg was interested in MLS, but said he wanted to play in Los Angeles or New York. So Roth made his pitch.

"I said to him, 'Neither city is right for you. L.A. isn't a sports town. It's an entertainment town – we don't even have a pro football team. And in New York, the media glare is horrible. They'll eat you alive.'"

Knowing that Ljungberg's agent also reps San Antonio Spurs star Tony Parker, he said, "Talk to Tony. He wanted to play in New York or L.A., and he'll tell you that the best day of his life ever made was going to San Antonio."

Roth persuaded Ljungberg to visit Seattle, which is to the water, like the city where Ljungberg grew up in Sweden. After a three-day visit, he was sold, signing a two-year deal with the Sounders. When I asked Roth how much he paid him, he suddenly sounded like a tight-fisted studio boss again, refusing to confirm reports that the deal was worth $5 million.

"I'm not saying I'm from the Bob Daley school," Roth said, referring to the longtime Warner Bros. studio chief. "Bob used to say, 'I'd rather run over my own grandmother than say what a movie cost.' So I'm keeping my mouth shut."

James McPherson is considered to be one of the most knowledgeable Civil War Historians. His book "Battle Cry" is recognized as what put him at the forefront of academic historians.

Have you ever wondered what it feels like to be famous?

BY VALERIE STRAUSS
THE WASHINGTON POST

Have you ever wondered how it would feel to be famous around the world?

We decided that the best folks to answer this question would be young people who are about as famous as it gets right now.

So we found two who are starring in the country's hottest movie, "High School Musical 3: Senior Year."

Corbin Bleu, 19, who plays Chad, and Ashley Tisdale, 23, who plays Sharpay, were happy to tell us about the moment they realized they were famous and how it affected them.

For starters, Bleu and Tisdale said that it is easy for them to be well known because the kids who approach them in public for autographs are nice and respectful.

They both started in show business when they were 2 years old – as models at the same modeling agency. But it was their parts in the original "High School Musical," which aired on the Disney Channel in 2006, that changed their lives.

Tisdale said she remembers realizing how famous she was when she went to a Cheetah Girls concert at a big theater in Los Angeles. At the concert, she ran into Zac Efron, who plays Troy in "HSM," and they talked. Kids recognized them. There was so much screaming that both had to be taken backstage.

"They were chanting, 'Ashley, Ashley.' I thought Ashley Simpson was in the audience," Tisdale said.

Now, she said, she is recognized wherever she goes, but she doesn't mind when kids ask her for autographs. And she doesn't try to hide who she is.

What she likes, she said, is getting to do the kind of work she always wanted to do.

"It has given us a lot of opportunities to work and travel," she said. "The fans are so amazing."

Bleu said his newfound fame has changed the pace of his life; he is always very, very busy. But he said it has not changed who he is.

Bleu says he realized he was famous right after the first "HSM" movie came out. He was in Hawaii filming a television show and took a break to go to a carnival. He said he got "mobbed."

"It was very weird but very fun," he said.

When he wants to go out and not be recognized, he ties his hair back and pulls a hood over his head. But like Tisdale, he doesn't mind being approached by kids.

"I've always kept a pretty sane head about it," Bleu said. "I am all about the work I do. Not about being famous."

making abilities. He plays a key role in the first power-play unit as well as left wing on UMass' top scoring line.

Marcou was the team's leading scorer last year and looks to continue at the same pace this season with his 11 points – on five goals and six assists – in the seven games UMass has played this season. He currently leads the Minutemen in goals and points. He leads the Hockey East in points and is ranked 12th nationally. He ranks second in goals and fifth in assists, power play points and power play goals in Hockey East.

With his high point-earning weekend against Providence – tallying three goals and five assists for eight points – he was named CCM/RBK Player of the Week on Nov. 3. He was also the InsideCollegeHockey.com National Player of the Week Runner-Up.

BOTH SPECIALTIES

UMass has taken advantage of its special teams opportunities. On average the Minutemen – one of the least penalized teams in the nation – are called for 5.2 penalties per game, 12.2 minutes, and have spent 73 minutes in the box so far this season.

Typically playing on UMass' penalty kill are Quirk and Berry or junior captain Brett Watson and senior Chris Davis at forward. The defenders rotate through but junior Justin Braun, junior Martin Nolet, senior John Wessbecker and senior Topher Bevis tend to see the most ice time during the kill.

The Minutemen's penalty kill is second in Hockey East play. They have not let in a goal during their opponents last 18 power play chances during the last four games. They have allowed two goals all season while playing a man down. Overall, UMass is 92.3 percent while the other team has the advantage, which is good for 10th in the nation.

UMass' power play is also one of the best in the country, ranked eighth overall and the third best in the Hockey East. This season, the Minutemen have scored eight power-play goals, three coming from sophomore center Michael Lecomte and two from Marcou. Lecomte scored two power-play goals last weekend.

Playing in the first power-play unit is typically Davis, Quirk and Marcou at forward with Braun and Berry at defense. The second unit sees a variety of players, with Bevis and Nolet running the points and Lecomte, freshman Casey Wellman, sophomore Chase Langeraap, freshman Danny Hobbs and junior Will Ortiz all seeing ice time during the man advantage.

DAINTON IN THE CREASE

Sophomore Paul Dainton played in his first two games of the season over the weekend after recovering from an injury. Dainton took over for junior Dan Meyers during the second period after Providence scored its fourth goal on Friday in UMass' 9-4 win. Dainton wasn't awarded a shutout, although he didn't let in a goal. He made 17 shots in his sophomore debut for the Minutemen.

Dainton came in cold on Friday and impressed UMass coach Don Cahoon enough to start him in net on Saturday at Providence. Dainton let in one goal in UMass' 5-1 win. Dainton made 24 saves, including eight saves while the Minutemen were a man down. Dainton gave up few rebounds and his overall performance in net contributed to the success of UMass' penalty kill throughout the weekend.

Minuteman captain Cory Quirk shoots on Providence net minder Chris Mannis. Quirk's line of himself, James Marcou and Alex Berry tallied 18 points on the weekend, leading the Minutemen.

Senior Katelyn Orlando, right, leads the Minutewomen in points this season. Orlando has scored 14 goals and one assist, good for 29 points. Her goal total ranks first in the Atlantic 10.

Potts brings strong defense

son, the expectations for UMass were less than lofty.

The Minutewomen were coming off of their 2007 breakout season, but were hit hard by graduation. The same team that had relied so heavily on its defense a year earlier retained one starting defender, sophomore Jaime Bourazeris.

Moving in to the vacated defensive slots were freshman Nikki Panciocco and sophomore transfer Jackie Tait along with junior Christine Rodgers, who made the transition from forward. And at midfield, sophomore Makaela Potts was slated as the team's defensive captain.

As the season opened, it became apparent that highly touted freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdall would be taking the starting job over junior Sarah Williams. Widdall's pure talent and international experience with Team USA made it impossible to deny her ability.

UMass coach Justine Sowry had confidence in her team, but still expected growing pains from her young players.

So as the season opened, the defense was expected to show their lack of experience and breakdown at points early on in the season. It was expected of a young team.

But the breakdowns never came.

The Minutewomen defense has been nothing but stout since. On the year, UMass has given up three or more goals on only three occasions, two coming against ranked teams and one in overtime.

Reserves gain playing time

to their best defensive display of the season, the Minutemen sacked Cassidy eight times. UMass didn't give Cassidy enough time to set himself.

Brown sent players attacking Cassidy not from just one side, but from two. When Cassidy was forced to scramble, he looked downfield and saw no open receivers, so he was forced to run the ball himself.

The constant barrage of blitzes also forced Cassidy to throw two interceptions, both to Jennings. The second interception by Jennings was returned it 40 yards for a touchdown, extending UMass' lead.

Darryln Penner, who usually isn't a starter, sacked Cassidy two times.

"Obviously, we tried not to get him a chance to breath today," Brown said. "We certainly made his task difficult."

The Minutemen defense only allowed 19 net yards gained on the ground. By blitzing often, UMass made things very tight up front at the line of scrimmage forcing Rhode Island running back Jimmy Hughes to spend more time trying to locate gaps made by the Rams offensive line.

PLAYING AGAIN

For the second game in a row, the Minutemen were able to plus their second stringers. Players like Jonathan Hernandez, Scott Woodward, Erick Dickson and Sam Bosire entered the game after the Minutemen were up big.

Don Brown reiterated how important these appearances are, even though the team has the game in hand. Brown views these instances as more of a tryout for positions in games later this year and even in next year's games.

When players enter the game, despite the score, they can either improve their stock as Brown puts it, or they can also hurt their stock.

Redshirt junior running back Chris Zardas has seen more playing time as of late. UMass coach Don Brown has elected to play Zardas, along with an array of Minutemen in the last two games in hopes to provide them with experience that will help them in later weeks.

Harrell and Texas Tech prove doubters wrong

BY TIM STEPHENS
THE ORLANDO SENTINEL

Yes, America, Texas Tech is for real.

Any skepticism about the Red Raiders' legitimacy as a national-title contender was removed Saturday night when the goalposts were torn down at Jones AT&T Stadium in Lubbock. Texas Tech's rousing 39-33 win over then-No. 1 Texas is the current pinnacle for a program that continues to reach new heights under its mad-scientist coach, Mike Leach.

The reward? A No. 2 Bowl Championship Series ranking and the chance to be in the national spotlight for at least two more monster games. Up next for the Red Raiders (9-0) is a showdown with once-beaten Oklahoma State on Saturday. Win that one, and Texas Tech visits Oklahoma on Nov. 22 perhaps ranked No. 1 in America.

That's heady stuff for a program that – no insult intended – shouldn't be this good.

With its remote location in West Texas, small TV market and small (by comparison) budget, Texas Tech gets our vote as college football's biggest overachiever – not just this year but in the broader context of recent history. We break this down into two categories – BCS and non-BCS – because there is a significant difference in resources within those two unofficial subgroups of Division I-A.

BCS

Overachiever: Texas Tech (9-0) has always been able to score under Leach, one of the innovators of the spread offense. Graham Harrell is but the latest in a long line of record-setting quarterbacks. But there was always an air of "gimmick" about their high-flying show, a sense that the Red Raiders were not to be taken seriously as threats to the Big 12 establishment (translation: big-budget football factories like Texas, Texas A&M, Oklahoma and Nebraska).

The Red Raiders don't have the tradition of their bigger-name conference rivals and they certainly don't have the resources. Yet consider this: The Red Raiders have not posted a losing record since 1992, dating back to their Southwest Conference days. They have posted winning records in each year of the Big 12's history, something no other league team can say. Under Leach, they make their ninth consecutive bowl appearance.

We've gotten used to Texas Tech as a winner. Their success this year grows their reputation and makes it easier for them to stay there. A conference championship they've never won one outright in a major conference might give them opportunity to play for something much bigger than that.

Of course, their wins also make it harder to keep Leach. The school and coach put off talk of a contract extension until after the season, citing financial constraints. He has two years left on a deal that'll pay him an average of around $2 million per year.

Underachiever: Clemson has budgets, fan support, facilities and winning tradition that few ACC teams can match. Despite all that, they've not won more than nine games in a season since 1990 and haven't won a conference title since 1991. The Tigers can always be counted on to win their seven or eight games and then lose two games they have no business losing. They've lost eight of their last 11 bowl games. That's why they pushed out Tommy Bowden and are operating with an interim coach the rest of this season.

NON-BCS

Overachiever: How about Boise State? The Broncos crashed and won a BCS bowl two years ago and are on pace to grab another (they are ranked No. 10 this week). Since moving to Division I-A in 1996, Boise State is 117-41. The Broncos have continued to win despite losing good coaches to bigger schools, despite competing in a league, the WAC, that doesn't get a lot of respect and despite limited recruiting appeal in a state not known for great prospects. They might produce their second unbeaten season in three years.

Underachiever: UCF has been called a sleeping giant. Someone throw cold water on them, then. The Knights are big underachievers when one considers the school's location, recruiting base, television market and enrollment.

The millions in student fees generated for the athletic department cause all other non-BCS athletic directors to drool.

Yet after Sunday's loss to East Carolina, UCF has a 70-78 record since moving to Division I-A in 1996 and has not posted consecutive winning seasons since leaving the independent ranks in 2001. The record against ranked teams and BCS teams is abysmal.

Now that they have facilities such as Bright House Networks Stadium, the excuses are running thin. It has been proven you can win in Lubbock, Texas, and Boise, Idaho. You're telling me you can't win big in Orlando?

CHAMPS

Michael Crabtree: The Texas Tech receiver outmuscled the Texas defense for a catch at the 4-yard line, then tiptoed into the end zone for the winning points with one second to play as the Red Raiders stunned the No. 1 Longhorns 39-33.

Kellogg wants effort in exhibition game

Expectations of Lowe, Harris high in preseason opener

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Today's game against Dowling isn't going to mean anything for the Massachusetts men's basketball team's strength of schedule. In fact, it isn't going to count for the regular season, either.

Where it does count is in how each player steps up to the challenge of playing against someone other than themselves.

With a bench as short as the Minutemen's, UMass coach Derek Kellogg expects to go with his starting line-up for much of the game, but he will not hesitate to take them out of the game if he sees an effort that he considers unsatisfactory.

"The greatest thing that I'm looking at is when the game lights go on, which guys step up and play better and which guys take a back seat," Kellogg said.

Kellogg will look for returning starters Chris Lowe and Ricky Harris to prove once again that they can lead the team and hopes to have them play 30 minutes against the Golden Lions (7-16, 6-10 East Coast Conference 2007-08).

Dowling qualified for the UCC tournament after squeaking out a 70-65 win over Queens on March 1. The Golden Lions lost their first round match to No. 1 C.W. Post, 83-64, on March 5.

They will have a very challenging exhibition against a much more competitive UMass team that qualified for the National Invitation Tournament championship last season.

Lowe and Harris are expected to compete at a high level against Dowling, but have already proven themselves based on last season's performance.

Harris was second on the team in scoring last season (18.2 points per game) while Lowe received praise from across the country as one of the best guards in the Atlantic 10.

Kellogg will look for redshirt seniors Luke Bonner and Tony Gaffney to make up for the interior presence lost with Etienne Brower and Dante Milligan graduating. The forwards will have plenty of opportunities to showcase their talent against an undersized Dowling squad.

Forward Alioune Ndiaye is the Golden Lion's tallest player and one of two who are above 6-foot-6. He averaged 1.6 ppg and 2.3 rebounds per game, but was second on the team in blocks (12).

He will likely have the duty of guarding the 7'1" Bonner, whose stats aren't too flashy either (3.5 ppg, 2.5 rpg), but is fundamentally sound and has a hook-shot in the post that can be difficult to block for smaller players.

Josh Lowe (6'6") won't have too much of a height disadvantage against Gaffney (6'8"), but as one of the more athletic players for the Minutemen (25-11, 10-6 A-10 2007-08), will make rebounding a tough task for Josh, who didn't even play for half of the season.

When he did play, he averaged 2.1 rebounds, but has decent range for a forward as he leads the team in 3-point shooting (.382 percent).

However, since today is an exhibition game and the Minutemen are not playing Division I competition, Kellogg is primarily focused on how his team plays and won't focus too much on the score.

"I'm totally focused on our squad. I'm trying to get us better," Kellogg said. "I'm trying to get to where I feel comfortable where I feel like we can go out and play a game 40 minutes."

Following this game, UMass will have some more practice time before it officially opens its season in Carbondale, Ill., against Arkansas-Monticello for the first round of the Coaches vs. Cancer Classic.

The home opener will be at the end of the month on Nov. 24 against Jacksonville State.

UMass coach Derek Kellogg won't be focused on the score of tonight's game against Dowling, but at the effort his team puts in. The Minutemen home-opener is slated for Nov. 24 against Jacksonville State.

Minutemen display power

UMass has all aspects of team playing impressively

After sweeping Providence last weekend the Massachusetts hockey team earned its first national ranking of the season in the USCHO.com/CBS College Sports Poll.

The No. 19 Minutemen (5-1-1, 2-0-1 Hockey East) hold the nation's fourth longest unbeaten streak at 4-0-1 since their second game of the season, when they defeated then-No. 5 North Dakota at the Ice Breaker Invitational in Boston on Oct. 11.

Most recently, the Minutemen showed their offensive strength defeating the Friars 9-4 in their home-opener on Oct. 31 and 5-1 on Nov. 1 at Providence.

UMass Hockey

FIRE POWER

UMass is ranked fourth nationally in offensive production due to the depth of its forwards. The Minutemen average 4.17 goals and 31.8 shots per game, with the majority of points - 43 percent - coming from linemates senior center Cory Quirk, senior left wing Alex Berry and sophomore right wing James Marcou. Together, the line has totaled 28 of the team's 65 points, earning 19 points during last weekend's sweep of Providence.

The Minutemen used tips, deflections, slap shots, cycling and quick passes to score their goals this weekend. The ability to score goals in a variety of ways will continue to benefit the Minutemen throughout the season, not allowing opponents to anticipate UMass in its offensive zone.

This season the Minutemen have scored 25 goals, which is the most UMass has scored in its first six games since the 2003-04 season when the Minutemen scored 22 goals.

UMass paces for playoffs

Offense and defense sharp; Jennings, Coen have big day

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Judging by the last two week's the No. 13 Massachusetts football team is on the right track to the postseason.

The Minutemen have three games remaining coming into this weekend's contest against Maine (6-3, 3-2 Collegiate Athletic Association).

UMass is coming off a 49-0 shut-out win over Rhode Island in Liam Coen's last game in his home state of Rhode Island.

Not only did the offense exhibit a nearly unstoppable array of assaults, the defense seemly morphed into a brick wall and halted any of the Rams' attempts at putting points on the board.

The defensive domination started from the second point of the game when Josh Jennings intercepted URI quarterback Derek Cassady's first pass. Alert to the tendencies of Cassady and the Rams offense, the redshirt junior jumped the route, giving the ball over to the offense.

"They like to run 3-to-5 yard cross routes, I just looked at his eyes and read the play," Jennings said.

The Minutemen would never look back.

THROUGH THE AIR

Senior quarterback Coen played possibly his best game all season against Bryant two weeks ago. Coen topped that effort against Rhode Island.

Coen was 15-for-17 passing for 241 yards and three touchdowns. Coen was spot-on all day. The only two incompletions he threw all day were drops by UMass wide receivers.

When Coen was rushed in the pocket, which was a rarity, he scrambled out of the pocket, kept calm, scanned the field for an open receiver and threw the ball down the field with precision.

"He was so efficient I think we scored on everyone of those drives (in which Coen was in the game)," Brown said.

Minutewomen boast arsenal of weapons

Underclassmen performance key to 2008 season success

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

By going undefeated in Atlantic 10 play, the No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team locked up its first outright division title since 2001. After getting a share of the conference crown and the second seed in the A-10 tournament last year, the Minutewomen have the No. 1 seed as they head to Philadelphia this weekend.

Having at least a share of the conference title is vital in the A-10. Over the past 20 years, 17 of the Atlantic 10 champions have either won outright, or had a share of the conference title.

UMass Field Hockey

NEW OFFENSIVE DIMENSION

Last year, UMass won the A-10 conference championship by relying on a stout defense and a timely offense. The 2007 Minutewomen surrendered a mere 1.08 goals per game. But they were only able to put up 1.51 goals per game on offense.

The defense is still there as the 2008 Minutewomen have only given up 1.17 goals per game. However, it's the team's offense that had made this year's squad spectacular.

UMass' offense has seen its offense increase its output by over a goal per game - 2.67 goals per game. In addition to the best scoring defense in the A-10, UMass now has the second most prolific offense in the conference.

The improvement offensively can be attributed to new players changing the philosophy of the team's offense. In 2007, the Minutewomen had a one-dimensional offense that relied on then-sophomore forward Cher King to do most of the work offensively.

This year though, UMass has added weapons all over the forward line. Transfer Jill Powers supplied an immediate spark for the Minutewomen, generating goals in each of her first three games at UMass. Sophomore Katie Kelly has had a breakout year. Her 20 points on eight goals and four assists is the second best mark on the team and ranks seventh in the A-10.

While the new additions were a catalyst to improve the offense, much of the team's firepower can be attributed to one of the team's three seniors - Katelyn Orlando.

Despite a slow start offensively, Orlando leads the team, and the A-10, with 14 goals on the year. The mark is a drastic improvement from her junior season when she only tallied on goal on the year.

UMass alum dies in strangling case

BY LATOYA M. MURPHY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The strangled body of University of Massachusetts alumna Leah Walsh, 29, was found in North Hills, N.Y., on Oct. 29, three days after her husband William Walsh Jr., 29, filed a missing person's report.

Walsh worked as a special education teacher at the School for Language and Communication Development in Glencove, N.Y., after earning her master's degree in special education from Malloy College in May.

She earned her bachelor's from the UMass in 2006 after completing her studies in communications and sociology.

Walsh and her husband were married for about three years and according to a neighbor had "lived on Marbourne Road in Bethpage, N.Y., for approximately six months."

Following an argument on Sunday, Oct. 26th, regarding an alleged infidelity, Walsh Jr. choked and killed his wife as the dispute escalated, according to a confession he gave to police.

Walsh Jr.'s confession also included storing his wife's body in their home as he continued his daily activities in an attempt to validate an alibi. Later that evening he said he dumped her body in an embankment 50 feet off the Long Island Expressway.

Walsh Jr. said he then returned

Greeks meet with town representative

Representatives of the University of Massachusetts Interfraternity Council and Panhellenic Council spoke last night in the Campus Center with Stephanie O'Keeffe, a representative of Amherst's town government.

The event was organized to address concerns raised over the summer by Amherst residents regarding students, specifically fraternity and sorority housing.

O'Keeffe said the town made a mistake in the way they dealt with the concerns by not being able to open a dialogue over the summer with students.

"There is a tension among residential neighborhoods and students whether Greek [students], students in rental housing or people passing through neighborhoods on their way downtown," O'Keeffe said.

"This is part of the challenge of being a college town and we all need to work together to find mutually acceptable resolutions to these issues," O'Keeffe said before mentioning residents' concerns over student noise and littering.

The meeting also had a presenta-

Amherst police bust suspected pot dealer

Amherst Police arrested a 22-year-old Amherst resident on Oct. 28 for possession and distribution of marijuana.

Micah S. Snyder, a University of Massachusetts student, was arrested at approximately 7:00 a.m. in his residence at 950 North Pleasant Street, apartment 28.

According to Amherst Chief of Police Charles Scherpa, the arrest was the result of a six-month investigation into the illegal distribution of narcotics at the residence.

Police executed a search warrant for the apartment and made the arrest. Snyder was charged with possession with intent to distribute a class D substance. No further details regarding the investigation could be released by police.

Snyder was arraigned at Eastern Hampshire District Court the same day as his arrest and pleaded not guilty. The case was scheduled for a pre-trial conference set for Dec. 3.

Engineering students repair, relocate rare historic bridges

BY BEN WILLIAMS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Structural engineering students at the University of Massachusetts are getting a hands-on education by rebuilding historic bridges, some for campus use.

The project is funded by a $150,000 National Science Foundation grant. According to Alan Lutenegger and Sanjay Arwade, the professors running the project, the money will allow students to repair and relocate at least two old truss bridges on footpaths around the campus, as well as six or seven in future years.

The project educates students on bridges, something that would be nearly impossible otherwise, and preserves historic bridges that could potentially be dismantled or deteriorate.

"It's hard to do laboratory experiments that seem real because civil structures are so big. You can't bring a bridge into a lab," Arwade said in a statement on the UMass Web site. "We don't want our students to miss out on doing experiments with something that's real, which is where the bridges come in."

One of the projects is already on campus, the 1906 Warren Pony Truss Bridge from southern Vermont, which now lies on the footpath between McGuirk Alumni Stadium and the track.

As a part of their project, students must measure every part of sions into engineering design software.

They then indentify the parts that need repair and then fabricate new parts in the machine shop at UMass, add new decking or side rails and prepare the foundation at the site.

There are hundreds of truss bridge, built in New England in the early 1990s, that use the triangle-shaped supports. Many service because they can't carry modern vehicles, or because of safety concerns.

Lutenegger has been collecting retired bridges for this project since 2001. One of his acquisitions is a rare Ball Pipe King Post truss bridge manufactured in the late 1800s in East Windsor, Mass. It was manufactured in the late 1800s and donated by the Windsor Historical Commission known to have survived to this point.

"These bridges are an important part of our technological heritage, particularly here in New England, and they're growing increasingly rare. It would be a shame to see these bridges completely disappear from the landscape," said Lutenegger.

Birds discovered on glaciers

BY ALYSSA CREAMER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts climate specialist, Douglas Hardy, and his son, Spencer, 14, recently published research suggesting that penguins are not the only birds to nest in the arctic.

The two believe that the White-winged Diuca finches are nesting atop Peru's Quelccaya Ice Cap, the world's largest tropical glacier. The discovery bears great significance, as no other birds have been known to reside in such glacial climates other than penguins.

The Hardys' discovery was published in the Sept. issue of the "Wilson Journal of Ornithology."

Their research began in 2003 when Hardy was invited by a colleague to help drill an ice core from the Quelccaya glacier. They were attempting to bring back a frozen ice core sample, as opposed to the melted samples past scientists had taken from the glacier's high altitudes.

"When you drill an ice core, it is a huge undertaking," said Hardy. "It's 500 ft. thick, and you have to have the equipment to bring back a continuous core. There were a lot of people who said it's impossible."

This was the beginning of Hardy's recent annual trips to measure the changing conditions of climate at the 19,000 ft. altitude of the glacier, which is part of the Andes Mountains.

"Because this is a place where there is a lot of snowfall," said Hardy. "I have to make adjustments to the instruments that we have on the glacier each year."

The glacier accumulates about six feet of snow annually. Hardy measures and documents data on the glacier's changes in windspeed, temperature, snowfall, chemical species (dust, chloride, potassium, etc.), in order to analyze how the climate has changed atop the glacier.

Bird nests have been found on glaciers in Peru.

While working on the glacier, Hardy began to find what appeared to be a bird nest resting on top of the glacier's icy surface. He took several pictures of the nest, and let his son take a look at them.

Spencer, who at the time was a sixth grader and amateur ornithologist, worked with his father to try to identify what type of bird could be found nesting on the ice.

His father found and photographed over 20 nests of similar structure over the next two years, and Spencer was able to compare the pictures to others and narrow down the list of potential birds to two.

In order to decipher between the two types of birds, Hardy sent a bird feather found in the nest to Carla Dove, a Smithsonian bird specialist famous for her ability to identify birds by their feathers.

"Carla was really into it," said Hardy. "She was so enthusiastic. It was sort of a puzzle for everyone, and she really sort of dropped everything she was doing and immediately started working on our feathers."

Dove identified the feathers as belonging to the White-winged Diuca Finches, one of the options Spencer had believed the birds could be. Shortly afterwards, Hardy also discovered eggs of the right size and shape that these types of birds were supposed to have resting in one of the nests on the glacier.

"I've yet to hear anyone question whether it is some other kind of bird," said Hardy.

There are few cases, if any, of scientists as young as Spencer publishing research.

New memoir indexes suicide

BY EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Joan Wickersham's "The Suicide Index: Putting My Father's Death in Order," is the author's newest book and is a memoir about how she has dealt with her father's suicide for the past 15 years.

"This book was an attempt for me to grapple with something that was such a mess," said Wickersham. "I still, to this day, don't have a really clear idea of what was going through my father's head."

Wickersham spoke to students and faculty Monday night at the University of Massachusetts when she read a passage from the book and answered questions.

"The Suicide Index" has a unique style, written in index format - alphabetical order with subject headings.

"I came up with this index structure because there was no logical way to structure this story," said Wickersham. "One great thing about this structure is that there is room for lots of different ways to write and for lots of different voices."

Wickersham tried the index structure just as an experiment at first. Her husband encouraged her to continue using it as a guide, and she found that it was the best way to tell the story.

"I wrote this book wrong so many different ways before I found the right way to write this," said Wickersham. "I could not tell this story in fiction. There was more urgency for me to write it in memoir."

It is one of the five finalists for the 2008 National Book Award for nonfiction.

"That award is considered probably the most prestigious award, especially in prose," said Madeleine Blais, a professor in the UMass journalism department.

Wickersham spoke in Blais' memoir class Tuesday morning, where she answered additional questions from students.

Wickersham said she started writing in elementary school. One of her teachers assigned Wickersham and her classmates to write short stories based off of pictures that they could choose out of a box. From then on, writing has been a part of her life.

"As a teenager I got really serious about writing," Wickersham said. "I didn't know that was what I would do for a living, but it is what I liked to do."

UMPD Crime Log, Oct. 27 – Nov. 2

Wednesday

Ashley Hanf, 21, of 61 Silver St. Norwood, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Eastman Lane at 1:56 a.m. and charged with OUI, marked lanes violation and failure to stop/yield.

Frances M. Gonzalez, 21, of 480 South Pleasant St. in Amherst, Mass., was arrested in purple lot 64, northwest of Dickinson Hall, at 3:34 a.m. and charged with OUI. According to the UMPD, Gonzalez came to the police station to post a friend's bail. "Officers in the back parking lot saw her in the driver's seat trying to start the car, and an officer went to speak with her," said Archbald. She was given a Breathalyzer test and registered a .22 and .23 – over twice the legal limit in Massachusetts.

Colin R. Bentley, 25, of 307F Cashin Hall, was arrested after a warrant was served at thedormitory at 8:43 a.m. and charged with the warrant for failure to appear.

Friday

Friday night's celebration of Halloween created very few disturbances according to the University of Massachusetts Police Department. "We are pleased people were able to have a good time and enjoy the event without crossing over into criminal behavior and damage was very, very light, with a few minor arrests," said UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald. He added "We appreciate it; Halloween has become an enjoyable event."

Samuel Julian Farkas, 18, of 17 Wayne Road Needham, Mass., was arrested on Stadium Drive at 12:49 a.m. and charged with possession of a class D drug.

Theodore M. Driscoll, 21, of 34 Cross St. in Westborough, Mass., was arrested in lot 11 at 3:16 a.m. after a suspicious vehicle call and charged with OUI, negligent operation of a motor vehicle, unregistered motor vehicle and speeding.

Ryan Christopher McGrath, 18, of 610 N. Main St. in Randolph, Mass., and John Bernard Steward Jr., 18, of 19 Orchard St. in Randolph, were arrested in lot 22 at 8:25 p.m. and charged with drug and alcohol offenses. McGrath is charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21, possession of a class D drug and possession to distribute a class D drug. Steward Jr. is charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21 and possession of a class D drug.

Saturday

Corey John Escobar, 19, of 9 Averill St. in Otego, N.Y., was arrested in lot 32 at 1:26 a.m. and charged with possession of a class D drug.

Valentino Jordan Pina, 18, of 15 Penikese St. W in Wareham, Mass., was arrested in the Southwest Mall at 1:40 a.m. after a call came in reporting a disturbance. Pina is charged with disorderly conduct. An officer observed a verbal altercation between Pina and other people in the towers. "He then started with two guys on the ground who tried to calm him down. He wouldn't [calm down] and began to yell and threaten them with physical assault." Pina shoved one of the two parties and at that point was arrested.

Tracy Jemel Belton, 24, of 79 Watkins Park Drive in Upper Marlboro, Md., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Fearing St. at 2:14 a.m. and charged with OUI, operating a motor vehicle on a sidewalk, failure to stop/yield, negligent operation of a motor vehicle and greater than reasonable and proper speed. "Officers observed a vehicle traveling at a high rate of speed on the Southwest Mall between all the towers," said Archbald. "The vehicle failed to stop at the stop sign at Kennedy Drive and Massachusetts Ave," he added.

James Gerard O'Brien, 20, of 65 Redgate Road in West Roxbury, Mass., was arrested on Governors Drive at 4:42 a.m. and charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21 and larceny over $250. He is charged with stealing a bicycle. "He admitted it wasn't his and that he found it," said Archbald.

Sunday

Osayuwamen Igbineweka, 22, of 24 Ingleside St. in Dorchester, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue at 3:50 a.m. and charged with speeding, OUI and negligent operation of a motor vehicle. "An officer observed a 2000 Nisan Maxima traveling east on Mass. Ave. going 67 mph in a posted 30 mph zone," said Archbald. When the officer approached the vehicle he "detected an odor of alcoholic beverage emanating from the car and he appeared to be confused with bloodshot eyes," said Archbald. Igbineweka was unable to complete the field sobriety tests and was arrested.

to his Bethpage home to pick up his wife's car. He drove and left the car on the side of the Seaford-Oyster Expressway after taking the air out of the right front tire to make it appear that the car had broken down. Walsh Jr. said he walked home but returned to the scene around 6 a.m. in his own vehicle.

While on the scene, Walsh Jr. used his wife's phone to send himself a text message reading "Have a great day. Love you bunches. Mwah."

The next Monday, when Leah did not show up for work, the School for Language and Communication Development called her mother to inform her.

Her mother then called Leah's father, a school bus driver who drives the route where Leah's abandoned vehicle was located. He reported seeing his daughter's black Ford Focus on the side of the road. He called Walsh Jr., who arrived at the scene.

Walsh Jr. called the police, starting a two-day search that involved police helicopters, K-9 units and officers on horseback. He reported last hearing from her at 6 a.m. when she sent him a text message.

During the search, Walsh Jr. pleaded for the community's help.

"You can have my cars. You can have everything," Walsh Jr. said outside of his in-laws' house. "I just want my wife back."

When Leah's body was found 13 miles from her abandoned vehicle in a wooded area, Walsh Jr. was taken into custody. After interrogation, he confessed to strangling to death his wife of three years.

He is charged by police with 2nd-degree murder in the slaying and the staging of Leah's disappearance.

Mark Seman, Walsh Jr.'s defense lawyer, claimed the confession was a result of "at least nine hours of continuous non-stop interrogation." He says that this was "a case that should have taken weeks to work on, not days." He maintains that his client is innocent.

Police are interested in speaking with a man who claims to be the last person to speak with Leah Walsh.

Lucas Bean, 32, Walsh's friend from her years at the UMass reported that Walsh sent him a text message on Saturday night saying that she and her husband had just had a "blow-up."

She said that "things are not going to work out with her and her husband, and she had to tell me something very important, but she needed to wait until she got out of the car with him," said Bean.

Efforts to reach the family of Walsh Jr. after the arrest were unsuccessful.

Leah's brother, Josh Hirschel, made a statement Thursday.

"Leah always strove to brighten the world around her," he said. "She always lent a hand to those who most needed it. She was a wonderful person."

She also asked the Greek community to help provide leadership to the campus on connecting with the town.

Considerable time was also spent talking about Dance event, a 15-hour dance-a-thon on campus to benefit the Children's Miracle Network planned for Nov. 22. Mention was also given to the risk management policies followed by each Greek organization.

"I appreciate the initiative that Greek leaders took in initiating contact with the town of Amherst," said Michael Wiseman, director of the Office of Fraternities and Sororities. "And hopefully this will lead to some new models of communication between the two groups."

"It was neat working with Spencer," said Hardy, "because he is interested in all kinds of science. I remember him getting excited when birds would fly by and he was still in a high chair. So he's always been pretty interested in birds."

"Involving him gave him the opportunity to see science in action and really do science, rather than read about it in a book or listen to someone talk about it. He was involved every step of the way. And he saw the process of writing a paper and having people review it."

"It was cool to just learn about birds from a different area," said Spencer. "It is totally nothing I've ever seen before. I really liked discovering something no one else had discovered, and also, it was cool to learn new things, because the birds are so different from the ones here.

Further research will be conducted about the possible advantages these birds find from nesting on the glacier.

Ants prefer salt to sugar

By James Parker
Daily Californian (U.C.-Berkeley)

BERKELEY, Calif. — It is common sense that flies are more attracted to honey than vinegar, but when it comes to ants, salt may be better bait than sugar.

In a new study published last week in the journal Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, researchers from UC Berkeley, the University of Oklahoma and the University of Arkansas at Little Rock have discovered a correlation between the inland distance of an ant colony and how attracted they were to salt.

"It's a neat idea that something as simple as the amount of sodium that falls from the sky is going to have a noticeable impact on the most dominant insect on the planet," said the study's lead author Michael Kaspari, an associate professor and director of the graduate program in ecology and evolutionary biology at the University of Oklahoma.

To measure the ants' response to salt and sucrose, vials and cotton balls with varying concentrations of the two compounds were placed together in locations at different distances from the coast. The researchers measured the number of ants that were led back to the sample from the colony.

The study, which was completed throughout the past two years at 17 locations in the United States, Costa Rica, Peru and Panama, demonstrates that the ants were most active between 10 and 100 kilometers away from the coast, as indicated by their sucrose use.

Past 100 kilometers inland, where rainfall contains far less salt, the ants became more attracted to salt solutions than sucrose solutions, even when the salt levels were at lower concentrations.

"Right next to the ocean, the ants tended to ignore salt. Once you get 10 kilometers inland, they started to use salt," Kaspari said. "By 1,000 kilometers inland, they were recruiting to salt solutions of 0.01 percent. That's almost pure distilled water with a crumb of salt."

Kaspari said if the ants were cars, sucrose would be gas and salt would be oil. The researchers found that when there was a shortage or an excess of salt, the ants' sucrose use dropped, indicating that they became less active.

Changes in the amount of ant activity can have significant impact on the environment because of the insects' prevalence globally and their role as decomposers, according to the researchers.

"Maybe salt scarcity regulates all animals involved in decomposition," said UC Berkeley integrative biology professor Robert Dudley, a co-author of the study. "People haven't thought of sodium as an ecosystem regulator before."

The researchers plan to advance upon their findings by testing whether adding a salt lick to a sodium-deficient area increases ant activity or affects the ecosystem in general, Kaspari said.

Elements like oxygen, hydrogen, phosphorus, carbon and nitrogen are typically viewed as the most important nutrients in an ecosystem, with salt often being an afterthought, he said.

"The role of salt is surprising in this animal," said UC Berkeley integrative biology professor Robert Full, who was not involved in the study. "It suggests that we need to understand the limitations it puts on an ecosystem. [...] I think that what's going to happen now is that people will look beyond the carbon cycle."

Lip balm addiction fears grow

By Jill Rosen
The Baltimore Sun

He thought about it all the time. He had to have it. If he went too long without it, his need for a fix consumed him.

This wasn't about drugs or alcohol or cigarettes. Not even checking his e-mail.

Kevin C. was a lip balm addict. A sweaty, obsessed, quivering addict.

So much so that he founded Lip Balm Anonymous.

He's clean now.

"It's been about 13 years, six months and two days," says Kevin Crossman, who will share his full name now that he's gotten past the shame. "I went cold turkey."

Crossman is just one of millions who are, let's just say, quite attached to their lip balm. According to AC Nielsen Co., sales of lip balms grew last year to more than $378 million.

Dr. Marcia Driscoll, a clinical associate professor of dermatology at the University of Maryland, says lip balm addiction is real – albeit a bit surprising.

She said she recently asked some residents on her staff about it, and three of them pulled lip products out of their pockets.

She said to herself, "This might be more common than I believe."

Indeed.

On Facebook there are 192 groups dedicated to lip balm, many of them addiction-oriented. They include: "I Think I Might Die Without Lipgloss, ChapStick or Some Form of Lip Balm," "Lip Balm Appreciation Guild," "I forgot my lip balm, my life is over!" "I Think I'm Addicted to Lip Balm" and "Addicted to lip balm like CRACK."

Balm companies, well aware of people's predilections, have started packaging the tubes in packs of two or three to capitalize on what's often an impulse purchase, says Drug Store News.

Crossman, who's a Web site manager in San Francisco, says his addiction started with cherry-flavored ChapStick. It tasted good and felt nice on his lips. "It wasn't very cool to have pinkish lips, but I couldn't help it," he says, adding that before he quit, he was using dozens of times a day and that his lips felt naked without it.

Lipbalmanonymous.com hit a nerve. People from all over the world have visited it, and although Crossman hasn't been actively updating it for years, people are still tracking him down to talk about it.

Even so, Driscoll doesn't think there needs to be so much drama associated with chapped lips, which is an issue she deals with a lot as a dermatologist. She estimates about 80 percent of her cases are women.

Unfortunately for balm addicts, causes for the chapping of lips come from all corners.

First, wind, sun, cold and dry air can wreak havoc with the lips. It's a problem that can strike any time of year, but particularly during the colder months when the air is chilly and dry.

Driscoll also points the finger at lip licking.

"You get a little dryness, you start licking and you could end up with dermatitis of the lip, which can spread all around the mouth," she says.

According to the Mayo Clinic, breathing with an open mouth is a trigger, as is dehydration.

It's also possible that chapped lips are a symptom of something else – often a more pervasive skin ailment. Those with sensitive skin, with tendencies toward dermatitis or eczema also tend to get chapped lips, Driscoll says.

If chapping is severe and doesn't respond to treatment, Driscoll and other doctors advise seeing a dermatologist.

Obama well received in international press

By Henry Chu
Los Angeles Times

LONDON — If history records a sudden surge in carbon emissions on Nov. 5, 2008, it may be due to the collective exhalation of relief and joy by the hundreds of millions – perhaps billions – of people around the globe who watched, waited and prayed for Barack Obama to be elected president of the United States.

In country after country, elation at Obama's win was palpable, the hunger for a change of American leadership as strong outside the United States as in it. And there was wonderment that, in the world's most powerful democracy, a man with African roots and the middle name Hussein, an upstart fighter who took on political heavyweights, could go on to capture the highest office in the land.

Suddenly, Americans accustomed to being criticized for speaking hyperbolically about their country found plenty of others doing it for them.

"The new world," The Times of London declared on its front page, beneath a huge smiling portrait of Obama.

"One giant leap for mankind," echoed The Sun, another British newspaper.

From the beginning, this race mesmerized observers far beyond U.S. shores. Two wars and two terms under President Bush left many around the world angry and spent.

Although many have denounced U.S. power and unilateralism, some seemed intent on putting the country back on a pedestal as a source of admiration and aspiration, and they fixed on Obama as their hope. Polls consistently showed that, if the rest of the world could have voted in the U.S. election, the Illinois Democrat would have won not just by a landslide, but an avalanche.

So its results came tumbling in on radios, TV screens and cell phones, many outside the United States saw it as their moment as much as America's, and Obama's victory as their own.

"A lot of people told me they had tears in their eyes last night. I was one of them," Randa Habib, a Jordanian writer and political analyst, said Wednesday. "I saw his speech. I was very moved. This is a lesson to us all, that blacks and whites in America can have such a shameful past between them, yet they come together and learn how to live together."

The Middle East, she said, has always wanted to look to the United States as a beacon, despite differences over the Arab-Israeli conflict, the Iraq war and other issues.

"There's a feeling of hope that things will be right in America," Habib said. "Obama can make you once again respect the U.S. for its values and democracy and all those things we had forgotten about over the last eight years."

No one yet knows what Obama's foreign policy will look like, and the celebratory mood over his win in many places was tempered by questions about his plans for U.S. troops in Iraq, his role in Middle East peace talks and his commitment to free trade, among other issues.

But such doubts aside, legions of jubilant supporters set off firecrackers in El Salvador, danced in Liberia and drank shots in Japan. Good wishes went streaming Obama-ward from housewives in Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, where Obama spent some of his early childhood, and from Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, who also beat long odds to lead his country.

"Your victory has demonstrated that no person anywhere in the world should not dare to dream of wanting to change the world for a better place," said one letter addressed simply to "Senator Barack Obama, Chicago."

Its author: Nelson Mandela, the first black president of South Africa, writing to the first black president-to-be of the United States. Africa has embraced Obama as something of a native son, although it was his father who was born in Kenya, not Obama himself.

Those inspired by Obama's origins and accomplishments include French political activist Patrick Lozes, the son of an immigrant from the African nation of Benin.

"This election is going to improve the image the U.S.A. has in our neighborhoods," Lozes said of France's heavily Muslim working-class enclaves. "The American dream comes back to life."

Tens of thousands of Europeans turned out to catch a glimpse of Obama during his tour of the Continent over the summer. Many are counting on him to restore a more harmonious relationship between the United States and Europe after recent years of tension over the war in Iraq and matters such as climate change.

A similar hope lives in Mexico, where former Foreign Secretary Jorge Castaneda wrote in Wednesday's newspaper Reforma: "Obama won, the map of the United States was transformed and for Mexico an extraordinary opportunity has opened ... because it will be infinitely simpler to be a neighbor, partner and friend of the United States with Obama."

In Italy, a right-wing senator, Maurizio Gasparri, provoked a nasty domestic spat when he suggested that Obama would be soft on terrorism and that "with Obama in the White House, perhaps al-Qaida is happier." The Italian left immediately called on Gasparri to apologize to Americans for his comments.

In China, where real democracy is unknown, an unofficial poll conducted by the official New China News Agency found that 83 percent of respondents favored Obama over Republican John McCain.

Russia's leaders – who following Obama's election lashed out at U.S backing of Georgia in its armed conflict with Russia in August – probably also preferred McCain, said Alexander Konovalov, of the Institute for Strategic Assessment, in Moscow.

"Traditionally, Republicans were better than Democrats for Russia, or for the Soviet Union in the past," Konovalov said. "We always shacked the Democrats, but agreements we could strike only with the Republicans."

In countries ruled by unelected or autocratic regimes, people marveled at the resilience of American democracy, its capacity for change and its stamina through an endless election season.

Iran's nuclear ambitions will be one of the first foreign-policy challenges to face Obama after his inauguration, as well as what to do in neighboring Iraq. Some in Iraq's ruling Shiite Muslim elite worry that Obama will push for a speedier withdrawal of U.S. troops than they would like, or challenge their decisions in ways the Bush administration did not.

The continued fighting in Afghanistan, the worldwide financial meltdown and global warming will press for Obama's attention as well.

"These, though, are issues for another day. Today is for celebration, for happiness and for reflected human glory," said Britain's Guardian newspaper. "Savor those words: President Barack Obama, America's hope and, in no small way, ours too."

Second book harder to write

The author experienced a slow start to her career, with most of her early work rejected, but she has had many of her short stories published in several magazines since.

Her first book, "The Paper Anniversary," was based off of one of her short stories. Once she found herself writing about the same characters, Wickersham decided to write a novel about them.

Her second book was a much more difficult thing for her to write.

"My father died in 1991, and I started trying to write about it in 1995," said Wickersham. "In some ways, I was writing this story for over 10 years."

She said writing it helped put her father's death in order as well as giving her a way to grieve.

"When my father died, I felt very protective of him originally, but as I wrote this, I did start to get angry for the impact that it had on [my family]," said Wickersham. "One of the things about suicide is that it's really easy to get into very extreme emotions. I was so grateful after my father died when people would come up to tell me wonderful stories about him."

As for the impact on her family, Wickersham said she was lucky. Since the book was centered around her kin, she had to be considerate of what it mean to them.

"I had faith that my family would understand that it was a story I had to tell," said Wickersham. "Some of this is based on fact, and some of it is based on my intuitive memory of my family. That's the thing about a memoir – it's the truth, but never the whole truth."

It has been 15 years since her father's death, and "The Suicide Index" has been an outlet for Wickersham to deal with his suicide.

"I have not had the urge to keep writing about my father after I finished writing this," said Wickersham.

Youth turnout high at election

By Cynthia Dizikes
Los Angeles Times

FAIRFAX, Va — The lines of pajama-clad undergrads waiting to cast ballots – many for the first time in their lives – began forming before dawn Tuesday at George Mason University.

"It's kind of like Christmas Day; everyone's abuzz with it," said 18-year-old Lindsey Denny, who had stayed up all night to finish a project on Czech and Slovak immigration routes over the last 200 years.

"At some point last night I just put a Post-it note over my clock because it didn't matter anymore. I was going to vote no matter what time I went to bed – even if I didn't go to bed."

That type of resolve – the same that kept hundreds of her classmates from hitting the snooze button Tuesday morning, and even led some to skip class to endure hours of waiting in line at a nearby high school – is part of the reason much has been made of the youth vote this election.

That, and some undeniable numbers: Turnout by voters under 30 in the 2008 primaries and caucuses nearly doubled that of eight years ago, according to the University of Maryland's Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning and Engagement, which studies youth voting patterns. This election season, Rock the Vote, a nonpartisan political advocacy group that targets younger voters, reported 2.5 million new registrations from its efforts, more than doubling its 2004 numbers.

These younger voters, according to a recent Gallup Poll, overwhelmingly favor Democratic presidential nominee Barack Obama over Republican John McCain by a ratio of about 2 to 1. And since original party affiliation tends to stick, the new registrations suggest a lasting boost to Democratic voter lists.

Nowhere has this been more obvious than on college campuses like George Mason, where 18-year-old Jennifer Klipper and other registered Republicans were shuttled to the polls in a "Students for Obama" van. "To be a liberal college student is the thing to be right now," she said.

In the student union, across from a boisterous crowd of young Democrats wearing festive garlands and Obama stickers, a lone student furtively approached the College Republicans table to snag a McCain/Palin sticker.

"Be proud," Elise Marsh, the head of the College Republicans, advised him.

"And get beaten up, right," he joked, eyeing the commotion across the atrium.

But despite evidence of high levels of youth activism and turnout, claims of a blowout this year have been tempered by pollsters and analysts.

"It looks like we will see something similar in this election to what we saw in 2004," said Michael McDonald, a professor in George Mason's Department of Public and International Affairs. "Their turnout will probably be higher, but so will everyone else's."

And even with intense get-out-the-vote efforts that some GMU students called borderline harassment, there were still those who chose to stay in.

"I just didn't feel like I should vote because I didn't know enough," said 19-year-old Chelsea Leitz, lying in her bunk bed. "And I guess I'm too lazy to find out."

But for those like Denny who went to the polls for the first time, muddling through the candidate information and the long lines was worth it. "I guess I just feel grown up," she said after casting her ballot.

Proposition 8 struck down in Calif.

By Jessica Garrison
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES — After losing at the polls, gay-rights advocates filed a legal challenge Wednesday in California Supreme Court to Proposition 8, a long-shot effort that the measure's supporters called an attempt to subvert the will of voters.

Lawyers for same-sex couples said they will argue that the anti-gay-marriage measure was an illegal constitutional revision – not a more limited amendment, as backers said.

The legal action contends that Proposition 8 actually revises the state constitution by altering such fundamental tenets as equal-protection guarantees. A measure to revise the state constitution can be placed before voters only by the Legislature.

Opponents of gay marriage expressed outrage at the move.

"This is exactly the type of behavior that brought us to this position to begin with," said Proposition 8 co-chair Frank Schubert. "The people voted eight years ago overwhelmingly in favor of traditional marriage, and they seem to be saying in pretty strong terms again ... that they favor traditional marriage, and yet this is not accepted by gay-rights activists."

"Now, if they want to legalize gay marriage, what they should do is bring an initiative themselves and ask the people to approve it. But they don't. They go behind the people's back to the courts and try and force an agenda on the rest of society."

Former California Supreme Court Justice Joseph Grodin said the legal challenge will be a "tough battle" for supporters of same-sex marriage.

Gay-marriage proponents see it differently. "A major purpose of the Constitution is to protect minorities from majorities. Because changing that principle is a fundamental change to the organizing principles of the Constitution itself, only the Legislature can initiate such revisions to the Constitution," said Elizabeth Gill, a staff attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California.

It is a matter of fairness, said Jenny Pizer, a staff attorney with Lambda Legal. "If the voters approved an initiative that took the right to free speech away from women, but not from men, everyone would agree that such a measure conflicts with the basic ideals of equality enshrined in our Constitution. Proposition 8 suffers from the same flaw. It removes a protected constitutional right – here, the right to marry – not from all Californians, but just from one group of us," she said.

The lawsuit was filed on behalf of Equality California and six same-sex couples who did not marry before Tuesday's election but would like to marry now.

The state Supreme Court has twice before invalidated measures as illegal revisions, but some legal analysts expressed doubt that the Proposition 8 challenge would succeed. Similar attempts to overturn anti-gay-marriage measures have failed in Oregon and Alaska.

A spokesman for San Francisco City Attorney Dennis Herrera said Herrera would also file a legal challenge.

With more than 96 percent of precincts reporting in the state, the measure leads by a margin of 52 percent to 48 percent, prompting the Los Angeles Times to call the race. Opponents of the measure have not yet conceded defeat.

The loss was devastating to many in the state.

Paul Waters and Kevin Voecks of Valley Village, who married more than four months ago, were stunned Wednesday. "More than half of my fellow Californians still don't get it," said Waters, 53. "They still don't understand that sexual orientation is – not a thing that should differentiate."

Early in the campaign, strategist Jeff Flint noted, polls showed the measure trailing by 17 points.

"I think the voters were thinking, 'Well, if it makes them happy, why shouldn't we let gay couples get married.' And I think we made them realize that there are broader implications to society and particularly the children when you make that fundamental change that's at the core of how society is organized, which is marriage," he said.

Elsewhere in the country, two other gay-marriage bans, in Florida and Arizona, also won. In both states, laws already defined marriage as a heterosexual institution. But backers pushed to amend the state constitutions, saying that doing so would protect the institution from legal challenges.

Proposition 8 was the most expensive proposition on any ballot in the nation this year, with more than $74 million spent by both sides.

The battle was closely watched across the nation because California is considered a harbinger of cultural change and because this is the first time voters have weighed in on gay marriage in a state where it was legal.

Campaign contributions came from every state in the nation in opposition to the measure and every state but Vermont to its supporters.

And as far away as Washington, D.C., gay rights organizations hosted gatherings Tuesday night to watch voting results on Proposition 8.

Most of the state's highest-profile political leaders – including both U.S. senators and the mayors of San Francisco, San Diego and Los Angeles – along with the editorial pages of most major newspapers, opposed the measure. PG&E, Apple and other companies contributed money to fight the proposition, and the heads of Silicon Valley companies including Google and Yahoo took out a newspaper ad opposing it.

On the other side were an array of conservative organizations, including the Knights of Columbus, Focus on the Family and the American Family Association, along with tens of thousands of small donors, including many who responded to urging from Mormon, Catholic and evangelical clergy.

An early October filing by the "yes" campaign reported so many contributions that the secretary of state's campaign finance Web site crashed.

Proponents also organized a massive grass-roots effort.

Research and polling showed that many voters were against gay marriage but afraid that saying so would make them seem "discriminatory" or "not cool," said Flint, so proponents hoped to show them they were not alone.

Perhaps more powerfully, the Proposition 8 campaign also seized on the issue of education, arguing in a series of advertisements and mailers that children would be subjected to a pro-gay curriculum if the measure was not approved.

Alcohol may shrink the brain

By Hannah Ferg
The Orlando (Fla. South Florida)

TAMPA, Fla — Alcohol consumption, even in small amounts, might shrink brain size in the long run, according to a recent study.

The study, conducted at Boston University, tested 1,839 people age 33-88. It shows that there is about a 1.5 percent difference between the total brain volume of heavy alcohol drinkers and abstainers. What it does not address, however, is the effect this shrinkage actually has on brain function.

Experts at the University of South Florida said the reported difference in size is not very significant and stressed that function is not always correlated with brain size.

"The amount of shrinkage reported is equal to less than a year of life," said James Mortimer, Ph.D., a professor and researcher in the College of Public Health. "It is not clear whether or not people were worse off cognitively."

The study is still an important find, however, because it sheds new light on the effects of drinking alcohol in small amounts.

"This is the first time that anyone really demonstrated that so-called casual drinking has an effect on brain size," Mortimer said.

Research shows that the brain shrinks with age—slowly at first, but more rapidly at older ages. When the brain shrinks in certain areas, it can cause diseases that impair brain function.

"Alzheimer's disease is the major cause of brain atrophy in old age," Mortimer said.

Dementia, caused by a rapid loss of brain cells, starts in the hippocampus region of the brain, said Ross Andel, a professor in the School of Aging Studies. From there, he said, it spreads to other parts of the brain and affects memory and other brain functions.

Alcohol can have positive and negative effects on brain function. Both Mortimer and Andel said it depends on how much a person drinks. College students who binge drink take the least healthy track by drinking large quantities of alcohol in a small amount of time.

"Alcohol carries a toxin that makes brain cells more vulnerable," Andel said.

Brain cells must strengthen themselves to fight against alcohol in small amounts, Andel said. With large doses of alcohol, however, the cells become too vulnerable and die easily. Alcohol also dehydrates the brain and body.

"People who are alcoholics have a considerable amount of brain shrinkage," Mortimer said.

Though the study shows that people with histories of light or moderate drinking—1 to 2 drinks per day—have smaller brains, many other studies show that they are actually more healthy than those who abstain or drink heavily, Andel said.

"[Moderate drinking] may shrink the brain, but it makes it work well," he said.

Alcohol, in small amounts, is known to prevent Alzheimer's disease and dementia, Mortimer said.

It also helps prevent heart disease, Andel said, and increases good cholesterol levels while breaking down bad cholesterol.

College students may be worse off if they start drinking large amounts of alcohol at a young age, Mortimer said, because they can develop habits that could last their whole lives.

"Those that drink in a high-risk manner pose a risk to themselves and others," said Assistant Director of Health Promotion Holly Rayko Murphy.

Students at USF can learn about alcohol through first-year University Experience classes, the peer education program Responsible Education and Action for Campus Health, and an online program called AlcoholEdu, she said.

This is the second year USF has used AlcoholEdu to educate students before they come to college. If students don't finish the course, they are reported to the Office of Student Rights and Responsibilities.

Though it is difficult to measure the effectiveness of these programs, Murphy said they help.

'I do' for all

The presidential election yielded unsurprising results, the polls in the weeks leading to Nov. 4 called for an Obama landslide long before CNN's 11 p.m. projection and John McCain's subsequent 11:15 p.m. concession speech.

What's troubling about Tuesday's historic outcome was the large number of ballot initiatives throughout the country infringing on another minority populations' civil rights.

In Arkansas, Initiative 1 banned gay adoption; California's Proposition 8 banned gay marriage along with Arizona's Proposition 102 and Florida's Amendment 2.

Why is it that in an election where the Democrat ticket was a tossup between a woman and a black man, two inarguably marginalized demographics, are the gay and lesbian communities still being disenfranchised?

An Obama presidency proves beyond leaps and bounds the diminishing issue of race in America. While still an obstacle to overcome, there have been measurable improvements.

Even McCain's concession speech recognized the importance of this victory beyond the typical Democrat over Republican mantra.

"This is an historic election, and I recognize the special significance it has for African-Americans and for the special pride that must be theirs tonight," McCain said to a sullen crowd in Arizona's capital.

While black Americans are well on the road to complete acceptance, the LGBQT community continues to suffer from an increasingly intolerant electorate.

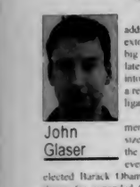
The president-elect is not in favor of gay marriage, but hopefully his inclusion of gays in his victory speech will prove otherwise.

Tuesday night Obama declared about his win: "It's the answer spoken by young and old, rich and poor, Democrat and Republican, black, white, Hispanic, Asian, Native American, gay, straight, disabled and not disabled – (cheers) – Americans who sent a message to the world that we have never been just a collection of individuals or a collection of red states and blue states; we are and always will be the United States of America."

A strong statement to make for a man opposed to gay marriage.

The bold denial of basic rights exemplified in ballot questions that should have never been asked throughout this country is inexcusable.

How do "marriage sanctity" activists justify their position when the divorce rate of American couples is teetering around 50 percent?



The sanctity of marriage died with the onslaught of divorce. The idea of marriage as a binding union between a man and a woman is a religious belief. Neither federal nor state law is or should be an affirmation of religious testaments. The Book of Leviticus is not a legitimate reason to ban gay marriage.

Marriage has long since been cheapened to Las Vegas chapels with Elvis Presley impersonating ministers. When the Internet can turn anyone into an ordained minister, it shouldn't matter whether the happy couple shares a gender or not.

Members of the LGBQT community are second-class citizens in this country and their fight for equality is the biggest civil rights movement of our time.

Big government

John Glaser

In his State of the Union address in 1996, Bill Clinton extolled the end of the era of big government. Four years later, George W. Bush strode into the White House vying for a return to a smaller, less profligate federal government.

Now, in a clear denouncement of the reduction in the size, scope and involvement of the federal government in our everyday lives, the public has elected Barack Obama, ratifying the collective desire for expanded federal responsibilities and what "American Prospect" contributor William Galston has called the return of big government.

The return of big government? Was it ever really gone?

In these past eight years, Bush has presided over the biggest federal budget expansion since President Franklin D. Roosevelt brought us the New Deal and WWII. From 2001, when the statutory budget was $1.9 trillion – to 2009's projected budget of $3.4 trillion – the federal government is evermore a part of our personal lives. No wonder an overwhelming majority of Americans are so unsatisfied with the direction of the country.

It's impossible to accurately portray just how enormous and unrestrained our modern governing institutions have become.

From farm bills that exemplify corporate welfare and harmful market distortions to No Child Left Behind (a thoughtless waste of time and resources), domestic spending has ballooned and become more sluggish, intrusive bureaucracies occupy our institutions more than ever before.

The Prescription Drug Benefit started with a projected 10-year cost of $400 billion and has now increased to over a trillion dollars, showcasing the way government programs are inherently expanding in nature and never ever have a shrinking tendency.

The overall entitlement programs are similarly blowing up. Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security will rise from their current 8.4 percent share of gross domestic product to 18.6 percent in 2050. Entitlements now consume 61 percent of the federal budget and by 2013 it will be 69 percent.

Not enough government? Need Obama to inject us with the cure of more command and management from Washington?

Some estimate this reckless and illegitimate war – solely the product of a giant, deceiving national security state, of a government so big its ultimate goal is to forcefully transform the subordinate governing systems of an entire region of the globe – will cost between two or three trillion dollars. The military, an essential arm of big government, is now more lavishly funded, active and overstretched into every corner of the world than ever before.

The creation of bureaucracies like the U.S. Department of Homeland Security – whose budget has tripled to $36 billion since Bush reorganized 22 agencies from nine different departments into one cohesive and unneeded apparatus of the national security state – have been a tendency of Bush and his view of government.

Big Brother now listens to the phone calls and reads the e-mails of citizens in an overarching illustration of big government excess so blatant that it's hard to imagine anybody ever argued that Bush or Congress ever considered heavy government intrusions as the solution or a secondary resort.

The government has now even forcefully allocated over $700 billion of taxpayer money to buy up stakes in the biggest banks of the financial sector, as if the solution to our economic woes were massive government takeovers of the economy. Can anybody honestly be calling for the return of an expanded, more active federal government?

It's impossible to accurately portray just how enormous and unrestrained our modern governing institutions have become. The appropriate illustration of the thousands of intricate ways the government uses the license the electorate gives it to intrude upon our lives and infringe upon our freedoms will escape this column, but we all ought to care.

And now Obama, who as president has promised to magically create more jobs, quality, affordable health care for every single American, lower gas prices, love and harmony on the international scene, psychological security and stress-free American existences for all, stands before us derriding the small government frame of mind and cries for bigger and bigger government.

It's no wonder Peggy Joseph, a Barack Obama supporter, when interviewed at a rally said of Obama's speech and his incoming presidency, "It was a touching moment. I never thought this day would ever happen. I won't have worry about putting gas in my car. I won't have to worry about paying my mortgage [...] He's going to help me."

Presidents not only lead the entire three branches of the government, but they provide for every pressing need of the average American.

Is there any purer demonstration of the "nanny state" than this current big government and its expected growth? Will this presidency mark the return of big government, or has it been here to stay for many, many decades?

Let us abandon this fraudulent demarcation between Republicans and Democrats, that the former like less government and the latter shoot for more. Both are for big government, neither for liberty.

Conserve energy

I want to examine one aspect of how the next four years might look, through the lens of Barack Obama's energy plan. If you showed up to the polls Tuesday without analyzing the candidates' stances on energy and the environment, here's your chance to catch up.

Steve Hoeschele

Obama tried to make his platform sound as good for the economy as for the planet. He wants to "put 1 million plug-in hybrid cars – cars that can get up to 150 miles per gallon – on the road by 2015, cars that we will work to make sure are built here in America." He'd complement this, his best platform point, by replacing the White House fleet with plug-in hybrids. One question of semantics evades us: does he mean only cars used by the White House or by the entire executive branch?

President-elect Obama wants to "create a new $7,000 tax credit for purchasing advanced vehicles." This is helpful, but how he applies the 'credit' will make a difference in who exactly can afford these cars. Many people who don't even pay $7,000 in taxes will simply laugh at this proposal and buy a cheap combustion engine vehicle. It's great that Obama wants to address demand; let's address supply by requiring automakers to produce more efficient economy cars.

If we're truly addicted to oil, we ought to treat it as addiction. You don't hand your niece a 20-spot so she can score her next meth fix.

He wants to shell out $500 to each taxpayer at the expense of oil companies, ostensibly to "provide short-term relief to American families facing pain at the pump." That sounds good to voters, but it does little to wean Americans off of gasoline. If we're truly addicted to oil, we ought to treat it as addiction. You don't hand your niece a 20-spot so she can score her next meth fix. You show her some alternatives.

Now for the centerpiece of Obama's plan: the creation of five million "green collar jobs" by "strategically investing $150 billion over the next 10 years to catalyze private efforts to build a clean energy future."

The phrase "private efforts" should resonate a bit. While opponents labeled Obama a socialist throughout the campaign, his offer to hand $150 billion in government money to private industry doesn't sound like socialism. It sounds like privatization.

Tackling global climate change ought not be a for-profit operation. The New Deal didn't deliver us from the Great Depression through privatization. If the government can create the Internet and the National Parks system, it can install solar panels. It can do the job as well as any private company and for less money, because private industry skims money off the top for shareholders. And who are the shareholders in the Earth but each one of us?

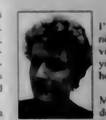
Given the national security and public health implications of the environment, we ought to be investing in public, not private enterprises. Public universities should have priority in research projects; workers with low to mid-skills training should receive government paychecks. What remains in the private sector (like manufacturing cars) ought to be pushed with heavy regulation.

This brings me to one last platform point: the implementation of an economy-wide cap-and-trade program. A cap-and-trade policy sets targets for companies to reduce greenhouse gas emissions; if they succeed, then they can sell their 'credits' to other companies, who may then pollute over their limit. Theoretically, it rewards companies that aren't polluting as much, but it's not so easy to predict the consequences.

The European Union has seen mixed results with its cap-and-trade venture, partly because companies successfully lobbied for higher caps, and partly because of difficulty in setting of prices. Markets also take too long to see results, whereas regulation works swiftly.

But the ideological problem with this approach is that it commodifies pollution. Do we really want to treat pollution as a product to be bought and sold? There's a place for the market in certain things, but not greenhouse gas emissions. Do we really think the market is going to solve global warming? The free market is a major reason we're witnessing environmental degradation in the first place. Stopping global warming is in the interest of all humanity, so collaboration – not competition – will solve it.

Obama's goal, the one often tossed around environmental-policy circles, is to cut greenhouse gas emissions 80 percent by 2050. This implies we can do it patiently. But we might not have until 2050 to solve this problem – the biggest threat to our species since the last ice age.



Our solutions must see an extremely rapid turnaround in results. This means a radical reconstruction of social life. It means cutting space and air travel drastically. It means switching from newsprint to online sources. It means reconsidering the very institutions and operating systems that govern our lives.

So when we think about the next four years of the presidency, I encourage each of us not to think in four-year terms of office at all, but in the 40-year term of a generation. By 2048, our time might be nearly up.

Around Campus

Leave the box blank

S.P. Sullivan

I never thought I'd say this, but next time, don't vote. At least, not if you didn't do your homework.

University of Massachusetts students went in droves to the polls Tuesday. Most went to elect their preferred presidential candidate, to say no on 1 or yes on 2.

Very few, however, knew anything about congressional candidates.

I rode the Student Government Association-funded buses back and forth between Bangs Amherst Community Center and Wildwood Elementary School covering the student reaction to the House of Representatives race between incumbent John Olver and challenger Nathan Bech on Tuesday.

The student reaction was pretty straightforward: "Who?"

Polling voters about their choices for U.S. representative in the Bay State's 1st Congressional district, I found very few people who had informed themselves on the candidates, and even fewer who could name them going into the voting booth.

This was a historical election for youth voter turnout, and student groups on campus should be commended for educating UMass voters on the presidential candidates and ballot initiatives – and for getting out the vote.

Tracie Konopinski, a campus organizer for MassPIRG, said in a phone interview Tuesday that student turnout at Bangs Amherst Center was unprecedented.

"We've been talking to community members that have been voting at Bangs for over 10 years and they said they've never seen this many students come out," she said.

This surge in student civic engagement should be a point of pride for the University community. But next time, if you don't recognize the names in the congressional election slots, just don't check the box.

I asked one woman heading into the polls at Bangs Amherst Center who she was voting for as congressman.

"Oh, I don't know," she said.

I told her that's what a lot of people were saying: That they hadn't realized they'd be voting for local and state officials.

"You should do your story on that," she said.

I said that's the way the story was shaping up. I wondered if she was just going to abstain from voting for congressional candidates.

Looking stupid in a newspaper isn't half as bad as voting stupid in the booth.

"Oh, no," she said. "I'll vote for one of them. I just don't know anything about them."

Oh, I said. Can I get your full name?

"No," she said. "I don't want to look stupid."

Looking stupid in a newspaper isn't half as bad as voting stupid in the booth.

UMass student Chakdor Lokyitsanj was heading out of the polls when I approached him to get his take on the House race. He looked slightly embarrassed when I asked him how he voted.

"I left it blank because I had no idea who they were," he said.

What Lokyitsanj didn't realize is that he did the best thing someone who wasn't concerned with the state election could've done: He voted for his presidential candidate and ballot questions, but when it came to Congress, he left the choosing to people who had read up on the candidates.

College towns make up an unusual voting bloc because they create a large concentration of voters who, although they may be registered in the area, don't have (or at least don't think they have) as large stake in the outcome of local elections. But 18,000 undergrads – especially 18,000 uninformed undergrads – muddle up the results of an election by applying the Feny, meeny, miny moe method.

Of course, an educated electorate takes effort on both sides. While campaign literature for the presidential candidates and ballot questions 1 and 2 were ubiquitous up until Election Day, Congressional candidates were nowhere to be found, save for Republican Keith C. McCormic, who spoke on campus to a small crowd earlier this week. McCormic is a UMass alumnus who unsuccessfully challenged incumbent Stan Rosenberg for his seat.

But the other candidates weren't represented on campus. They missed out on a pretty huge captive audience.

"We have a plethora of ways to get information out there," said Meagan Day, who was standing outside the Wildwood polling place on Tuesday. "And I feel like they didn't get utilized."

I approached Day and her friends to see what they thought about the House race. They were having an intelligent conversation about election issues – everything from Barack Obama to dog racing to Question 2.

But they didn't know anything about Olver and Bech.

Day said she had done her homework on most of the stuff on the ballot, but there was a lot she hadn't heard of before walking into the booth.

"On a few I said, 'No thanks, I'll skip that one.'"

In certain instances not voting does more good than voting.

POINT-COUNTER-POINT

"Freedom rings where opinions clash." - Adlai E. Stevenson

Annie get your gun — or not

Guns aren't for kids

Lauren Rockoff

Children should not be allowed to use guns for the same reasons we don't allow children to drive. Emotionally and physically, children are not prepared to handle guns.

For one thing, kids' reflexes and overall strength are not at the levels necessary for properly aiming or shooting a gun. At the same time, kids may think that guns are benign fun, without recognizing the inherent dangers. These two types of development are processes that cannot be rushed, regardless of how badly a parent wants to pass on his or her love of hunting or of cold, black metal death machines.

But kids love guns. Little boys like nothing better than a BB gun or Super Soaker. I too am guilty of enjoying Duck Hunt on Nintendo as a 10-year-old. But real guns? Real guns pose risks far more quantifiable than those created by simulated violence and pressurized streams of water. And operating a gun isn't as simple as learning how to operate a videogame controller.

Once you give a child a gun, you add a whole ammo case of responsibilities to his belt as well.

If you can't hold a pencil properly, get all your buttons properly aligned without help from your mom, or correctly spell the full name of the weapon you're wielding, chances are you're not of an ideal age to hold it, let alone learn how to shoot it. Certainly there are some exceptions as far as child development and fine motor skills, but generally speaking, children are not physically prepared to use guns.

Next, there's the concept of the threat. Here we have a child who has been to gun shows with his parents all his life. He has been hoisted up by his dad, with an unloaded semi-automatic placed into his hand, to a room full of relatives saying "Ooo" and "Ahh" at the adorable little boy who is destined to take up the same hobby as his father.

This same child gets older and continues to look forward to the shows and the time spent with his parents like nothing else. He's never had a gun of his own before, but one day, somehow, he manages to procure one from someone in the bad part of town.

He doesn't want to shoot anyone with it. He just wants to show his friends how good he is at holding it, at pointing it, at flipping it around in his hand, turning quickly and aiming at an imaginary enemy.

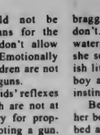
His friends know this, probably because he's bragged about it for days – but his neighbors don't. So one day when this boy's neighbor is out watering the marigolds on her front porch, and she sees out of the corner of her eye the devilish little boy next door aiming a gun at another boy about his size, she acts completely out of instinct.

Before she has time to think, she has run to her bedroom, retrieved the gun she keeps by her bed and shot at the gun-holding arm of the boy next door. The boy falls to the ground in mind-numbing pain, and the neighbor rushes to call 911 and the boy's parents.

Once you give a child a gun, you add a whole ammo case of responsibilities to his belt as well. Every child will not exercise the same degree of caution that a parent expects he will, when prompted on the playground or left alone in the house with an unlocked gun cabinet.

These are weapons. When kids grow up, they will learn about all the weapons of the world – tanks, tear gas and nuclear bombs; they'll learn about war. But as children, we are getting our first taste of the burn of an insult from a school bully and the pain caused by a toy thrown by an angry classmate.

What kind of life are we priming children for if we accompany all this with a gun in their hand, at the age of eight, like the Micro Uzi handed to Christopher Bizil[ last month? That gun was the instrument that killed him when he inexpertly fired it at his own head.



Childhood is a time for losing a favorite dog or fish, and for learning about what the death of that pet actually means. Without first developing an understanding of death and knowing the sense of loss that accompanies it, can a child be expected to understand the very real and irreversible consequences that can result from gun use?

If this basic understanding of death has not been acquired, then the maturation required to operate a gun has not been achieved. Give a gun to a child who does not know what death means, and you also better cross your fingers and cover your eyes, because it probably isn't going to be pretty.

Violence is not inevitable. Guns are no longer a necessary part of life. Whatever your ill-advised reason, say yes to allowing children to learn how to operate guns, and you may well be saying yes to the untimely and horrible death of a child like Christopher Bizil[.

It's the parents' decision

Jon Peterson

Should children be allowed to learn how to use firearms? Since children are not all the same, there cannot be one single answer to apply to all of them. However, the recent death of a young boy has come at a time when there is increased support for more regulation on firearms.

Lawmakers are now considering whether further regulation is necessary, but while this event is profoundly tragic, the best intentions of such new regulation could very well lead to more deaths than we attribute to children with firearms now.

Ideally, politicians have always attempted to make laws that both maximize the amount of freedom we have to work with, while also restricting what we can do so we won't infringe upon the rights of others to do the same things.

In 1964, Ralph Nader wrote the book that would come to embody his overall world view for the rest of his life. In "Unsafe at Any Speed," Nader describes different risks that are associated with certain cars, particularly the Chevrolet Corvair. This led to the passage of legislation mandating seat belts and stronger windshields.

This was considered a boon at the time, but what happened is indisputable. Over the following years, the amount of deaths did not decrease. Bodies do not lie, and while the amount of fatalities in accidents was proportionately lower, it seemed as if the people driving had less of an incentive to drive safely, and thus there were more accidents that may have in the past been fatal but now were not.

Because people felt they were less likely to be hurt by driving recklessly, they were now more likely to switch the radio station, do their hair or look for something on the floor.

A similar parallel came into affect with the banning of handguns in Washington, D.C., 30 years ago. After the legislation went into effect, there was a marked increase in shooting deaths in the nation's capital over the coming years.

The same principle applies to the current situation. While events such as this one are undoubtedly tragic, it may very well be that more lives are saved through adults responsibly teaching children to use firearms than are lost in accidents such as this one.

There isn't a single sane adult who would give a child a gun and tell them to go have fun. Such a thing would not only be extremely irresponsible, but it would also be a textbook example of reckless and wanton behavior, as the district attorney is now investigating the incident to find out if such a charge against the Uzi exhibitor would be just.

The closest that most people get to a gun in the Five College and University of Massachusetts area now is probably the one they see on the hip of a police officer. If you can imagine the differences between someone who has skydived before, and someone who has not, then you have an idea of the differences in perceptions people have over simple issues.

While one may see it as a safe thing to do, which they engage in knowing full well what they're doing, the other may see it as a crazy thing to do, which they would be freaked out by if going themselves, until they became comfortable with it.

The situation is the same with firearms. Many homes in the Midwest and heartlands of the country have gun racks and baskets of guns around as tools to be familiar with, and not as something to be disconnected from.

It comes down to the question though, should we trust the adults of our society to teach their children how to use firearms?

The Cub Scouts and Boy Scouts both have events in which youth are instructed in firearms, and many JROTC programs have knowledge of the structure and use of firearms as prerequisites for advancement.

These trainings with firearms are always instructed by trained professionals, and most of the kids come away with a new respect and knowledge of the guns. And since children have less experience with such things, it is undoubtedly better that they be allowed to know what a gun is, with a trained adult, and how not to use it, rather than letting them find out without an adult around.

It just comes down to the question though, should we trust the adults of our society to teach their children how to use firearms? Or is there greater harm in these isolated, though terrible events? The answer is this: We must let this decision be left up to parents, on an individual level.

If an adult is going to own a firearm, they will do it as safely as they see fit for themselves and their families. But when you choose to leave such a thing unaddressed, you are acting like the average seat belt wearer – driving your car, with your eyes constantly glued to the floor, looking for something which you may not find until it is too late.

DIPLOMACY NECESSARY

Dear Editor,

(Re: "Bye George W. Bush, it's been Israel," Alana Goodman, Editorial, Oct 31)

The worst part of Alana Goodman's column isn't that she pretends that George W. Bush launched the 'war on terror' solely on Israel's behalf. It also isn't that she shamelessly invokes 9/11 and Auschwitz. No, the worst part of her argument is that she pretends that the Bush Administration's approach to terrorism is working. And anyone with a handle on common sense can see that it is not.

Goodman asserts that diplomacy never works against terrorism, so in her support of the Bush Doctrine she shows no respect for political sovereignty. It's hard to remember now, but there was a time in our nation's history when we fought terrorism through diplomacy, using incentives and threats to convince sovereign nations to clamp down on criminal elements within their borders. Now we just invade these nations outright with no respect for the rule of law, claiming all the while that "9/11 changed everything."

There is no way that you can 'win' against terrorists without diplomacy. It's simple: Every time you kill a terrorist (or in many cases, a terrorist and dozens of unrelated civilians) you more than likely orphan a child. In many cases, out of honor or revenge or anguish, this child grows up and commits acts of unspeakable violence. Killing terrorists – by invading and occupying countries where they might be – only creates more terrorists.

Maybe I'm being too charitable here. After all, Goodman's column reveals her apparent inability to distinguish between some extremist Islamic youths (the terrorists) and the far larger population of peaceful Arabs living in countries near Israel. I'll explain: she lauds President Bush for having the judgment and wisdom to "[realize] the danger that Islamic fanaticism poses," but then goes on to describe Israel as a "lighthouse of democracy amidst a sea of unrestrained barbarity."

Which one is it? Are we fighting the terrorists or would Goodman prefer that we launch a wider war against Arabs in general? Surely if she sees the modern world as a conflict between "Judeo-Christian civilization" and Islamic barbarians, and also finds a hero in our own fanatic Christian President, this isn't much of a logical leap.

FACTUAL HAZE

Dear Editor:

(Re: "One joint too many," Melissa Garber, Editorial, Oct. 30)

I am writing this e-mail in response to the editorial printed in the October 30 edition of The Collegian entitled "One joint too many." I don't want this to turn into some vitriolic, knee-jerk rant of mine – so I will err on the side of brevity.

I find this editorial to be rife with instances of irresponsible journalism. Notwithstanding the fact this is an editorial opinion, I am not enthused by the fact that the columnist chose to cite not only false information, but also anecdotal information that carries little relevance to this discussion at large. Just because an article may be purposefully devoid of academic merit does not mean that the communications found therein should be devoid of true data.

The assertion that an ounce of marijuana is somehow worth $600 on the street is just plain wrong. I won't presume to be the authority, nor will I provide an absolute authority on the subject, but that fact quote is a complete mischaracterization of the facts.

In the month of October, the going rate for an ounce of outdoor, mid-grade marijuana averaged approximately $400. The upper end of that figure was $480 for a particular strain of marijuana called "Jack Herer", a top quality strain of marijuana. In fact, only the very best strains come anywhere close to that $600 figure – the kind that are not normally procured by average smokers according to "High Times."

The second assertion that an ounce of marijuana represents 56 individual sales is similarly mischaracterized. To take this so far to say that Question 2 would pave the way for pot dealers to run low-risk business ventures is ludicrous. 56 individual sales from an ounce of marijuana amounts to 1/2 gram per sale (.5062 grams to be exact).

No one in their right mind buys such a small amount of marijuana and even if one individual chooses to purchase such an infinitesimal of the plant, it is quite a leap of faith to believe that is commonplace.

If you combine the aforementioned notion of 56 individual sales per ounce at approximately $10 per 1/2 gram, you can see where the $600 figure came from.

However, bootstrapping those two concepts together, in spite of their false pretenses, to convey the notion that this would "[decriminalize] the drug dealer's role" is just plain irresponsible. Clever math might make these assertions seem correct, but that is far from the actual truth.

In the future, I would just like to see some more fact-checking/responsible research done before a columnist publishes their 'educated' opinion on the matter.

PRO-LIFE ONLY WAY

Dear Editor,

(Re: "Morality versus Social Status," Michael Toomey, Editorial, Oct 29)

It's alarming that conservative views on abortion are labeled "alarming." I have a hard time comprehending how pro-life views are seen by opposition as erratic, uncompassionate and disrespectful.

Although I hold my own views on the topic, I try hard to really understand where the pro-choice, pro-abortion sect is coming from. I really do. But hours of research later, I'm still faced with a predicament, ending the life of any human being is wrong.

Despite partisan opinion, I'm sure we all agree that social justice is a great necessity in America. While we fight for better programs for the poor, equal opportunity for all genders, races, and physicality's, we as Americans, as human beings, are overlooking the most basic social injustice of our time, abortion.

While we cry out for peace and end to wars abroad, we fear for the lives of both Americans and foreigners. Yet, the war in Iraq is not the most life-ending event happening to Americans.

An American genocide is occurring right in front of our eyes, but we easily turn away because the millions of lives lost since the legalization of abortion have merely been labeled "choices."

From 1973 through 2008, more than 50 million legal abortions have occurred. Fifty million of our own citizens, called to death before their first breaths are even taken.

The issue isn't a choice. It isn't. Because if it were, I would be a hypocrite. I'm pro-choice in many aspects of my views. It's your choice where to attend college, it's your choice which Halloween costume to wear, but taking the life of an innocent, vulnerable child is not – and cannot be – considered a choice.

The issue of abortion, unlike what Mr. Toomey claimed to be true, is not based on Christianity. The issue is not whether or not the baby has a "soul" or an "abstract right to live." This is a sad attempt at convincing himself and others that abortion is a religious, not social or secular issue.

It's easy to look at abortion in a specific light. Take it from Antony James Matthews Wallace during "The Compleat Heretic" episode, who claims he is "both a Secular Humanist atheist and a pro-life advocate." Going further, Mr. Toomey's point about the impossibility of proving the existence of a "Christian Soul" is both moot and completely off topic. If the idea of a soul is eliminated from the equation, we still must ask ourselves if it is okay to end a life?

Mr. Monsour's claim is further dispelled by fact (yes fact, and not just Christian conservative, right winged opinion) when he says that it cannot be proven that fetus's feel anything while in the womb.

In actuality, just 18 weeks after its fertilization, "all parts of the brain and spinal cord are formed. The heart pumps blood to every part of the body. The whole body is sensitive to touch (except for portions of the head."

Trying to convince me, and all other readers that a human being, formed with all of its parts yet unborn, cannot feel or experience the treacherous abortion procedure, is preposterous.

Google abortion procedures and how they are done, put yourself in the unborn baby's position, and then try supporting abortion. An innocent life does not have to be taken as a consequence of an unwanted pregnancy.

Oberst crosses into friendly confines

Bright Eyes frontman brings show to NoHo

Conor Oberst will perform at the Northampton Academy of Music tonight in support of his first true solo album. Oberst sings personally-themed songs largely focused on his restless nature and recent travels across the country.

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

"It all boils down to one quotable phrase," sings Conor Oberst on the Bright Eyes song "Landlocked Blues," "'If you love something, give it away.'"

That's precisely what Oberst did this year, assuming he hasn't grown to despise his Bright Eyes band-moniker, as he has released his new set of songs under his own name.

His first true solo outing since cassettes released in the early to mid-1990s, the self-titled affair was released Aug. 5 on Merge Records. He has been and will be touring as Conor Oberst & the Mystic Valley Band, including a nearby stop at the Northampton Academy of Music tonight with guests Ben Kweller and Rig 1.

The Mystic Valley Band consists of Oberst at the helm, with Taylor Hollingsworth (guitar), Nik Freitas (guitar), Macey Taylor (bass), Nate Walcott (keys, trumpet) and Jason Boesel (drums).

Without a doubt, this is not a Bright Eyes album. While many Bright Eyes tracks feature Oberst's own (brutal, at times) introspection, the new record seems to tackle more global issues without compromising his intricate and clever wordplay.

He has stepped out from his cracked shell to release a country record whose purpose seems more accurately described as good ol' fun than the sounds of his previous demon-exorcising work.

Since his apparent clean-up during sessions from "Cassadaga," the most recent Bright Eyes record, Oberst has embraced a less frantic form of songwriting. He seems to have learned – or become more comfortable with – patience, turning traditionally structured numbers into examples of beautiful modern composition.

Highlights from the record are plentiful, including the twanging rocker "Sausalito," the second track on the album. This is one of many in this bunch of songs focused on movement and travel, reflecting the restless nature Oberst possesses, always ready for the open road and highways that stretch on forever.

Dragging storyline slows 'Changeling'

By Jennifer Turner
Collegian Correspondent

Clint Eastwood knows how to make a beautiful movie. Visually stunning in every way, his films are a pleasure to behold. However, it takes more than sheer beauty to make a great movie.

"Changeling," starring Angelina Jolie, John Malkovich and University of Massachusetts alumus Jeffrey Donovan, is director-producer Clint Eastwood's latest cinematic accomplishment. It finished fourth at the weekend box office, just behind "High School Musical 3," "Zack and Miri Make a Porno" and "Saw V."

"Changeling" is based on the true story of the Wineville Chicken Coop Murders that took place in California in the late 1920s. The film focuses on the story of Christine Collins, her missing son, and the corruption found within the Los Angeles Police Department. When Collins reports her son as missing, the wrong child is returned to her and she turns to the police to fix the problem. The LAPD insists she absolutely must be mistaken, and that the boy is without a doubt her son.

Although it seems that Collins is at her wits' end, an unlikely hero emerges in the form of the Rev. Gustav Briegleb, a radio personality and charismatic

Election coverage back to reality

By Tom Shales
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON – Just as one day was giving way to another, Barack Obama appeared before thousands of cheering supporters in Chicago's Grant Park and said, "Change has come to America" – which naturally made them cheer all the louder.

It was the beginning of the climax to a long and suspenseful evening of election returns, the nation riveted for hours to television, the Internet, radio or their hand-held 21st-century gadgets – wherever they could get the news about what had miraculously happened during the day.

Obama's victory speech – before a crowd that CBS anchor Katie Couric estimated at 125,000 – was actually shorter than John McCain's concession speech. The 44th president-elect spoke of challenges as well as victories, reciting a "Yes, we can" litany of promises to be made and kept as the nation struggles its way out of economic catastrophe and a debilitating national disillusionment.

The young victor also praised the courage and integrity of his defeated opponent. When Obama mentioned McCain's name, there didn't seem to be any boos coming from the crowd, as there were in Phoenix moments before. And so Obama didn't have to shush any disgruntled bad sports. In fact there was a cheer for McCain that was inspired by Obama's gentlemanly praise.

Network anchors and reporters vied for airtime in which to express their own elation at Obama's win, and a sometimes inappropriate personal sense of victory were reporters who said they were thrilled by Obama's winning sort of confirming charges of pro-Obama bias that had been leveled by McCain forces during the campaign? Perhaps in the historic grandeur of the moment, it didn't really matter. Bigger issues were at stake, bigger matters lay ahead.

Before Obama appeared, however, viewers saw and heard McCain, speaking from Phoenix, give perhaps the most beautiful speech of his career, a concession speech such as none of us ever heard before. McCain began by acknowledging Obama's victory and continued by analyzing the significance of it and finding it a very good thing.

When a groan or two in the crowd booed the mention of Obama's name, McCain held out his hands in a "stop" gesture and said, "Please, please." He clearly wanted to put all conflict behind him as he pledged his support to the new president in a particularly moving and eloquent way.

There was no way such a long story as the 2008 campaign was going to have a short, snappy ending. And so it was that although the networks signed on with election-night coverage right after their evening newscasts, and stayed on through prime time and beyond, viewers had to watch and wait for hours before learning anything blessedly solid about the next president of the United States.

Until 11 p.m., when all the networks gave the election to Obama and cameras showed the surging, cheering crowds, gathered in Grant Park to celebrate the historic moment.

To fill time and space, the networks hemmed and hawed and hemmed again, reiterating all the variables – and even hauled out their latest high-tech toys.

At about 7:15 Tuesday night, reporter Jessica Yellin materialized from Chicago via "hologram" at CNN studios while an amused Wolf Blitzer looked on. Yellin said she felt like Princess Leia in "Star Wars." She looked like her, too, outlined with a thin, white halo of eerie President-elect Barack Obama delivered his first address to the public from Chicago. Television networks provided multiple approaches to covering the historic event.

Putting your leaves to work

Useful tips for dealing with unsightly mounds of foliage

By Adrian Higgins
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON – November is the month when nature's solar panels, leaves, detach themselves from their mother trees and shrubs, and fall to the ground. It's interesting to observe how people react to this phenomenon.

For some, each fallen leaf is an insult, every descent an act of wanton littering. By now, the neatniks are out there daily, gathering the leaves by rake or blower, bagging them or forming neat piles by the curb. One can only imagine their pain, having spent a weekend picking up each leaf, only to lie in bed listening to the wind undo all their work.

Then there are others who don't bother at all, and let leaves pile up through the winter. This is not good. Apart from the untidiness of it, matted leaves can kill grass and accumulate, harmfully, in the crown of plants.

I fall somewhere in the middle, picking up leaves on the lawn with the mower on weekends and pouring the mixture of leaf and grass clippings into a couple of compost piles. And when the garden beds are smothered in magnolia, oak and locust leaves, out comes the blower. I attend to this when I can, and if the garden floor is leafless by Christmas, I'm happy.

In this age of thrift and environmental concern, it seems bizarre that we then bag or curb our leaves to be taken away. And to where? Yard waste makes up 13 percent of our trash, according to the Environmental Protection Agency. Many municipalities divert this away from landfills and into composting yards, where the leaves are shredded and piled into steaming mounds that are halfway decayed come spring; enterprising gardeners then collect it and return it to their yards.

Wouldn't it make more sense, though, to keep the leaves on-site?

There are three ways of doing this (composting, creating a leaf mulch and making leaf mold), and you may have to employ all of them if you have a lot of old trees and the leaf drop is significant.

The importance of compost cannot be overstated. I got a behind-the-scenes look at two gardening institutions in the past year, Longwood Gardens in Kennett Square, Pa., and Prince Charles' garden at Highgrove in the English Cotswolds. In both places, the emphasis on compost production was paramount.

There is no better ingredient for soil improvement or for feeding the creatures of the soil that are so important for the well-being of our plants. But making compost scares a lot of people, who fear that piles will be unsightly, attract vermin and stink. All those concerns are real, and perfecting the art of compost making is difficult. But if you follow a few basics, you can avoid those pitfalls.

A compost pile should be large, about a cubic yard in volume, to create the critical mass for the decay organisms. It should be kept moist but not wet, and it should be turned occasionally with a pitchfork. The microbes that break down the pile need a mixture of carbon for energy and nitrogen for growth and generally a lot more of the brown carbon than the green nitrogen. Nitrogen can be found in such things as vegetative kitchen scraps, waste from light. It was a cute trick, but how did it substantially contribute to the coverage? No one seemed to know.

ABC News bragged that it would turn all of Times Square into a TV studio, but mainly that consisted of going outside the studios usually occupied by "Good Morning America" and taking pictures of shouting crowds who, in turn, looked up to see televised pictures of – themselves. Charlie Gibson seemed disdainful of the contributions made by co-anchors Diane Sawyer – who energized the coverage the way Sarah Palin energized the Republicans, but without winks – and George Stephanopoulos.

Gibson gets the grumps when the technology fails him; plus, he had come off a slightly accident-prone edition of ABC's "World News."

NBC had boasted that Rockefeller Center's famous ice-skating rink, eight stories below the studio where "Saturday Night Live" originates, would play a major role in reporting returns, but that turned out to be a fairly low-tech operation. An outline had been drawn in the ice, and then workers spray-painted in the red and blue states when the network would finally, sometimes hesitantly, call a state for Barack Obama or John McCain.

Anchor Brian Williams and anchor emeritus Tom Brokaw stopped early in the proceedings to remember the late Tim Russert, NBC's house pundit and "Meet the Press" moderator who had played such a lively and substantial role in election-night marathons. His absence was a handicap, but political ace Chuck Todd (also appearing on MSNBC) proved an able successor.

Todd, reporter Ann Curry and others took turns appearing in a virtual room that, thanks to computer trickery, looked like a miniature version of the Jefferson Memorial, with Curry assuming Jefferson's place. The reporters were actually standing on an all-green studio set.

And at CBS News, the decision was made to forgo the fancy high-tech trappings and emphasize the human element, with Couric anchoring and commentators Bob Schieffer (vigorous and helpful) and Jeff Greenfield (the proverbial fuddy-duddy) helping. The 2008 campaign, especially in recent months, marked a genuine comeback for Couric, who has been much maligned since moving to the evening news; she did the best of all network interviews with vice presidential candidate Palin.

Couric also distinguished herself in her interviews with Obama and McCain, the latter giving one of his last interviews of the campaign to her. It aired on Tuesday night's "CBS Evening News," and at one point, McCain was unexpectedly and perhaps unintentionally poignant when he said of the long campaign, "I'll never forget it as long as I live."

Among the most ominously absent voices: that of Dan Rather, the anchor who was ignominiously excommunicated from CBS after more than a quarter-century. Yet Rather was still a presence in election-night coverage, heading up the reporting on the under-funded HDNet channel, which is available in a limited number of American homes. Those who missed such phrases as "we have a hitch in our giddyup" could tune over to hear it on HDNet – Rather in exile, the Bill Clinton of anchordom.

Fearful to an almost pathological point of calling states too soon (and being criticized for it later), networks took turns being wildly cautious, perhaps none more so than CNN. When it could have been calling Ohio for Obama, CNN instead cut to an election-night performance by Hank Williams Jr., a quixotic editorial decision and a ridiculous waste of time. The network might have bent too far backward in holding back results.

CNN's arsenal of glitz machines included a long vertical touch-screen at which Soledad O'Brien and veteran Bill Schneider called up states and demographic groups and analyzed their swings and sways. Standing together, they looked a bit like Nanny and the Professor. Once, when Schneider tapped the screen and no data appeared ("Whoops, it's not working"), plucky O'Brien told him "a little harder" and, following her cue, Schneider got the material to appear.

So it was that months and months of political warfare turned into another kind of battle: humans against machines. At last look, the humans were winning, but the race is too close to call.

Pioneer Valley goes 'Mystic'

Originally from Omaha, Neb., Oberst yearns for state lines, traveling through many of them all the way to California's bay area.

"There's nothing that the road cannot heal," he muses in the chorus of "Moab." Though Utah is only two state lines away, any state-to-state travel from the Midwest is a journey.

"When I get to Moab, I'll get my canteen filled," he predicts. Perhaps it's just one stop on the way to where the land ends, California's Pacific coast. "Moab" unabashedly references Tom Petty, in particular the mini-breakdown before the song's final stretch.

Oberst also show's that he's not completely cured of his self-consciousness, prompting a quality-control question. "So from one to 10, 10 is exactly what I am, zero being everything I'm not," he sings, readying himself to plead with the listener, "Tell me what you like," before asking the all-important question: "Is it less than five? Is it less than five?" Doubts aside, he is convinced that the road will nurse him.

Another traveling ditty precedes "Moab" in the form of "NYC Gone, Gone," an all-out stomping freedown of a song, for whatever that's worth, in its one minute and 11 seconds. "NYC" curtly describes a trip from New York to Mexico City to alleviate an empty head, and what better way to fill one's head than spending days upon days on the road?

It turns out that the album was actually recorded south of the border, in Tepoztlan, Morelos, Mexico, in a villa named Valle Mistico (from here, those not versed in Spanish could probably make the translation to "Mystic Valley," the band's namesake) over a month's time early this year.

Oberst touches upon the travel of words as well. One can send words, as he explains in "Get-Well-Cards," the old-fashioned way. It's hard to tell specifically where he's talking about in the song, though he references rebuilding and the inability to stay angry. Perhaps time, as well as the road, can act as a cure-all.

Modest songs like "Get-Well-Cards" and the downcast "Lenders in the Temple" rely on delicate instrumentation and wise lyrics, though others, such as "I Don't Want to Die (In the Hospital)" lack, plain and simple.

Old-timey piano rockets through the song as Oberst dreads croaking under fluorescent lights. "They give me all these flowers and these big balloons, but I don't want to stay in this little room," he begs. Oh, the boredom bound within the sedate hospital – "They don't let you smoke and you can't get drunk!" What a shame.

The first single from the album, "Souled Out!!!," does a fine job working in the whole Mexico content to sum up the album, with mention of the Barrio (the neighborhood "a few streets over") and a typical Mexican name, Miguel ("he's a friend of mine").

This leads into the closer "Milk Thistle," a hopeful, poetic ballad consisting of Oberst and a lone acoustic guitar down-tempo in the vein of "Lime Tree," the last track from "Cassadaga." "I'm not scared of nothin'," Oberst sings, though he confesses "I keep death on my mind like a heavy crown."

He has grown, yet still sounds youthful and, give or take a few instances of fear, optimistic and forward-thinking. He is far from stagnant, singing "I'm nowhere-bound, just going up and down, up and down."

Stagnancy is the enemy of change, and change has been the theme of the week and, surely, for at least the last four years. Oberst recently played an Obama-powered pre-election "Concert for Change" in Minneapolis; on Oct. 29, proof that he is still politically motivated.

Tonight's show, just hours after Barack Obama was named the nation's president-elect, will surely touch upon the massive shift. Surely Oberst is glad he and the band are safe in the familiar territory of Massachusetts, an audience waiting with open arms to accept another comrade.

Eastwood shows his cinematic gifts again

Presbyterian minister played by an uncharacteristically docile Malkovich. Briegleb rallies Los Angeles and gets the whole city involved in Collins' plight.

A very emotional film, the acting was good, though not great. However, consider the context. Jolie spent over 75 percent of her on-screen time crying. Don't be fooled, it's not an easy thing for an actor to do on command and that often, but it would have been nice to see her character stretched in some other directions.

Jolie is a talented actress, and the character of Christine Collins doesn't utilize her substantial abilities to their fullest. Yes, she was playing a distraught mother who has lost her son, but it got really old watching her cry and not exhibit any other emotions.

Malkovich was enigmatic as always, but again, this character didn't demand very much from him. It seemed as if Malkovich was holding back rather than letting his customary commanding presence come forward. This may have very well been the direction he received, in order to be true to the story. Nonetheless, it was a disappointment, and his presence on the screen is lacking.

Donovan created the most entertaining character portrayal. He was both convincing and captivating in the role of corrupt LAPD Captain J.J. Jones.

Donovan created a real villain out of his character, and one couldn't help but love to hate him. His fake Irish accent comes off as a bit amusing, though it was most likely meant to sound authentic. That small detail aside, his on-screen time was some of the best of the film.

Now onto Clint. He took a very dark topic and created a very dark environment for his movie. Although the film is in color, the colors are all extremely dull, and there is an overabundance of darkness and shadow. The only times the viewer sees light is through the harsh light of day.

Eastwood uses sunlight coming through windows repeatedly throughout the film, and in each shot it is done brilliantly. The contrasts of light and dark create all the appropriate drama for the events happening on screen. The lack of color did make for a depressing mood, as surely was the design.

This is not a happy, feel-good movie. It mirrors the facts of a notorious murder case very closely, while straying slightly for artistic merit.

The film's largest fault is a product of its following these details so closely. It turned into a very long, drawn out experience. The run time on this movie is two hours, 21 minutes. Tack on nearly 15 minutes of previews to that, and it'd be best to not make any plans for almost three hours.

Overall, "Changeling" is a visually beautiful movie, but its dragging storyline makes it a better candidate for a rental then a night out at the movies.

Brewing Co. Virginians in name only

By Greg Kitsock
The Washington Post

When Old Dominion Brewing in Ashburn, Va., abruptly shuttered its pub Aug. 25, citing declining business, loyal customers feared that the brewery would soon follow. Coastal Brewing, Old Dominion's parent company, assured otherwise.

"Right now there's been no talk of that, and we have a lease that runs quite some time in Ashburn," Casey Hollingsworth, Coastal's vice president for sales and marketing, told the Mid-Atlantic Brewing News in September.

"We are here to stay," brewer Jesse Brenneman wrote in an e-mail Oct. 6.

On Oct. 21, however, Coastal announced the brewery's closure, which chief executive Garry Williams said will probably occur by the end of March. In the months to come, Coastal will tote enough tanks to its other plant, Fordham Brewing in Dover, Del., to brew 20,000 barrels of Old Dominion beers there.

"What it comes down to is it's not economically feasible to operate in Ashburn," Hollingsworth said. The rent at the industrial park there, he noted, is more than three times the rent in Dover. Nor is it ecologically sound. "Going back and forth between Ashburn and Dover is a waste of fuel." Hollingsworth said he wasn't privy to the board of directors' decision to close the brewery until four days before the announcement. Old Dominion's brewers weren't informed until the day the press release went out.

Although Anheuser-Busch holds 49 percent of Coastal Brewing, Hollingsworth asserted that the St. Louis brewer did not dictate the closure. "No pressure was needed," he said. "The issue is based on economics." He said the Dover plant will continue to brew all of Old Dominion's current brands using the same recipes.

But the Old Dominion brew crew will not remain intact. Head brewer Favio Garcia says he will not make the move to Delaware, although all employees have been offered work there. "I have family in the D.C. area," he explained.

That's a pity.

Since buying the brewery in March 2007, Coastal has angered Old Dominion fans by canceling the brewery's summer festival; dropping most of the company's contract brands, including the popular Tuppers' Hop Pocket Ale and New River Pale Ale; and closing the pub. But the quality of the beers has not changed.

Jerry Bailey, who helped found Old Dominion in 1989, said this year's edition of Dominion Oktoberfest was the best the brewery has ever produced. Garcia has tweaked the recipe for Dominion Pale Ale, adding more Pacific Northwest hops for extra aroma. More recently, he brewed a Baltic porter as the brewery's winter offering. The stronger, more robust take on the porter style should be hitting D.C. area shelves soon. Garcia said he based it on a brew Old Dominion made in 2004, upping the hops and adding rye.

Even if Coastal can maintain the quality standards, however, the question remains: Will customers maintain their brand loyalty to Old Dominion beers when they're no longer made in the Old Dominion?

That question, posed to subscribers to DC-Beer (an e-mail list of local beer aficionados), elicited mostly negative feedback.

"I've tried to keep an open mind about OD, but all of the events of the past few years makes it a little hard," complained Chuck Triplett. "I won't reject good beer from OD, but I likely won't seek out their products unless I hear of something stellar from them."

"They're not a local beer any more, so any loyalty I had has flown out the window," responded Lynne Ragazzini. "I'll drink more Victory and more Dogfish. And Bell's [...] I are thee well, dear Dominion. It was fun while it lasted!"

Aaron Hermes noted he would have preferred it if the brewery had "ended up with someone who intended to keep it local." In fact, a former Old Dominion employee tried in vain to work out a deal. Unsuccessful suitors reportedly also included former local beer baron Gary Heurich and Vermont's Magic Hat Brewing.

Despite the closure of it's brewery in Ashburn, Va., Old Dominion will continue to brew in a Dover, Del. plant.

UMass consistent throughout season

same. If you lost in overtime it's still 'You lost a game' and it goes on the board as a loss."

"Sometimes it almost feels like it hurts more when you lose by just one goal or in overtime," said senior forward Katelyn Orlando. "Because you know you can play with the team and continue playing with the team. It's not so much that you lost that game, but you ran out of time."

Despite some tough losses, UMass has avoided any major letdowns this season. As a young team, some early growing pains were expected. But as the season progressed, the Minutewomen never allowed any game to get away from them.

UMass' ability to stay so consistent all season can be attributed to the team's balance and versatility. With forwards Jill Powers, Katie Kelly and Orlando all having standout years, the Maroon and White are no longer a one dimensional team.

Unlike last year's squad, the Minutewomen can win games with their offense if their defense has gotten them into a hole. In addition to the Syracuse game, there were a few instances throughout the season where UMass let up one or two early goals, only to come back and win the game.

"I think that when, especially the games we've been down and we got scored on first, we've just fought that much harder to come back," Shea said. We never really freak out and just keep playing out game."

"We used to be a team that, when we got a goal down, we'd get down on ourselves," Orlando said. "In this year and the past couple of years we've really been able to overcome being down."

That combination of timely offense and the team's ability to stay healthy is what has allowed for UMass' stability. This year, the Minutewomen have had every player at its disposal in order to make up for any struggles they may have.

"If one or two players are down on performance, their teammates can pick it up. If we relied on scoring field goals, then our penalty corner unit would pick up the responsibility and vice versa," Sowry said. "As much as we're inexperience in some aspects, we're experienced in knowing how to get the job done."

Vick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu

Junior forward Jill Powers has eight goals and two assists this season. The Minutewomen travel to Philadelphia this weekend as the top seed in the Atlantic 10 Conference Tournament.

Senior midfielder Erin Parker has five goals and eight assists for 18 points this season. UMass takes on St. Joseph's this weekend.

Success in penalty corners help No. 17 Minutewomen

Orlando has feasted on goal opportunities in conference play this season, scoring seven goals in six conference games. Kelly is second, with five goals against A-10 foes.

Another area in which UMass excels in is penalty corners, with 57 corner knocks against conference opponents. St. Joseph's, however, has just 40.

Yet St. Joe's isn't the only team for the Minutewomen to study. In its regular season win against Richmond (9-10, 5-1 A-10), UMass struggled with the Spiders' defense, which prevented the Minutewomen from consistently using a press on offense. UMass or Richmond ranks first in almost all major statistical categories in conference play.

The Spiders were able to spread the ball around, a reason the Minutewomen struggled to maintain a rhythm on both offense and defense. Richmond has a 33-2 47 edge in assists per game.

The Spiders also lead the conference in goals scored in conference play, with 24. However, UMass has surrendered the fewest conference goals, giving up three against conference opponents.

The final team in the tournament is Temple (8-11, 4-2 A-10). With a 6-2 home record, the Owls are best suited at home in this matchup. The Minutewomen beat Temple to win the regular season conference title outright, although it took two overtime periods to do so.

Owls' goalkeeper Erin Hanshue gave one of the best performances in the game, making 18 saves in the loss. Yet the Temple defense still bothered UMass and prevented all but one goal during regulation.

The opening for the Minutewomen was on a feed from Jaime Bourazeris to Orlando, a frequent goal-and-assist pair.

UM rides hot streak

Maine has played outstanding on the other side of the ball. In three of the four games of its current winning streak the "Black Hole" has held its opponents to under 100 yards rushing and has forced 13 turnovers in its last four games.

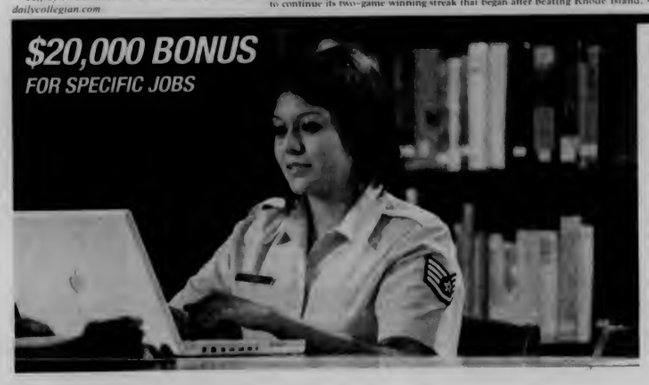
Maine's most impressive victory on the season and of its winning streak may have come two weeks ago when they blanked Northeastern, 20-0.

"I think the game that kind of opened my eyes was [Maine's] shutout of Northeastern at [Orono, Maine]. It was certainly a huge win for them," Brown said.

But Maine won't be the only team on a hot streak coming into McGuirk Stadium this weekend. The Minutemen are on a two-game winning streak and coming off a 49-0 victory over last-place Rhode Island. During UMass' last two victories it has outscored its opponents 91-7.

The Minutemen's offense and defense have both been playing some of their best football as well. Senior quarterback Liam Coen has been close to perfect in his past two games, completing 26-of-35 passes for 630 yards, eight touchdowns, no interceptions and was not sacked once.

The defense has been strong, including junior Josh Jennings. The linebacker had two interceptions against the Rams, one of which he returned 40 yards for a touchdown.



Brown and the Minutemen know that momentum can only last until they step on the field Saturday, but a good week of preparation will go a long way once they are there.

"Well there is no question our guys are riding the confidence level, but those things only last until Saturday at noon when you get started," Brown said. "I think we've done a very good job from Sunday to Friday preparing for [the last two] football games, and we just need another good week of practice."

No. 19 Mass Attack travels to Merrimack

UMass coming off successful Hockey East weekend play

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

Merrimack has yet to win a Hockey East game, and the Warriors will come out hard on Saturday to beat one of the top teams in the league – No. 19 Massachusetts.

The Minutemen (5-1-1, 2-0-1 Hockey East) are coming off an offensively-strong weekend against Providence in which they scored 14 goals in two games, while limiting the Friars to five.

Merrimack (2-4-1, 0-3-0 Hockey East) hasn't been as successful. Last Thursday the Warriors lost to No. 2 Boston College, 4-1, and on Friday lost to the Eagles again in overtime, 4-3.

"I saw them play last Thursday night and they didn't play well at all. I was thinking that BC would just run away with it on Friday night and I come back and see they take them into overtime and BC barely escapes. So they're desperate," said UMass coach Don Cahoon.

Cahoon expects Merrimack to be well coached and be a hard skating team, but they haven't scored nearly as many goals as UMass. The Warriors have scored 11 goals, compared to the Maroon and White's 25.

"They haven't scored a lot of goals. Their power play hasn't been what they've needed to be," Cahoon said. "Those are areas that we're going to have to bear down and make sure that we keep it that way. It's going to be a tough game as it always is in that building."

The Warriors have scored two power-play goals this season off 29 opportunities this season. The Minutemen shouldn't have a problem defending Merrimack's struggling power-play unit. UMass has killed off its last 18 penalties in its last four games, good for one of the top man-down performances in the nation.

But, the most important penalty-killer is always the goaltender, as Cahoon emphasizes. The UMass coach has not yet undetermined who will start Saturday. But after sophomore Paul Dainton's successful performances over the weekend, he has a good chance of starting in net.

Dainton entered Friday's game to replace junior Dan Meyers after Providence scored its fourth goal of the game halfway through the second period. The 9-4 UMass win was the first time Dainton, who had been injured, saw game experience this season.

"I thought he did a real good job coming in cold on Friday and it wasn't as much about Danny as much as it was about changing it up a little bit. And stopping the game the way it was being played, maybe get us to settle down a little bit and I thought Paul helped us settle down," Cahoon said.

Dainton competed hard and followed the puck well, contributing to his high number of saves over the weekend, he made 17 saves on Friday and 24 on Saturday in UMass' 5-1 win over Providence.

"I think game experience is critical with him because he needs to get into more of a rhythm so that he skates the position like he's capable of, but all and all it was a good performance," Cahoon said.

Meyers has allowed 10 goals this season in five games with 120 saves for a record of 2-1-1 and recorded one shutout in UMass' 6-0 win over Rensselaer on Oct. 21.

and then coming back and making plays on the other end."

The Minutemen avoided embarrassment primarily due to the efforts of team captain Chris Lowe who took over with two minutes left in the game by driving to the basket and making lay-ups with the game on the line.

Holding on to a 90-87 lead with 10 seconds to go, Seager missed a potentially game tying three-pointer, Gurley grabbed the rebound and hit a free throw to seal the game.

What new system?

One of the most talked about attributes of Kellogg was that he was going to bring a new offensive system known as the dribble-drive motion offense. In that offense, the guards are expected drive past whoever defends them, while everyone else moves to the vacated area on the floor.

However, the Minutemen did not get a chance to practice with the new system as Bowling played zone defense and forced the Minutemen to abandon the tactic. Kellogg noted the team did not have a chance to get much practice against a zone defense so he went with a more conventional attack.

"We hadn't really worked on our zone offense," Lowe said. "But the season is here and teams are going to watch us on tape and probably say 'play zone' so we are really going emphasize [playing against] zones."

Fresh faces

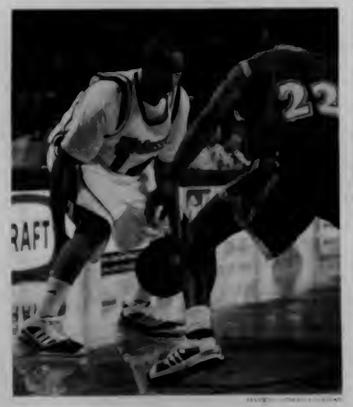
For the Minutemen to be successful this season they need major contributions from their returning stars and need the newer players to step up. Redshirt sophomore Anthony Gurley could be the most important newcomer to the Minutemen as he has been inserted in the starting line-up in his first year of eligibility for UMass.

As a transfer from Wake Forest last year, Gurley had never played in a UMass uniform before tonight, but has become the third man in the Minutemen's three guard offense, alongside Ricky Harris and Lowe. He does not specialize in either passing or shooting, but is adept at doing what the team needs at the time.

Gurley finished with 17 points and five rebounds.



David Gibbs is another newcomer that Kellogg expects to be a quality player for the team. The freshman from Connecticut is an energetic guard with good speed who will provide chances for the starting three guards to take a breather.

Gibbs scored eight points, and showed surprisingly good rebounding ability for a guard finishing with six rebounds, good for second on the team.

Tyrell Lynch is the third new player who will see time on the floor for the Minutemen. He is a big six-foot-nine forward on a team without a great deal of size so Kellogg needs him to mature quickly.

"We are going to need him to become a man, a monster at some point during the season. I'm not sure he's ready yet physically, and as he continues to get in better shape I think we are going to see more of him," Kellogg said.

Minutemen's offense continues to excel

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

Coming into this weekend's game against Merrimack, the No. 19 Massachusetts hockey team has two things on its side – its offense is seemingly unstoppable so far and the Warriors (2-4-1, 0-3-0 Hockey East) are not playing up to par.

The Minutemen (4-1-1, 2-0-1 Hockey East) are coming off one of their most impressive offensive weekends in history. In the two games against Providence (2-4-0, 0-4-0, Hockey East), UMass defeated the Friars 9-4 in Amherst Friday night and 5-1 in Providence on Saturday.

Despite the lopsided 9-4 score, the Minutemen had trouble early on in the first period. The Friars jumped out to a two-goal lead, quieting the home-town crowd.

But UMass didn't give up, the team fought its way back to tie the score and they took the lead before the first intermission. They never looked back.

UMass' first line of Alex Berry, James Marcou and captain Cory Quirk led UMass over the weekend. The trio tallied 12 points despite entering the game with nine.

"I thought there would be goals scored, but I didn't expect them to be in bunches the way they were," said UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

Marcou ranks seventh in the nation with 11 points. The sophomore has registered five goals and six assists in seven contests this season. Berry is tied for 26th in the nation with nine points – two goals and seven assists.

The Minutemen rank fourth in Hockey East play with 4.17 goals per game and are tied for 11th nationally.

With the strong offensive output the Minutemen have received from the first line, Cahoon can have the defensemen stay back near the blue line or push up for additional pressure.

But all the production isn't just coming from the UMass first line. Chris Davis, a senior on the second line, Will Ortiz, Chase Langeraap, Casey Wellman, Michael Lecomte, Justin Braun and Marc Concannon have all tallied points in this weekend's two games. Davis scored two goals on the week.

Another aspect of UMass' game that has led them to success is the efficiency of the special teams play.

Though the Minutemen are one of the least penalized team in the country, they are also one of the best penalty-killing squads. UMass has killed 92.3 percent of its penalties, good for second in the Hockey East and 10th best in college hockey.

Brett Watson and Braun are a big reason for its success. Watson, a defensive forward, pressures the puck-handler, occasionally causing turnovers and giving the Minutemen a chance to break out of the zone to kill time.

Braun, a defenseman, also pressures the puck-handler and possesses good stick-handling skills that he uses to poke the puck away from an opposing attacker.

The Minutemen have killed 18-straight penalties, rarely giving their opponent an offensive opportunity.

Ryan Fleming can be reached at rfleming@dailycollegian.com

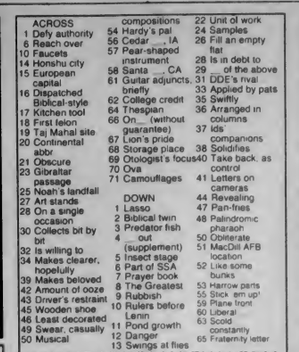
Junior defenseman Justin Braun plays an integral part of both of UMass' penalty kill and power-play units. Braun has one goal and four assists this season.



Another tree bites the dust.

Minutemen to host Maine

Saturday could have affect on post-season playoffs

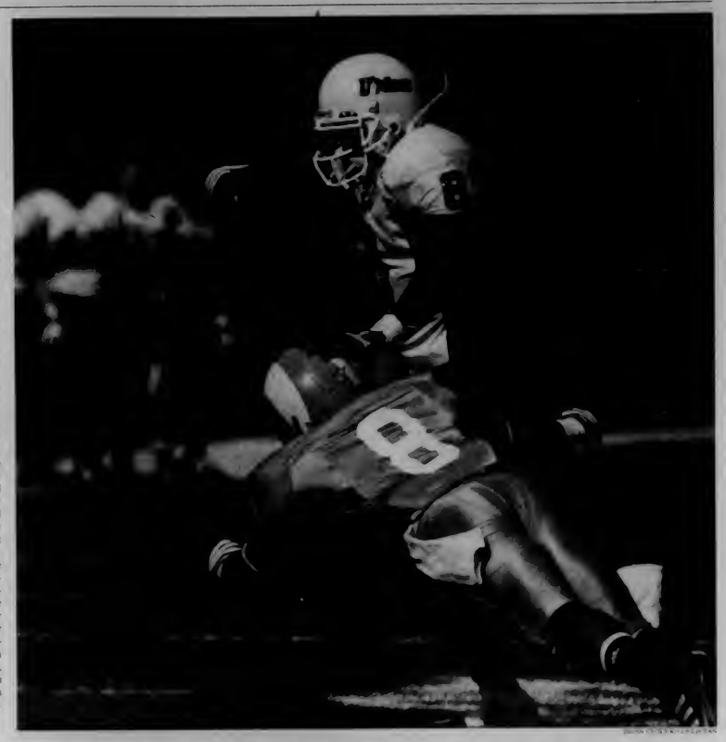
BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the Massachusetts football team, this weekend's game against Maine can have serious implications on its playoff hopes. But coach Don Brown is only presently worried about this Saturday.

"Obviously this is an important game for us. [It's] another home game, [another] conference game and we're just trying to take it one [game] at a time and play our best game of the year," Brown said.

Even though Brown isn't ready to look towards the playoffs, the reality is that both No. 13 UMass and Maine (the first team outside of the Top 25) are currently tied for second in the Colonial Athletic Association North Division and both have identical records (6-3, 3-2 CAA). The two have also been beaten by the same teams in conference play, No. 1 James Madison and No. 7 Richmond.

For the Minutemen it may take their best game of the year to get past the Black Bears. Maine is currently riding a four-game winning streak. The winning streak began after the Black Bears bounced back with a win against Delaware after their consecutive losses against Richmond (6-3, 3-2 CAA) and James Madison (8-1, 6-0 CAA), respectively.



In the victory against Delaware, Maine lost its quarterback Adam Farkes with a shoulder injury. Michael Brusko replaced him and hasn't led the strongest offensive attack, but has played efficient and mistake free football since he took over. In the four games Brusko has been under center he has completed 71 percent of his passes (35-of-49) for 508 yards, six touchdowns and zero interceptions.

When the Black Bears come to Amherst on Saturday, their running game may prove to be the most impressive aspect of their game.

"They're running the ball as well as anybody in our league right now," Brown said Tuesday before practice. "Probably not throwing it as well as everybody in our league, but they are running it. And they are all contributing to it; the wideouts are blocking, the running backs are running, and the O-line is blocking. I think they are all on the same page and in sync, and they are throwing the ball well enough to complement the run game."

In the running game, Maine doesn't have any standout tailbacks but instead numerous players that can do their job. The Black Bears offense features four players who have run for over 200 yards and more than a 4.5-yard per carry average (Fluellen – 433 yards, Turcotte – 378 yards, Brusko – 291 yards and Session – 243). Maine's running game has also produced 13 touchdowns by six different players.

Junior wide receiver Jeremy Horne has 719 receiving yards and seven touchdowns this season. The No. 13 Minutemen look to extend their playoff hopes this weekend when they host Maine (6-3, 3-2 CAA) Saturday at McGuirk Stadium.

Minutewomen to face St. Joseph's

Orlando leads top-seeded team

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team is the favored squad in this weekend's Atlantic 10 Conference Tournament. Temple University will host the tournament, which starts Friday.

The top-seeded Minutewomen (14-4, 6-0 Atlantic 10) will face No. 4 seed St. Joseph's (11-8, 3-3 A-10) Friday at 2:30 p.m. No. 2 seed Richmond will face No. 3 Temple earlier in the day, at 11 a.m.

UMass enters the tournament with its most wins since the 2000 season. Senior forward Katelyn Orlando leads the conference with 14 goals and 29 points, but is hardly the only threat to opponents.

Forwards Katie Kelly and Jill Powers are tied for second on the team with eight goals. Orlando, Kelly and Powers have multiple game-winning goals – a testament to the Minutewomen's ability to finish games. Powers is especially valuable to the team because she is a scoring threat off the bench. Powers has played in every game this season for UMass, while starting nine.

A key factor to the success of the Maroon and White this season has been its health. Eight players have played in every game this year, with 12 playing in at least 16 games. The Minutewomen's depth gives UMass coach Justine Sowry flexibility in creating lineups and utilizing substitutes.

"I think the combination of depth and healthy players only enhances our ability to play that high-tempo style that we've been able to play," Sowry said of her team's success. "All of our bench players have contributed and you're only as strong as your bench, so it's important that everyone contributes as much as they possibly can in order for us to be successful."

In last year's conference championship, the Minutewomen downed the Hawks, 2-1, to win its 10th A-10 Championship since the conference's inception. UMass' 10 conference titles equal the cumulative total of every other A-10 program.

SJU lost to the Minutewomen earlier this season, suffering a 4-0 shutout in which all three Minutewomen seniors – Erin Parker, Mary Shea and Orlando – scored a goal.

Good health key for UMass

Entire team expected to play in Atlantic 10 tournament

Injuries happen.

They're the inevitable bane of a good team. With one tweak of a knee, a team can go from a heavy favorite to hardly a contender.

It happens for every team. As the season progresses, injuries pop up and some of a team's key players miss time.

This is true, except for the No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team.

Unlike most teams, the Minutewomen (14-4, 6-0 A-10) have the privilege of going into postseason play with the same number of healthy bodies that they started the season with.

"It's remarkable how healthy we have been able to stay this year," UMass coach Justine Sowry said as she looked for the nearest piece of wood to knock on – a nearby shrub. "It can really rock teams when [players get hurt] and it's probably one of the reasons that we've been able to stay consistent this year."

Consistency has been UMass' staple this season. The Minutewomen have beaten the teams they were supposed to beat and played exceptionally well against teams they weren't. In fact, the team's losses in the middle of the season came against the then-No. 4 and then-No. 2 teams in the country.

The Minutewomen have not lost a game by more than one goal, a testament to how they've been able to stay in every game. This was especially evident when UMass came back from a 4-0 deficit against Syracuse to finish with a 5-4 loss in a near upset.

For the players, though, those losses are still losses.

"It sounds cool to say that the games we lost have only been by one goal," said team captain Mary Shea. "But when you lose those games, it's a loss all the

UMass struggles in exhibition

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Typically, the purpose of an exhibition game is to get a team prepared for the regular season by beating-up on an inferior opponent while continuing to work on things it tried in practice.

However, if the scheduled opponent doesn't know it is supposed to lose, the favored team could find itself in serious trouble of being embarrassed.

The Massachusetts men's basketball team barely escaped a serious challenge by Division II Dowling College with a 91-87 victory. Dowling missed a potential game-tying three-pointer with 10 seconds left in the game and UMass hit a free throw at the end to prevent UMass coach Derek Kellogg's debut from being a disappointment.

|---|---|
| UMass | 91 |
| Dowling | 87 |

Still Kellogg saw the unexpected challenge as a positive because it could give the team a wake-up call.

"I thought [the challenge] was great, I really did. That team came and played their hearts out. They actually worked harder than us and as a coach that's what really makes me mad," Kellogg said.

Kellogg came in as the new coach with a new offensive scheme, but really wanted to make UMass become known as a program with one of the best defenses around. Allowing 87 points to a Division II school, including a game-high 32 points by Golden Lion guard David Seagers, was a serious concern to everyone involved with the Minutemen.

"It's coach Kellogg's first game, it's our first game as a team; you know we're still learning," forward Tony Gaffney said. "It's not a sprint, it's a marathon and we hopefully have 37 more games this season. With that said, you have to give them a lot of credit and we have to step up our defense a little bit. Giving up [87] points and 32 to one individual is not acceptable."

Gaffney finished with 10 points, six rebounds and five steals.

Starting point guard Chris Lowe, who led the Minutemen with 21 points and eight assists, was not pleased at all with the result.

"There's nothing to be happy about. What's to be happy about?" Lowe said. "We let a team come in here and put up 87 points. We have to get back to the gym and buy into [Kellogg's] system."

In the first half of the game, it was immediately apparent that Dowling did not travel to Amherst to be pushed around. They were about even on the scoreboard with UMass for the first 10 minutes of the half.

UMass held a 28-25 lead with nine minutes left, and it seemed like the Minutemen where going to put the game away when they opened up a 40-27 lead with five minutes remaining. But the Golden Lions refused to go away, cutting the lead to 52-48 at the half.

The Minutemen came out of halftime with renewed energy and quickly pulled their way to a 17 point lead at the 16-minute mark. But UMass went cold again and the Golden Lions cut the lead to 76-75 with seven minutes to play.

"When you get up by 13, 15 points at a couple different occasions that's when you're supposed to put teams away, and go up by 20-25," Kellogg said. "And the only way to do that is by clamping down on the defensive end of the floor

Experts predict snowy winter

BY CAMERON FORD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It may be November, but forecasters are already making predictions for a long, harsh New England winter.

Meteorologist Joe Bastardi recently released an annual outlook report predicting one of the coldest, snowiest winters to hit the East Coast in years. The report envisions a frigid December, a mild thaw in early January and more cold snaps in late January continuing through March.

Bastardi is the chief forecaster at Accuweather, a private weather reporting firm based in State College, Pa. He's gained a great amount of notoriety in the meteorology community for providing accurate long-term forecasts, mostly regarding hurricanes and winter weather.

"The winter as a whole in the population-dense eastern third of the nation will be a one-two punch of higher heating prices and lower temperatures," said Bastardi. "Given this economic environment, the winter could push some homeowners to the brink."

"I don't predict prices," he added. "Oil could go to $50 [a barrel] for all I know. What I will say is there will be more demand, in the areas east of the Mississippi, plus Oklahoma, Arkansas, Texas and Louisiana."

Some feel this coming winter may pack more of a punch since New England hasn't experienced a harsh winter since 2003-04.

During that period, the first measurable snowfall occurred in the very first week of December, dumping over two feet of snow in some places in the span of just one night. That winter's average temperature also was found to have been nearly two degrees Fahrenheit below normal.

Bastardi bases his long-term winter forecasts on historical patterns, as well as shifts in ocean temperature.

Active hurricane seasons like that of 2008 have a tendency to be followed by a severe winter. Prior to the snowy 2003 winter, 17 hurricanes developed.

In addition, the waters of the Southern Pacific and Gulf of Mexico are considerably cooler than usual this year, which may increase the amount of snowfall.

High pressure systems in the eastern United States cause cold air from Canada to be drawn in over New England and other nearby states, influencing winter weather.

The Old Farmer's Almanac has also recently reported the likelihood of a severe winter in New England this season, though these predictions are often much more specific and less scientifically based than predictions from Accuweather. The Almanac predicts a thunderstorm at Thanksgiving and snow showers on Christmas Day.

The National Weather Service, on the other hand, calls for more conservative predictions and has issued a report detailing expectations for a normal, average winter. Their report also stated that there's insufficient evidence for them to believe this coming winter will be colder or snowier than average.

Meteorologist Ed Carroll, who works for Springfield-based ABC 40 news, says that long-range forecasts should not be trusted at all.

"I really don't buy into these long-range forecasts," he said. "I always say if I can mess up a forecast two days out, I don't see how I can tell what's going to happen two months out."

Author discusses debt crisis

BY SHRUTI SEHGAL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Amherst residents and University of Massachusetts members piled into the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall last night to hear the latest musings of author Margaret Atwood.

Guest speaker of the English department's annual Troy Lecture, Atwood spoke to listeners about the recent debt crisis in a literary talk titled "A Precision of Language: An Evening."

Giving a brief description of the Troy Lecture, Professor and head of the English department Joseph Bartolomeo opened the event. He was followed by Professor Deborah Carlin, who discussed Atwood's literary career, and then invited the writer onto the stage.

"I sometimes think I'm a little bit old to be doing this," said Atwood as she stepped in front of the podium. "We have bloggers now instead of stalkers. I remember one blogger writing on her Web site that with my red shawl and white hair, I looked like a Q-tip on fire. Some people may have been offended, but I recognize an artist when I hear it."

Drawing in peals of laughter from the audience, Atwood began her lecture through quirky anecdotes and personal commentary.

A few moments later, she settled to discuss her topic for the night.

"I could've talked about how I became a writer. That would've been funny," she began. "But I chose to talk about debt."

"Our many systems of debt and credit could not exist without our innate sense of fairness and unfairness," said Atwood.

She launched into a summary of the many forms of human debt, like honor and revenge.

She used these concepts to then fixate her listeners onto Ebenezer Scrooge, a fictitious character from the famous novel "A Christmas Carol" by Charles Dickens.

"He [Scrooge] contains two kinds of character, two ideas of our own economic nature," she said.

Borrowing major players from Dickens' text, Atwood developed her own take on debt.

She began her personal meditation by dividing the character of Scrooge into three parts. "Scrooge Original" (Dickens' original Scrooge), "Scrooge Light" (Dickens' reformed Scrooge) and "Scrooge Nouveau," Atwood's own modern version of Scrooge.

According to Atwood, the "Scrooge Nouveau" differs from the original Scrooge because he's still vastly wealthy. The newer version also chooses not to hoard his wealth like his original self. Instead, he uses his money for personal reasons because "he owes it to himself," she said.

Atwood continued her satirical version of "A Christmas Carol" with characters like Bob Cratchett in the form of Scrooge Nouveau's CEO, and the three spirits of past, present and future – with a twist.

The ghost of Christmas Past became the ghost of Earth Day Past, the ghost of Christmas Present became the ghost of Earth Day Present, and finally, the ghost of Christmas Future became the ghost of Earth Day Future.

Using these characters to allude to past crises and events like the economic tensions in Ancient Athens, and the global epidemic of the Black Plague, Atwood explained to the audience that a clear parallel exists between the current monetary debt crisis and the debt humans owe to the planet.

She discussed the varied ways in which the planet is being polluted and wiped of its resources in the present, and the potential outcomes through the ghost of Earth Day Future, which are "infinite in number."

Atwood ended her piece with Scrooge Nouveau's realization that he essentially owns nothing, as the planet can't be bought or sold through material wealth.

"Everything I own, including my body, is borrowed. How do I pay it back? Where do I start?" said Atwood's rendition of Scrooge.

"Maybe we need to calculate the real costs of how we've been living," said Atwood in the final lines of her speech.

In the question and answer session that followed, Atwood took questions mainly relating to the environment and the "debt" we owe to the planet.

The final question of the evening was "Who was the Tiny Tim in the script?"

Without a moment's hesitation, Atwood smiled, and said, "It wouldn't be a person. It would be a planet."

"We were killing mostly civilians," said 33-year-old Iraq veteran Camilo Mejia during a speech at the Student Union Ballroom Wednesday night. "We killed people caught in the crossfire, in the wrong place at the wrong time."

After a six-month tour in Iraq, Mejia was the first U.S. soldier to refuse deployment in October 2003, filing for conscientious objector status and going absent without leave (AWOL). He was convicted on a charge of desertion and served nine months in military prison.

Since his release in February 2005, Mejia has spoken out against the occupations of Iraq and Afghanistan.

In his first visit to the University of Massachusetts on Wednesday night, Mejia described a story which he said became one of a collection of reasons in developing his anti-war sentiments during his time in Iraq as a staff-sergeant in the U.S. Army.

Mejia's lieutenant wanted to punish a young Iraqi boy, who Mejia said looked to be around eight years old, for throwing a rock at the lieutenant.

Mejia said he remembers the lieutenant saying, "I'm going to get this mother [expletive] and teach him a lesson."

The lieutenant wanted to put the boy in custody at the U.S. base several miles away. A crowd of Iraqis formed as the lieutenant grabbed the boy, Mejia said. The Iraqis and several sergeants pleaded with the lieutenant to change his mind.

An Iraqi man, who Mejia said looked to be in his 50s or 60s, could not convince the lieutenant with what little English he knew, so he slapped the boy several times to show there was no need for any other punishment.

However, the lieutenant was not convinced. As a result, the Iraqi man, while weeping, proceeded to publicly beat the child until the lieutenant agreed not to take the boy away, Mejia said.

At the time, Mejia said he tried to tell himself what the lieutenant had done was permissible because the boy learned not to antagonize U.S. soldiers, but later realized there was no justification for what had happened.

"[Instances like this] destroy the moral fabric of a society," said Mejia. "These are the things we, as soldiers, don't think about until we come home. You don't have the luxury to think morally about things. It's too intense. It's too dangerous."

When he returned home for a two-week leave, Mejia said he had time to discover how he truly felt about the war.

"It became clear to me that I had to make a decision to follow my idea of right versus wrong or to follow my military commands," he said.

Mejia said his decision not to return to service after his leave was not easy and he was afraid.

"I didn't have the courage to speak out," he said. "I simply didn't get back on the plane."

Eventually, Mejia said he felt he could not remain silent. He said the hypocrisy of the "support the troops" motto was one reason he began talking to the media.

Soldiers were not being adequately supplied on the battlefield or treated properly when their service ended, Mejia said.

Meanwhile, "these billions of dollars a week were basically lining the pockets of corporate CEOs," he said.

In March 2004, Mejia surrendered to being AWOL at the Army Air Force base in Lexington. He was court-martialed and convicted of desertion by a military jury who sentenced him to a year in military prison and gave him a bad conduct discharge.

A desertion conviction during wartime can result in a death sentence, under Article 85 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

While in prison, Mejia said he enjoyed the time he had to reflect on his service in Iraq and plan for what he wanted to do after his release.

"Being a deserter or conscientious objector in military prison is like being a bank robber in civilian jail," said Mejia. "The other inmates gave me mad respect."

After the talks, Mejia signed copies of his memoir, "Road from ar Ramadi: the Private Rebellion of Staff Sergeant Camilo," which he has been promoting on his national "Resisting Empire" tour.

"I would find myself riding in the back of a truck through the dusty streets of war-torn ar Ramadi," said a passage from the memoir. "I was supposed to be giving all my attention to watching out for the insurgents. But then I would catch sight of the children running to the front gates of their homes to watch our vehicles rolling by and they would remind me of the children I had seen back in Nicaragua." Mejia lived in Nicaragua before moving to the U.S. with his family in 1991.

Zarima Cisneros, a junior sociology major at UMass, bought a copy of Mejia's book.

"I thought it was very inspirational," she said. "It's really significant for people to be hearing about what it means to speak independently and conscientiously. It takes a lot of power from within."

Greenfield resident Beth Adams agreed.

"I admire his courage and conviction to walk this risky life of nonviolence," Adams said.

Mejia serves as the board chair of Iraq Veterans Against the War (IVAW), who aim to give a voice to active duty service people and veterans who are against the War on Terror, but feel pressured to stay silent.

The event featured introductions by IVAW member Mike VanValkenburg and UMass history professor and author Christian Appy.

More information on Mejia's tour, sponsored nationally by Haymarket Books, Center for Economic Research and Social Change, Iraq Veterans Against the War, Alternet.org and Nation Books is available at Resistingempire.org.

Teach For America recruits grads-to-be for employment

BY VINCENT CAPONE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A Teach For America (TFA) information spotlight was held Wednesday night in the Cape Cod Lounge for prospective applicants.

TFA is a program that recruits at universities across America, placing recent graduates in two-year teaching jobs in the country's lowest-income schools.

Wednesday's event featured the University of Massachusetts' TFA Recruitment Director Tim Visser, an alum of Amherst College and TFA. Visser taught in the neighborhood of Little Haiti in Miami, Fla.

The information session had a sizable turnout of prospective applicants. Many who attended asked Visser a broad range of questions on topics from the work environment to the benefits TFA can have on one's future.

The night began with a short video following a typical day in the life of a TFA corps member. The video followed three teachers and their daily routines, spotlighting their effort and dedication through their often long hours at school and how they're noticing the impact they have on the lives of their students.

Visser spoke about his own experiences working in Miami. He highlighted some of his personal triumphs with inspiring stories about his former students, the effect he had on their lives and the life-changing experiences he'll never forget.

"I believe educational inequality is our nation's greatest injustice," Visser said. "This problem is solvable and we can help change it. In New Orleans, for example, one-third of all the students in the recovery area are taught by a TFA corps member."

Throughout the information session, the focus remained on leadership.

"Leadership, past achievements and getting things done, these are all qualities that Teach For America looks for in a candidate," Visser said. "People with respect for the communities we go into, and those who recognize what needs to be done."

TFA looks for leaders looking to make a difference, and the program brings with it a broad range of benefits. TFA hones a candidate's leadership skills in a fast-paced work environment right out of college.

TFA currently has over 6,200 corps members teaching in 29 regions of the country, reaching out to over 400,000 kids. Their mission is to enlist promising future leaders and eliminate the educational inequality in America. Members are fully-paid teachers who are placed in low-income communities across the nation.

TFA has over 14,000 alumni, in all fields and disciplines, working to make a change.

One of their most notable alums is Michelle Rhee, Chancellor of the Washington D.C. public school system. Rhee is making drastic changes to the Washington D.C. teaching system. In her first year in office, test score levels rose drastically.

Two of President-elect Barack Obama's top education advisors are also notable TFA alumni.

TFA places their corps members in classrooms, teaching various subjects in the K-12 level. Visser focused on the crucial subjects needed in the classroom.

"Currently, there's a specific need for math and science teachers in these communities," he said.

Applying for TFA is a three-part process including an online application, a phone interview, and a full-day, in-person interview. Applicants are also reminded to apply during their senior year of undergraduate studies. Applicants can be of any academic concentration and do not need prior teaching experience.

The 2009 TFA application deadline is today, Nov. 7. Those who miss this deadline can apply for the third deadline on Jan. 7.

Applications can be found online at TeachforAmerica.org.

The event was co-sponsored by Phi Sigma Pi National Honors Fraternity, CCEBMS office and the Malcolm X Cultural Center.

Merry-go-round reminder of years past

Nostalgia for old Holyoke motivates committee to act

By Peter Rizzo
Collegian Staff

HOLYOKE — It's a sunny Saturday afternoon in Holyoke and in the middle of Heritage State Park — a merry-go-round spins; its lights twinkling despite the daylight. Parents sit birthday caps donned, giving never-ending dispensers of crinkled dollar bills to children entranced by the bright lights and painted horses that swirl underneath the cover of the shaded pavilion.

From a distance the merry-go-round looks new, though upon closer inspection its 48 hand-painted horses betray its outward exuberance revealing signs of age, their shiny plastic manes scarred with chipping paint. After a stroll through the surrounding downtown Holyoke, it has the air of an oasis in a place where churches display cracked stain glass windows and the term small business refers not to the size of the business but its 99 cents inventory.

In a way, the Holyoke merry-go-round is the heirloom of the city. The last remnant of the early 1900s Holyoke when it was an architectural wonder, home to manufacturing jobs, and a bustling economy — all of which made the city a beehive for investors. Trolley lines were built, and at the end of the line tucked into the sprawling canvas of rural landscape, Mountain Park was built in hopes of attracting business.

Jay Ducharme a 13-year employee who began frequenting the park as a child now acts as its de-facto historian, and is a published author whose book "Mountain Park" is already in its second printing. Today he spends his time teaching at Holyoke Community College, maintaining a Web site devoted to the park and acting as an honorary member of the Merry-Go-Round's board of directors.

Ducharme remembers the scene quite clearly, the flocks of families filling the midway, kids racing to one of the garishly adorned funhouses or motorized rides. Adults would lounge and picnic, perhaps spending 10 cents on one of the festivals many games which challenged guests and offered such wondrous prizes as a bag of toilet paper.

There was skiing in the winter, fine dining and outdoor concerts in the summer. Arcades that chimed and buzzed lit up by the endless flurry of coins, and funhouses roared with a flurry of patrons who maneuvered tightly wound mirror mazes. The Mountain Flyer, the park's wooden rollercoaster pounced over treetops, its white wooden frame sending thrill-seekers down a 60-foot drop screaming through the dense forest of evergreens.

That is, until the day the park was forced to close.

In 1987 Easter Sunday saw the largest opening day crowd in its history, but the park was not able to fend off the oncoming economic recession coupled with its rising legal fees.

After it became clear that preserving Holyoke's Mountain Park was too large and impractical a project, the Board of Directors turned its focus to preserving the park's merry-go-round. After raising $32,000, the board reopened the ride in 1993.

"The park had not past its prime, it was not a relic of the past, it was still relevant, people still liked it and were still coming to the park. But there were many other factors," Ducharme explained. "In Holyoke, you went to the beach, a ballgame or you went to Mountain Park. But when Massachusetts rescinded its Blue laws when it was rainy people started to go to the mall. That hurt them a lot."

The next year, the park was closed as its longtime owner John Collins decided it was time to leave the business. While Collins sought a buyer advertising the park in magazines and newspapers across the country, workers like Ducharme worried about its fate and their livelihood.

"It had been there a 100 years and I figured that it was going to be there for another 100. I could've brought a camera at any time but I'd say I'll do it next year," Ducharme said. "So when it closed I panicked and I said now what do I do?"

After months of searching and over a year out of operation, no buyer had emerged leaving Collins with no other choice but to begin auctioning off rides to the highest bidder. Its treasured ride, the merry-go-round was almost another causality of the park's closing.

With the park's future in question, Ducharme was left watchman for the park. His job was to walk the now deserted lanes of the midway only to chase off miscreants up from the city that delighted in taking crowbars to the remainder of the once busy park. It was while working in this environment that Ducharme first heard of a plan to save it.

"One day I was walking and I saw this elderly man on the midway I asked him if I could help him and he said, 'My name is John Hickey I run the water power for the city of Holyoke and I'm gonna save the merry-go-round for the city of Holyoke,'" Ducharme recalled.

Initially Ducharme admits to being a skeptic.

"I underestimated him. But he was able to convince the owner, Jay Collins to give him a year to raise $875,000 for the ride," Ducharme said. "Jay Collins had had offers for up to $2 million from Japan. But he wanted to see it stay and he let him try."

Once it was established that the park had closed, saving the park became too large a project. With this sights turned to preserving the merry-go-round and a multi-faceted campaign was soon launched by prominent people in the region to save it.

It was in this time of need that John Hickey teemed up with Angela Wright, a well respected community organizer and current member of the merry-go-round's Board of Directors, and began raising money for the merry-go-round's preservation.

"John Hickey would go into bars and come out with trash bags full of money, during a recession. It became a huge outpouring," Ducharme said. "School kids in Holyoke through bottle drives and pennies alone raised $32,000."

Hickey raised the money in time and was able to buy back the merry-go-round reopening it in 1993 in it's new home, Heritage State Park. Its new location is adjacent to both the Volleyball Hall of Fame and the Children's Museum. In its first year it gave over 70,000 rides and drew many more visitors to downtown Holyoke.

The relocation of the Holyoke merry-go-round was part of the greater revitalization of Holyoke as a cultural center. Together with the Children's Museum, the Hall of Fame, and 16 other partners, the merry-go-round is part of Passport Holyoke — a program focused according to its Web site on helping people "discover the city of Holyoke."

The initiative aims to help remake Holyoke from an old manufacturing town into an upscale Northampton like city, with restaurants and sightseeing spots dedicated to promoting an arts based economy. Kathleen Anderson, the Economic Development Director for the city of Holyoke, expressed her pleasure with the program in an interview.

"Passport Holyoke has allowed these attractions to have themed events that happen in all their venues. So when someone goes to Holyoke they can find things to do all in one location. It brings hundreds of people down here and by having them all together it brings larger crowds," Anderson said.

This collection of attractions is soon welcoming an addition in the form of the city's newest project, the canal walk. The walkway will be built along the two and a half mile canal system of the city, with old mill buildings being cleared in order for stores and restaurants to be erected. developments that are in the opinion of Ducharme accredited in part to the merry-go-round.

"What you're seeing is a shift back to viewing and capitalizing on the specialness of the city," Ducharme said. "Building a walkway on the canal, bringing restaurants along the storefront it's all part of the larger revitalization program, and the merry-go round kick started it."

And if all goes according to plan, Mountain Park may have a hand in revitalizing Holyoke as well.

Today the park sits empty, most of its rides dismantled or shipped off to far off places like Japan, Saudi Arabia and Nova Scotia, its remaining signs overgrown by the forest which is slowly reclaiming the vacant land — a long silence that has remained mostly uninterrupted.

That is until 2007 when a new sign appeared. The small red and white sign was scantly larger than a street sign but nonetheless ignited hopes bearing the slogan.

"See You in '07 – Mountain Park," Ducharme said.

According to Ducharme, the park's new owner, Northampton real estate developer and owner of the Iron Horse Entertainment Group, Eric Suher purchased the land and put up the mysterious sign.

The origin of the sign remains a mystery, one that still befuddles Ducharme. Once more Suher has been remarkably silent about the issue giving almost no information beyond the sign which was soon taken down and has yet to be replaced.

Suher was unavailable for comment. However Anderson maintains that he is working with the city and has big plans.

"His idea is to have an outdoor music venue similar to Tanglewood. A venue that can have 30 large name music concerts a year and draw people from all over," Anderson stated. "We've been developing a tourism brochure so that when there are events, when people have downtime they can stay and spend their money in Holyoke's restaurants and shops."

As for the park's future, Ducharme remains skeptical of Anderson's statements calling it merely the "popular wisdom."

"There are some unanswered questions, if it's going to be a music venue, then why purchase a copy of the old park logo with a roller coaster on it? Why keep the blue picnic pavilion? Obviously, only Suher knows the answers," Ducharme said.

Still he maintains that the park was never meant to be an economic center.

"Jay Collins didn't get rich off of Mountain Park, that wasn't the idea. It was a public service. That was instilled in all the people that worked in Mountain Park, that you're there to make people have a good time," said Ducharme. "He was making money to survive and what a better way to do that than opening an amusement park."

Regardless of the mystery that surrounds the project, the proposed venue would likely be enough to attract the college crowd that has remained so elusive for the city's tourism. As of today, the idea remains largely theoretical, with no construction plans drafted for the site. However with the involvement of the City of Holyoke it just might be Holyoke's best chance at surviving, making money and in the true spirit of Ducharme and Mountain Park, helping people have a good time while doing it.

Peter Rizzo can be reached at prizzo@student.umass.edu

The revitalization of Mountain Park's is part of a broader effort to revitalize the city of Holyoke. In recent years, the city has suffered as a result of a plummeting economy and decreasing tourism to the city, appealing to students of any of the surrounding colleges is part of the plan to bring people to the city.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Bigotry preventing change

Shruti Sehgal

While the world slowly stirs from the interminable nightmare of George W. Bush's presidency, successor Barack Obama finally collapses onto his new bed in the White House to take a well-deserved nap. After a long-winded campaign with ups and downs, lefts and rights, and other agonizing detractions, the man finally pulled it off. The proud new leader of the United States, Barack Obama, has entered political history through the democratic vote.

His accomplishment says much about this country. Once weighed down by the shackles of slavery, the United States now welcomes its first black president with open arms. Albeit a gradual process, this change in attitude is an eye-opener for the modern world. It shows that immigrant families are recognized in this country. It proves that minorities can have a slice of American cake and eat it, too.

With that said, however, a new question comes to mind: Does Obama's presidency confirm that racism has become a thing of the American past – a mere post-Halloween skeleton in the nation's closet?

Not quite.

Ever since Obama jumped onto the political bandwagon, greater bursts of bigotry have found their way across the landscape.

Consider the last four months of his campaign. On Aug. 28 of this year, Nathan Johnson and his two buddies packed several doses of methamphetamines, two rifles, ammunition, walkie-talkies, wigs, fake IDs and a bulletproof vest into a truck and set out to shoot Obama during the Democratic National Convention in Colorado.

Arrested in the nick of time by federal agents, Mr. Johnson captured their motivations most eloquently in a jail cell interview.

"He [Obama] don't belong in political office – or blacks don't belong in political office. He gotta be shot." He then explained that his friends intended to assassinate Obama "from a high vantage point using a rifle sighted at 750 yards."

Yet one racially motivated murder scheme wasn't quite good enough. Johnson and company had to be followed by another. Last week, neo-Nazis Daniel Cowart and Paul Schleselman were detained in Tennessee by local police officers. The arrested men had planned to rob a gun store, murder 88 black schoolchildren, decapitate 14 more and shoot Obama in a moving car – all the while dressed dashingly in white tuxedos and top hats. The far-fetched strategy never quite materialized.

Schleselman's sister Kayla later commented that "He [Schleselman] just believes that he's the master race. He would say things like 'white power' and 'Sieg Heil' and 'Heil Hitler.'"

Of course, debates today are sparked by how serious these "racist rantings" really were. Given that Obama is under tight Secret Service protection and the efforts were easily thwarted, perhaps the actual risks were minimal.

Ever since Obama jumped onto the political bandwagon, greater bursts of bigotry have found their way across the landscape.

But this is not always the case, and certainly not the greatest observation to make.

Imperial Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan Ryan Larson helped to explain why. Appearing on national news in January, he warned that "if that man [Obama] is elected president, he will be shot sure as hell. The hate is so deep down South."

Well, Obama has become president. And while it's easier to assume that Larson's fantastical prophecy is an empty threat, admitting there's room for doubt is far more useful.

On this grave subject, recent underground activities convey more than I possibly can. White supremacist organizations have quadrupled in the last two years. Their Web sites, blogs and other propaganda have continued to spread faster than fire.

Google.com has even reported that the phrase "Assassinate Obama" has become one of the most popular searches on its Web site. The latest plotted scheme is the perfect testament to this sort of networking. Cowart and Schleselmann met on a Web site two months ago.

As these dark motivations percolate in the backdrop of Obama's hard-earned achievement, it becomes increasingly difficult to believe that racism has emerged to merely peer from shadows.

If anything, the wheels of prejudice have come forth to slowly set a very sinister vehicle in motion. The earlier question on the bygones of racism now find its answer: changing times don't mean changed times.

As our first black president steps into office, we thus find ourselves split between two polar ends. Do we exhale out of happy release, or do we deeply inhale and hold our breaths as a host of racial concerns begin to unfold?

Until I find something to calm my nerves, perhaps both.

Feeding the hungry with a meal plan

Rachel Dougherty

Breaking into the Franklin Dining Commons is as easy as the pre-packaged, artificially preserved and artificially fruit-flavored pie served inside. All you have to do is sneak up through the exit staircase and wait for someone to open the door. I found this out my first day on campus, when I wandered up that staircase looking for the UCard Office and found myself standing in the middle of an all-you-can-eat buffet I didn't pay for.

I turned around and scrambled back down the stairs I came from, but for some, the allure of mass-produced meat patties can prove too much.

Dozens of people, possibly hundreds, try to sneak into the campus cafeterias every day. 90 percent of them are UMass students, according to Franklin Dining Commons Manager Mark Morrissette, but the traffic in Franklin can run from high school students to vagrant adults soliciting students for guest swipes.

"There's a woman who's come in with a baby two or three times in the past two weeks," said Mr. Morrissette. "She tried to come up the exit staircase and one of the janitors made her turn around." Janitor Tom Moreau confirmed that the woman hid in the bathroom until she thought he had left, and then tried to sneak back up the staircase again.

"I've seen people climbing up that staircase on their hands and knees, trying to get in," said Mr. Moreau.

Less apparent are those who depend on empathetic students to guest swipe them into the cafeteria. Moreau recalls one older woman who came in 3 to 4 times a week for several months. She was usually swiped in by a student, but was recognized by the staff as someone not on the meal plan.

Once, when caught trying to sneak in through the exit staircase, she turned to the cashier and just said, "Hungry," at which point she was allowed into the cafeteria.

UMass Dining Services Director Ken Toong said, "If someone, [maybe a family], comes and they're hungry, you know, we don't want anyone to be hungry. We let them eat. But it's not policy."

Is it wrong to feel empathy for someone begging to be let in to one of the campus cafeterias? Absolutely not. But letting outsiders into the cafeteria, no matter their background or the intentions of the student or staff letting them in, is a problem for a number of reasons.

Is it wrong to feel empathy for someone begging to be let in to one of the campus cafeterias?

The first being that this form of solicitation is illegal according to Massachusetts General Law, Chapters 272 & 66, which states that "persons wandering abroad or begging... in public or private ways, areas to which the general public is invited, for the purpose of begging or to receive alms, and who are not licensed may be imprisoned for up to six months."

Another obvious problem with this is that the person is a stranger – both to the student and to the University. When a student guest swipes a stranger into the cafeteria, they do so without knowledge of the solicitor's background or intentions. They could be letting in someone with a criminal record or a history of mental illness.

The person could be carrying a weapon, or have other unstated reasons for wanting entrance to the cafeteria. They could be a middle-class suburbanite [hockey mom] looking to scam a few meals off of unsuspecting college students.

It's impossible to know. While the student's intentions may be good, the unchecked swiping of strangers into the cafeteria is an unnecessary risk to the safety of the student body and a burden on the already-tight cafeteria budget.

As the economy continues to slide toward a recession, the prospect of a free meal at Franklin may tempt a broader range of people to sneak or solicit their way in. Not only vagrants or mentally-compromised panhandlers, but also many lower-income families who a year ago could not have imagined stealing food from a college cafeteria may find the prospect more difficult to resist.

Instead of tolerating the undocumented admittance of strangers to the cafeteria, UMass could instead implement an official program to help destitute or lower-income families during hard economic times. As with most homeless shelters, applicants would have to prove a demonstrable economic need and undergo background checks in order to be admitted into the program.

They could then be put on a "meal plan" through which they would receive a set number of meals per week or month, relying on the meal swipes that are paid for but go unused by students. The average student uses only 85 percent of their regular paid meal swipes over the course of the semester; the remaining 15 percent could be used to cover the cost of food for those participating in the program.

Additionally, UMass composts approximately 32,600 pounds of food waste weekly between the four dining commons. That's a lot of food to just throw away when people are begging at the door. If UMass were to implement such a program, it would nullify the guilt of students and staff at turning away beggars.

Instead of swiping them into the cafeterias themselves, students who are solicited could instead recommend that they apply to the program.

Speech déjà vu

Alana Goodman

The historic candidate is young, handsome and articulate. He's an African American from Chicago who was born to a single mother. Though his family had little money when he was growing up, he won a scholarship to a prestigious prep school and eventually went on to get his J.D. from Harvard Law.

His swift rise in politics has been extraordinary, even in America. When he first declared his candidacy against an established Democratic opponent, he had very little name recognition.

His critics were also quick to point out his lack of experience and past accomplishments. However, the candidate's eloquent and idealistic speeches captivated the grassroots voters and young demographic. He spoke of hope, change and unity. His campaign, led by strategist David Axelrod, painted him as a post-partisan reformer.

No, I'm not talking about Barack Obama. The candidate I'm referring to is Massachusetts Gov. Deval Patrick – but the similarities between the two politicians are strikingly eerie.

Their backgrounds, rise to power, rhetoric and even the lead players in their campaigns are nearly identical.

They even share speeches. Last February at a campaign stop in Wisconsin, Obama thoughtfully mused, "Don't tell me words don't matter – 'We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal' – just words? 'We have nothing to fear but fear itself' – just words? Just speeches?"

Pretty inspiring, except for the fact that two years earlier Patrick had also told a crowd, "We hold these truths to be self-evident," just words? Just words? 'We have nothing to fear but fear itself.' Just words?"

These similarities are no coincidence. They're part of a formula created by the two candidates' top strategist, David Axelrod, who specializes in packaging very liberal, often radical politicians and selling them to mainstream voters.

"It's a formula Axelrod developed working on a series of black mayoral candidates' campaigns in cities such as Cleveland, Detroit, Philadelphia and Washington, D.C. ... [In] 2002, Axelrod used it to elect Obama to the U.S. Senate," wrote Jason Zengerle in The New Republic.

Axelrod is attracted to candidates who have overcome adversity because he likes to make their biographies – not their policies – the center of the campaign. He also plays up the historical aspect of the election. For example, the fact that Patrick would become the first African American governor of Massachusetts became the focal point of his gubernatorial race.

Once the election is won and the celebration dies down, Axelrod's clients tend to be ineffective politicians.

"'Making history' can be very motivational to people in terms of their voting behavior," Rob Gray, a GOP consultant, told The New Republic.

Once the election is won and the celebration dies down, Axelrod's clients tend to be ineffective politicians. The reason may be because they're chosen more for their charisma, eloquence and personal background rather than their experience and political savvy.

What Obama will do as president still remains a mystery. His record is tissue-thin and he rarely speaks about policy specifics. However, we can look at the political careers of Axelrod's former clients to find clues about how Obama may govern during his presidency.

In 1987, Axelrod ran the Chicago mayoral campaign of Harold Washington. A former criminal who had done jail time, Washington ran as a "reformist" who wanted political change. During his campaign, he was a media darling, but once elected, Washington proved himself to be a sub-par politician who spent much of his career beholden to African American interest groups.

In 1992, Axelrod was the top strategist for Dennis Archer's Detroit mayoral campaign. Archer was promoted as an anti-establishment candidate who would bring fresh change to government. After Archer won the race, his far-left policies shocked the public who eventually tried to get his election recalled.

Axelrod was also the image-maker for Philadelphia mayoral candidate John Street. Street ran as an agent of change and promised to crack down on unethical city practices. However, after he was elected, corruption ran so rampant in Philadelphia that Time magazine named Street one of the three worst mayors in America.

But those praising the recent election of Obama should take the most careful look at the government right here in Massachusetts. During Gov. Patrick's campaign, he was wildly popular among state citizens and the media who were drawn to his warm and fuzzy message of unity, and his historical quest to be the first African American governor.

But since taking office, Patrick has implemented none of the "change" and "new politics" he promised during his candidacy. Just a few weeks into the job, he caught flack for spending taxpayer money on personal items like $10,000 draperies for the statehouse, a new car and a chief of staff for his wife.

His poor political skills make it nearly impossible for him to accomplish anything significant and his policy proposals are routinely rejected by the Democratic-majority state legislature. Currently, Rasmussenreports.com lists his approval rating at a miserable 38 percent.

Will Obama follow the same path? Only time will tell. But if Axelrod's former clients are any indication, then this may turn out to be a rocky first year for the inexperienced politician.

Gay marriage: a divorce between church and state

Matthew M. Robare

Normally, politics – especially when considered along a conservative-liberal spectrum – is easy to divide. For instance, conservatives will talk about free markets and deregulation while passing bills designed to limit the free market and regulate the economy even more. Liberals will talk about taxing the rich, restricting the power of corporations, and using the power of government to help people, while passing bills that tax the middle class the most heavily, grant businesses all sorts of grand powers, and use government power to hurt people.

It's very easy to understand why the actions of liberals and conservatives don't match the rhetoric: there's only one government. Therefore, they have a monopoly on government services. If they actually did do what their rhetoric said, one of two things would happen.

Either we would discover once and for all that government is best limited to defense, justice, and policing, or we would find out that government should redistribute wealth, prosecute every interracial crime as a hate crime and provide the poor with everything for free. In such a scenario, politicians would become unnecessary and the whole apparatus could be run by bureaucrats – or even robots.

Now that I've set up the conservative-liberal paradigm, I can talk about things that break it. The issue that breaks the paradigm is everybody's favorite controversy: same-sex marriage. According to the usual paradigm, conservatives should always oppose gay marriage, while liberals should always support it. Well, this may come as a shock to most people, but both John McCain and Barack Obama oppose the legalization of gay marriage.

Should governments establish gay marriage or oppose it? That is the question.

According to the New York Times, Obama opposes gay marriage because he is a Christian, and McCain opposes it because he grew up in an idyllic time called the "pre-1960s period" of American history.

It was a time when views on homosexuality were largely formed by King George V's saying "I thought men like that shot themselves." Clearly, this breaks the paradigm – a leftist Democrat opposing same-sex marriage and on religious grounds, while the rightist Republican opposes it on cultural ones.

Should governments establish gay marriage or oppose it? That is the question.

A key part of that question – indeed the whole point of the controversy – is marriage, so we need to define marriage. Based on Western custom, a secular definition of marriage might be the voluntary union of two individuals' property or portions of their property to the degree that they may be considered (legally) one entity.

For example, when two people live together, but are unmarried, their individual property would still be considered separate legally. The two individuals themselves would be treated legally as two separate individuals with regard to that of disputes involving property.

Religions also have their own definitions. Now, religiously, I cast my lot mostly with the Catholic Church, so I'm going to use the Catholic definition of marriage. Also, Protestant – and therefore most American – legal definitions of marriage ultimately descend from Catholic definitions.

According to the Catechism, marriage is a Sacrament – a sign of the presence of God in the human world – and "is by its nature ordered toward the good of the spouses and the procreation and education of offspring." It's because of this belief that marriage and sex are combined in the purpose of having children that the Catholic Church rejects gay marriage. Because same-sex marriage is rejected, all homosexual sex acts become adultery like any heterosexual sex outside of marriage.

In neither the secular nor Catholic definitions of marriage is there any room for government at all. The secular marriage is an economic contract. The reason is not important, and neither is the sex of the individuals involved. The religious definition is purely concerned about the relationship of humans to God.

For these two reasons, I oppose attempts by both state governments and the federal government to either define marriage as being between one man and one woman or to open it up to every combination and number of men, women and all other genders.

This is the libertarian view of marriage and I think it's the only sane one. Where religious believers are getting married, the matrimony should depend upon the beliefs and practices of their religion, and where people want a secular marriage it should be treated as the voluntary contract it is – without government regulation or subsidy.

I have nothing against gay marriage. Let those from the gay and lesbian communities form their contracts to pool property, but don't tell churches they have to recognize those contracts or allow the use of their facilities or liturgies. There's often a cry for LGBT people to be treated with dignity, that's fine, but it doesn't mean that 2,000 years of tradition has to be spat on to accomplish it.

Shakespeare troupe to play UMass

The American Shakespeare Center will perform Tom Stoppard's (above) play, "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead," at the Rand Theater on Sunday.

By Michelle Frisette
Collegian Staff

Most of us are familiar with Shakespeare's notorious tragedy, "Hamlet." This Sunday, the American Shakespeare Center (ASC) will give the University of Massachusetts the Danish prince's tragic fate from the comedic perspective of Hamlet's childhood friends, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, in Tom Stoppard's "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead."

The comedy employs slapstick humor, wit and various plays on words, dressing the tragedy of "Hamlet" in a humorous guise.

Tom Stoppard, author of "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead," was co-writer of the 1999 film "Shakespeare in Love," which won the Oscar for Best Picture in 1999.

"Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead" found similar success, winning the 1968 Tony Award for Best Play. It was made into a major motion picture in 1991, which Stoppard directed.

The ASC is based in Staunton, Va., and performs in a replica of the London Blackfriars Playhouse, which was demolished in 1655. The troupe also tours the country, bringing Shakespeare's plays to modern audiences.

"Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead" will be presented by the Massachusetts Center for Renaissance Studies (MCRS). The performance is part of their "Year of Shakespeare," celebrating the MCRS' 10th anniversary.

Like the MCRS, the ASC's acting troupe keeps its performances as close to those in Shakespearean times as possible. Men and women are encouraged to take on parts of the opposite sex and speak directly to the audience, and sets are kept pure and simple.

Because of this more traditional attitude, Sunday's performance will leave the lights on its audience.

"Shakespeare's actors could see their audience; ASC actors can see you. When an actor can see an audience, they can engage with an audience," says the ASC.

Similarly, the show will likely stick to a two-hour time limit because it is believed that Shakespearean actors kept their shows this length.

"The ASC tries to fulfill this ... through brisk pacing and a continuous flow of dramatic action, often without an intermission," says the ASC.

Attendees of Sunday's performance will be able to imagine themselves as true Elizabethan playgoers.

The ASC on tour has dubbed itself the "Stark Raving Sane" troupe this fall, taking a line from "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead" for their title.

On its current tour, the group is performing "The Comedy of Errors" and "Hamlet" in addition to "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead."

Director Jim Warren has kept the casting the same in "Hamlet" and "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead."

'Zach & Miri' make a so-so

By Justin Grosso
Collegian Staff

Adam Sandler and Rob Schneider have made careers out of creating funny movies with brainless plots, in which they usually end up with a beautiful girl who is way out of their leagues. They win her over emotionally and physically.

Seth Rogen and Jason Segel are catching on. Not only do they hook up with a beautiful girl who would normally scoff at one of them even looking at her, but they also make money off of it.

Rogen, in his brilliance, not only did that in real life, but he made a movie about it in "Zack and Miri Make a Porno."

Seth Rogen ("Knocked Up") teams up with Pittsfield, Mass., native Elizabeth Banks ("Invincible") in last weekend's second-highest grossing film.

Also making appearances in the film are Justin Long ("Accepted"), Brandon Routh ("Superman Returns") and Jason Mewes ("Clerks"). Kevin Smith ("Dogma"), better known as Silent Bob, directed and wrote the film.

Both Rogen and Banks are climbing their way up the Hollywood totem pole of late by appearing in a variety of films. "Zack and Miri" is Rogen's sixth role this year, the others including "Kung Fu Panda," "Step Brothers" and "Pineapple Express."

Banks recently played Laura Bush in the controversial "W." and will have parts in the upcoming films "Role Models" and "The Uninvited."

Her beauty and lovable acting, coupled with Rogen's funny, average-Joe humor, yields effective throughout the film.

The story is on the same general plot track as all other mediocre romantic comedies, and is directed towards men's preoccupation with sex and its effects on relationships.

Zack and Miri, old high school friends, live together in a dumpy apartment. They split the rent, but they find themselves often behind on bills because of their low-paying jobs.

When their utilities shut down and they're faced with the reality of losing the apartment, Zack suggests they film a porno in order to make enough

American Ale to yield tart results

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

Shock Top Belgian White has taken Amherst by storm this semester. From the Graduate Lounge in the Campus Center, to McMurphy's, to the Hangar, it's hard to ignore this brew.

But enough is enough. Shock Top is almost as bad as Keystone Light. At first glance, it looks like a cheap microbrew. On the contrary my friends, Shock Top is actually brewed by Michelob Brewing Company, which is owned by Anheuser-Busch, Inc.

Budweiser has been the maverick of beers for a long time. It's time for a change of American beers on Main Street (or anywhere else in town, for that matter).

My suggestion is the latest drink from Anheuser-Busch: Budweiser American Ale. Can we trust a young, inexperienced beer such as American Ale to be our new cheap drink of choice? Yes we can.

Irony ale?

In the first half of this past summer, Swedish-based beer company InBev made an attempt to purchase Anheuser-Busch, Inc. Originally, Anheuser-Busch, Inc. turned down the offer, but InBev came back with a bigger and better deal worth an estimated $52 billion. Anheuser-Busch accepted this deal.

Europeans have long thought of Budweiser as a cheap and watery substitute for real, full-bodied beer. They created a blogosphere buzz after the purchase of InBev, which, ironically, only harms America's largest beer company.

Instead, Budweiser announced they would start selling a new form of Bud Light with a hint of lime, called Bud Light Lime. Is this a new spotlight for Budweiser, or the death of Bud Light? Let's save that for another column.

It's not ironic that American Ale comes out of the post-American Budweiser, since the beer was developed well before the buyout.

Taste

American Ale has the most noticeable taste of all the Budweiser beers. A hint of citrus will please the old Shock Top fans, but the strongest of the ingredients are the malt and hops. The malt is by far the most noticeable and gives the beer a nice, light richness that's not too heavy, which is perfect for the bar or parties.

Color

A drink for America can only be one color: red. You could argue blue, but then it could easily be mistaken for the socialist beers of Canada. The head is as white as the stars on the flag and starts strong, but fades fast, leaving a small amount of white lacing on your glass.

Availability

Despite the vast drinkability, American Ale is not available in 30 racks ... not yet anyway. It is available in six packs of 12-ounce bottles and single 22-ounce bottles. Make sure to have a bottle opener handy when drinking either size because neither is a twist off. If bottles are not big enough, kegs are available.

The only bars uptown in Amherst currently serving American Ale are Charlie's and The Spoke. Petition or nag the rest, let your voice be heard.

Clubbing for the Lord?

Members of Amplify Church watch as the church band performs during their meeting at the Thirsty Parrot in Colorado Springs, Colo.

By Mark Barna
The Gazette

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. — On a recent Sunday evening, a couple dozen people, most of them in their 20s, trickled into the Thirsty Parrot as a band blasted rock music from the nightclub's main stage.

They took their seats at bar tables in near darkness while blinking lights bathed the musicians in bright hues.

It looked like a typical night at a downtown bar, except...

No one was drinking alcohol.

The songs were about Jesus Christ.

And instead of dancing, some audience members had their eyes closed and arms raised in praise.

This is Amplify Church, a parish of young evangelicals in Colorado Springs, Colo., who just happen to worship in a bar where Miller Lite and Budweiser posters, not crosses, hang on the walls.

The pastor — foregoing a suit and tie in favor of worn jeans, sandals and a T-shirt — is as casual as the setting.

"All I want is a church full of people who are real," the Rev. Dan MacFadyen, 26, told his 23 congregants at the Thirsty Parrot that night.

"I'd rather have 30 people in the church who are real than have a congregation of 300."

Being "real" is the mantra at Amplify Church.

Its entire existence is a rebuke to the Christian right, a subset within evangelicalism that has been accused of politicizing and polarizing Christianity.

"There's a big movement away from evangelicalism, not in a doctrinal sense, but in a political sense," MacFadyen said.

"My generation is very frustrated with how divisive evangelicalism has become and how it's in bed with the Republicans."

MacFadyen's church avoids politics, and while he opposes abortion and sees homosexuality as a sin, he doesn't preach against them or emphasize the topics unless the issue comes up for discussion at a service.

The church also ignores traditional Christian rites and rituals in favor of an ultracasual atmosphere. It's just young adults with Bibles, hanging out to rap about their faith.

"Churches have become corporations," MacFadyen said. "We're trying to take away the corporate baggage and be real."

MacFadyen was raised in a Baptist church and decided to become a minister at age 18.

Four years ago, he graduated from Pensacola Christian College in Florida and received his ordination at Rochester Hills Baptist Church in Michigan.

A non-traditionalist, MacFadyen didn't want to pastor within a denomination and perform centuries-old rituals. So in November 2007, he and his wife, Sarah, moved from Michigan to Colorado Springs to found a nondenominational church catering to disaffected young evangelicals.

Finding cheap rental space was a challenge until someone broached holding services at the Thirsty Parrot, a night spot for some of the church's congregants.

Three months ago, the congregation started meeting at the club on Sunday evenings, when it's closed and no alcohol is served. The church rents the space at the Parrot — where it meets first and third Sundays — for $700 for each meeting.

It meets at Pikes Peak on Tejon Street all other Sundays.

Dale Myers, co-owner of the Thirsty Parrot, is glad to have the group.

"A lot of young people have been turned off by the church, and this group is trying to bring them back," Myers said.

Because the Thirsty Parrot and other downtown nightclubs cater to young adults, the Parrot-Amplify relationship is a good fit, MacFadyen said.

"The same crowd that comes to the Thirsty Parrot and other bars downtown are the ones being attracted to our church," said MacFadyen, whose church attracts 20 to 30 congregants with a median age of 28.

Ron Carter has been attending Amplify since its founding, and isn't put off by meeting in a place with two full bars.

"Jesus turned water into wine," Carter, 23, said.

Carter, who was raised in a Pentecostal church in Arkansas, is also content with the church's informality.

"Services at some churches are so stuffy that they imprison you rather than set you free," Carter said.

Congregant Josh Poland, 27, said the nightclub atmosphere adds to the church experience.

"There's a level of comfort in meeting here," said Poland, a regular at the Thirsty Parrot.

"Our productions were directed, designed and rehearsed together to make the most out of the shared scenes and situations," commented Warren.

Rosencrantz is played by Rick Blunt in both plays and Guildenstern is played by Ginna Hoben.

The ASC holds auditions throughout the country, searching "for the right 10-12 actors to perform all these roles in all of these plays," said Warren.

Despite this widespread searching, two of the actors have local roots here in the Pioneer Valley.

Daniel Kennedy, who plays the Lead Player, has acted for various theaters in the area. He played Macbeth in "Macbeth" and Cassius in "Julius Caesar" for the Hampshire Shakespeare Company.

Kennedy is originally from Australia and has done acting there as well, but has also performed at Smith College, UMass, West Springfield's Majestic Theater and Northampton's Paintbox Theatre.

Ariel Jacobson, who plays Tragedian, Ambassador and part of the Ensemble in "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead," also has local roots. He earned his B.A. in theater at UMass.

While Kennedy has some experience with the ASC, this will be Jacobson's first time working with them.

Director Jim Warren is co-founder of the ASC and has directed over 50 productions for the center, including their first show, "Richard III." This will be his third time directing "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead."

"The joy of crafting both productions to be companion pieces is matched only by the excitement of knowing that both shows will travel the U.S., turning every venue into an Elizabethan environment," he said of directing "Hamlet" and "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead" on the same tour.

"Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead" will be performed at the University of Massachusetts' Rand Theater on Sunday, Nov. 9 at 7 p.m. Tickets are $15 general admission, $10 for students and seniors, and $25 for reserved seating, which includes a "Meet the Actors" reception following the show.

cash to pay off their debt.

When sex becomes part of their long friendship, hidden feelings start to emerge and problems arise.

The film is very formulaic and clichéd. From start to end, it's a predictable story with cheap humor and lots of nudity (and for those of you willing to pay to see Elizabeth Banks completely nude, just order out tonight, because she reveals no more than you would see at the beach).

As far as the performances go, none of them translate as a poor acting job. Rogen and Banks have good chemistry, and if you can deal with Rogen's nasal voice and heavy breathing, he'll keep you laughing throughout most of the film.

Justin Long and Brandon Routh are funny in their short cameo together, and Craig Robinson, in one of his first big roles, is hilarious – you may remember him as the club bouncer in "Knocked Up" or as Matheson in "Pineapple Express."

In comparison to Rogen's other films, such as "Superbad" and "The 40-Year-Old Virgin," "Zack and Miri" is without question, sub par.

It has a strong element of simplicity and lack of creative humor that were not at all prevalent in his other films.

The film's plot and visuals remain true to its lazily formulated title. In its genre, "Zack and Miri Make a Porno" is nothing more than satisfactory.

It is very funny at parts, but lacks plot depth and has an abundance of nudity – even for an R-rated movie.

Minutewomen to host Bishop's University

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

After a promising scrimmage against Siena, the Massachusetts women's basketball team will host Bishop's University in an exhibition game tonight at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

The game against the Gaiters will give the young Minutewomen a chance to gain more experience against collegiate teams. UMass has four freshmen on its roster and just two seniors. Returning starters include senior guard Stefanie Gerardot, senior point guard Sakera Young and sophomore forward Teya Wright.

The newer players on the team will have a difficult game against the Gaiters, who lead the all-time series against the Maroon and White, 2-1.

"They like to push the ball up in transition and they'll take a lot of threes," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said of what she expects from Bishop's (3-3 in exhibition-play). "They have a 6-foot-4 forward that will also shoot them. They look to exchange a lot and we need to dig down on the post."

The Minutewomen will have a new look this season in the absence of graduating seniors Kate Mills and Pam Rosanio. Mills was the leading scorer for UMass last season and Rosanio was second on the team in assists. Both players were the only ones to average more than 10 points per game.

Young gives the Minutewomen experience in the backcourt. Last season, Young led the team with 108 assists and 39 steals. Gerardot joins Young in the backcourt as shooting guard. Gerardot is a consistent scorer, averaging 6.8 points per game last season, and shooting 32 percent from behind the three-point line.

Diatrema Hill returns this season following a redshirt last year due to injury. In the absence of Rosanio, Dacko looks to Hill to be a defensive stopper and disrupt the flow of opposing teams.

Pressure will be on freshman Kristina Danella and sophomore Valerie Avebe to fill the hole at power forward left by Mills.

Bishop's is an experienced team led by 6-foot-4 forward Amanda Pirtbauer. Pirtbauer was last year's leading scorer for the Gaiters and will be trouble for Wright down low.

Dacko plans to emulate the playing style of the UMass men's basketball team, which means using the dribble-drive offense. In this style of play, guard-play is important. However, driving to the basket will be difficult against Pirtbauer and forward Felicia Craig-Thompson.

Bishop's utilizes the one-in, four-out offense, which means that Pirtbauer will man the post while the other four players will shoot from the perimeter.

The Gaiters are on a three-game winning streak and the sheer size of them creates an automatic mismatch for UMass. However, no team is without a weakness. Bishop's averages 22 turnovers per game, so the Minutewomen need to clog the passing lanes and create fast-break opportunities for players like Gerardot, Young and sophomore guard Kim Benton.

"We've got to push the ball up in transition and get some easy points," Dacko said of how she intends to combat a fast-paced Gaiters team. "We can't let them get in the paint, that's a big thing."

Bishop's incorporates a man-to-man defense in it's primarily zone defensive schemes. The Minutewomen will need to lock down Pirtbauer while keeping an eye on the perimeter. Look for UMass to try and force mid-range jump shots and use Wright to nab the rebounds and pass it out to Young or Benton in transition.

The transition game will be important this season if the Minutewomen hope to be successful with this new style of play.

Dacko still considers Wright to be a work-in-progress, and thinks she'll need to work on her patience in the post and focus on keeping her feet on the ground. Her shot-blocking ability is what makes her particularly dangerous. Last season, Wright had 15 blocks and pulled down 148 total rebounds.

Gerardot and Benton have worked this off-season on their consistency from beyond the arc and will showcase their new skills tonight in this new era for UMass women's basketball.

Senior Sakera Young and the Minutewomen take on Bishop's University tonight at the Mullins Center for the team's first exhibition game of the season.

UMass goes for third-straight sweep

By Holly J. Galvin
Collegian Staff

In a final dual meet tune-up before the much-anticipated Terrier Invitational in Boston, the UMass swimming and diving teams will look for its third straight sweep this Saturday at Binghamton.

Saturday's 11 a.m. meet in New York, the Bearcats' home opener, marks the two programs' third meeting in three years. The Minutemen and Minutewomen have swept all three previous match-ups with Binghamton and look to improve their respective dual meet records of 2-1 apiece.

Elite diving prowess continues to be a huge factor for UMass. Diving coach Mandy Hixon's teams annihilated Stony Brook last Saturday, claiming all first- and second-place finishes in each of the men's and women's 1- and 3-meter events, as well as two men's third-place finishes from Adam Duffield.

On the Minutewomen diving board, senior leadership from Sarah Horstmann and Karen Upperco, along with immense contributions from steadfast sophomore Anne Fogerty, will be key against Binghamton. The three swept first through third place against Binghamton last year in both diving events. Fogerty's two first-place finishes and Horstmann's second-place scores against Stony Brook come at a time where UMass faces an up-and-coming opponent.

Thus far, Binghamton men (0-2) were narrowly defeated by UMBC and Boston University, the latter of which also notched a dual-meet victory over UMass earlier this month – accounting for the Minutemen and Minutewomen's only losses so far this year. The Bearcat men have averaged 118 total points in dual meets thus far, while female Bearcats (0-3) have averaged totals of around 100. Last year's Binghamton meet, also held away at the Bearcats' home pool, saw victories for both UMass squads. The Minutewomen won 171-129, while the Minutemen defeated Binghamton a bit more handily, 198-108.

UMass dominance over the Bearcats dates back to the 2006-2007 season, when the Minutewomen routed Binghamton in a landslide victory, 235-66. Minutemen also claimed victory in that year's tri-meet with the Bearcats and Colgate, although at a much narrower margin of 183-117 to claim first place out of all three schools.

Following a Stony Brook meet that saw 13 top finishes, junior Kathryne Chalikis and freshman Joey Sbordon continue to be hot for UMass. Both swimmers finished at Stony Brook with multiple first-place finishes for the second meet in a row. Chalikis captured sprint wins in the 50-meter freestyle and 100 freestyle, while Sbordon kept his undefeated individual event title intact with wins in the 100 and 200 freestyles.

Along with diving and peak individual performances, relay consistency has proven effective for UMass thus far. The men's 200 medley relay performances exhibited over Stony Brook, which saw both, Coach Russ Yarworth and Bob Newcomb's, squads place first and second, looks to further improve times. For the women, Chalikis and Elizabeth Walsh guided a 1 minute, 50.61 second first-place combination that also included Jennifer Corriveau and Jessica Staroselec. Senior captain Nate Bromage led the Minutemen squad of Sbordon and junior Andrew Willbrant to second place.

Upon returning from New York, UMass will train for Boston University's Terrier Invitational in two weeks.

Holly J. Galvin can be reached at hgalvin@student.umass.edu.

Senior Nate Bromage will look to continue his success on the UMass men's swimming and diving team as they travel to Binghamton this weekend.

Two guys, one column

By Eli Rosenswaike and Michael King
Collegian Columnists

Eli Rosenswaike

Michael King

We here at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian – and by we, I mean myself and Mr. Editor-in-Chief himself, Michael King – have been covering UMass sports for far too long.

So who better to go to when you want to know the results of today's women's exhibition game against Bishop's University – before it even happens?

In every Weekend Edition of the Collegian throughout the rest of the year, we will be prognosticating every UMass sporting event – no matter how inconsequential.

Just remember, you heard it here first.

Friday, Nov. 7

Field Hockey vs. Saint Joseph's (Atlantic 10 Tournament first round in Philadelphia, Pa.): The Minutewomen will cruise to a four-goal victory, despite playing in St. Joe's backyard. UMass will build a 4-0 lead by halftime and easily win 6-2 (King).

As good as the No. 18 Minutewomen are – and that's the best team in Amherst – I don't see them scoring six goals. Wishful thinking, Michael? I'll give them five in a 5-1 win…so you were close (Rosenswaike).

Men's Soccer vs. No. 10 Saint Louis: Though the Minutemen upended the Billikens last year in Saint Louis in an upset setting the stage for the team's magical playoff run, I don't see it happening again this season. Billikens win handily, 3-0 (King).

Maybe it happens again Michael, ever think of that? Well I did, and quickly dismissed it. There's nothing I loathe more than agreeing with you, but I have to this time. Although your predicted score is a bit unrealistic. Simmons doesn't allow three goals in a game. UMass loses, 2-0 (Rosenswaike).

Women's Basketball vs. Bishop's University (exhibition): Though this is an exhibition, don't tell that to the Queen of Hoops. Expect the Minutewomen to be running the floor just like a regular-season game (King).

I know nothing about Bishop's, but teams are supposed to schedule garbage teams in exhibitions so they look good. I assume the Queen of Hoops did that here, so UMass wins by 30 – so they win by more points than there are fans in attendance (Rosenswaike).

Saturday, Nov. 8

Football vs. Maine: Looks like UMass' playoff hopes have not quite evaporated. But as true to form for a Don Brown-coached team, look for the Minutemen to win convincingly (44-17) this weekend against Maine, only to set themselves up for a devastating playoff-killing loss at New Hampshire next week (King).

Hey, one game at a time, Michael. Wow, 44-17 Mike? Do you realize Maine is ranked No. 26 in the polls? You just pulled that number out of your, well, you know. Anyway, UMass will win because it's at home. Final score will be 30-18 (Rosenswaike).

Hockey @ Merrimack (North Andover): The Mass Attack always has trouble playing on the smaller ice surface of Merrimack's high school-quality facility. But judging by the way UMass played at Providence last week in similar conditions, the outcome here is not in doubt for Cahoon and Co. UMass wins 5-1 (King).

This is getting increasingly boring with us agreeing on everything. What is this, the Twilight Zone? We never agree on anything. I'm not a big hockey guy, but even I know this is a mismatch. Minutemen take this one 4-1 (Rosenswaike).

Field Hockey vs. TBD (A-10 Championship if necessary): The opponent is irrelevant here. Coach Justine Sowry has the best squad in the A-10 and the Minutewomen's offensive ability will carry them to their second-consecutive A-10 title. UMass defeats Temple, 4-1 (King).

Finally, a disagreement! Well, sort of. UMass will win this game, but not against Temple. Richmond will beat the Owls and then the Minutewomen will exterminate the Spiders…get it? Final score will be 3-1 UMass (Rosenswaike).

Swimming and Diving @ Binghamton (men's and women's): Boy, this one really takes me back. Coach Russ Yarworth has another industrious, blue-collar squad, and this meet is just a formality en route to another A-10 Championship. Men's squad wins 166-134, while the women's team falls 154-134 (King).

I know as much about swimming as Michael Phelps knows about losing. I do know that the men's team never loses anything, so I'll guess that UMass wins 171-129. I say the women win this one too, so we have our first complete disagreement. They take it 147-141 (Rosenswaike).

Sunday, Nov. 9

Men's Soccer vs. Charlotte: The UMass defense has played exceptionally well as of late. But whenever a team has a gifted goal-scorer who can take over a game (as in Charlotte's Chris Salvaggione), things can get interesting. The Minutemen will be fortunate to walk away with a 2-2 tie (King).

The Minutemen will utilize their tough experience against No. 10 Saint Louis and defeat the 49ers. They've been playing too well lately not to win one game this weekend. And I have a bonus prediction: Bryan Hogan awakes from his year-long coma and actually scores a goal! They win 2-1 (Rosenswaike).

Tuesday, Nov. 11

Men's Basketball vs. Arkansas-Monticello (first round of 2K Sports Classic in Carbondale, Ill.): The last trip to Carbondale for a UMass team didn't end well. But look for Coach Derek Kellogg's head coaching debut to be a memorable one. UMass cruises 89-66 (King).

It took me like 10 minutes just to find the athletics page at Arkansas-Monticello. That means they can't possibly be any good. The other dead give away? Its nickname is the Boll Weevils. I'm not kidding. Led by Luke Bonner (kidding) the Minutemen squash the Boll Weevils, 98-62 (Rosenswaike).

Wednesday, Nov. 12

Men's Basketball vs. TBD (if necessary): Southern Illinois is the likely opponent here if UMass takes its first round game. The Salukis tend to be a scrappy and much-underrated basketball team. Nonetheless, Ricky Harris lights up the court and UMass wins 77-70 (King).

If UMass defeats the Boll Weevils (I just like saying that), it'll play either Southern Illinois (definitely) or California (Pa., no chance). A matchup with Southern Illinois would be a good one, but I give the edge to UMass, 86-79 (Rosenswaike).

Thursday, Nov. 13

Men's Soccer vs. TBD (A-10 Tournament): With the A-10 Tournament field not even set at this point, we're going to hold off on making predictions. Once it does, feel free to e-mail either of us for our humble opinions.

Scores and Smack

Starting with next week's column, we will list our respective records for the week and season. The winner of each week will use this designated space to rag on the other. Expect me (Eli) to get that chance on a week-to-week basis. Hey, I am the sports editor.

Katelyn Orlando is the first Minutewomen to win the A-10 Player of the Year since 1999.

Orlando earns Atlantic 10 POY

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

A week after it secured its position as the best team in the Atlantic 10 with an undefeated conference record, the Massachusetts field hockey team was acknowledged for having the conference's best offensive player, rookie and coach.

Through a vote among the conference's head coaches, UMass senior forward Katelyn Orlando was named the 2008 A-10 Offensive Player of the Year. Orlando was the most prolific player in the A-10, putting up 14 goals and an assist in her senior campaign, seven of which came against conference opponents.

She's also had four game-winning goals. Orlando is the first UMass player to win player of the year since Anke Bruemmer in 1999 and the first since it was separated into offensive and defensive categories in 2000.

Adding to the accolades was UMass coach Justine Sowry and freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdall. Sowry was named the 2008 A-10 Coach of the Year for the second straight year, while Widdall was named A-10 Rookie of the Year.

Sowry has justified her back-to-back coach of the year awards in her first two years at the helm of UMass. She's led Minutewomen to at least a share of the A-10 regular season title two years in a row and has produced a 28-13 record.

Widdall, who shares Rookie of the Year honors with Richmond's Katelin Peterson, leads the A-10 with four shutouts and an impressive 1.14 goals against average. Her impressive performance in goal this season netted her the award despite missing three games while competing for the United States in the Pan American Games this season.

Since winning the starting goalkeeper spot in the first game of the season, Widdall has shown nothing but stellar play in goal. Widdall's .776 save percentage is the best mark for a goalkeeper in the conference and the 11th best in the country. The last UMass player to be named Rookie of the Year was Saskia Fuchs in 1996.

The Minutewomen also boast four members of the A-10 All-Conference first-team. In addition to Orlando and Widdall, senior Mary Shea and sophomore Makaela Potts were named to the squad.

Although Shea has not put up gaudy numbers, the team captain has led UMass with strong defensive play and a few timely goals this season. Potts, the team's defensive captain, leads the conference with 57 shots and has played well on defense.

Senior Erin Parker and junior Cher King were also acknowledged as they were named to the second-team All-Conference. Parker leads the A-10 in assists and is fourth on the team with five goals. She was also named to the A-10 Academic All-Conference team. King, the Minutewomen's leading scorer last year, has put up two goals and three assists. But she has made a larger impact with her stick-handling and passing skills.

Also representing UMass are freshman Nikki Pancrocco and sophomore Jaime Bourazeris. Pancrocco, along with Widdall, was named to the A-10 All-Rookie team while Bourazeris was named as an All-Conference honorable mention. Pancrocco started the season as a forward but was moved to defender to add depth and excelled at the position. Bourazeris, the team's only returning defender from last season, led the defense's back line while contributing on the team's penalty corner unit.

With Pancrocco getting recognized, there are only three starting spots on the UMass roster that did not produce some sort of award representative. By having seven players named to one of the All-Conference teams, the Minutewomen more than doubled last year's number of three players named.

Minutemen reach for tourney

Need just one win to clinch playoff birth, regular-season title in grasp

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

After a shaky start to the season, the Massachusetts men's soccer team has a chance to secure a spot in the Atlantic 10 tournament this weekend.

Since the start of the season, UMass coach Sam Koch expressed the importance of winning Atlantic 10 games. In the first game of A-10 play, UMass (7-6-3, 5-1-1 A-10) lost to Rhode Island. Since then, the Minutemen have not lost a game.

If UMass beats No. 10 Saint Louis (9-2-5, 5-2-0 A-10) on Friday, it'll clinch a playoff spot. Winning on Sunday could clinch or share the regular-season conference title for the Minutemen.

"Winning the conference title, the regular season title, would be a great accomplishment. I'm sure that will help [the team] focus," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "Our main goal is to make the Atlantic 10 tournament. A win on Friday will accomplish that, and then we can worry about the title after that. The main thing is to get the result on Friday."

P. Stanley/Collegian

Junior Stuart Thomson and the Minutemen need to win one of their games this weekend against No. 10 Saint Louis or Charlotte to qualify for the Atlantic 10 tournament.

It has been UMass' goal since the start of the season to make it to the A-10 tournament, but after a rocky start it didn't look like it was going to be so easy for the Minutemen. In their first A-10 game, they lost 1-0 to Rhode Island on Oct. 12. After the game, Koch discussed with his team what they had to do to secure a spot in the tournament. Since then, the Minutemen have been improving each week, all in preparation for this weekend.

"Now, this weekend is here and we're playing much better. We still have some things that aren't 100 percent on, and how well we do will determine the outcome of these games," Koch said.

The Minutemen need to communicate better in the back, make sure they don't get caught stabbing for the ball and keep their composure, team shape and stay compact. Doing that will allow them to defend as a team.

"We have to do that for the whole 90 minutes and if we do, I'm sure the results are going to be in our favor," Koch said.

With two tough opponents this weekend, it's important for the Minutemen to use the momentum they've gained in their six-game unbeaten streak and their home-field advantage to come out of the weekend with a berth into the A-10 tournament.

St. Louis is known to be dangerous with their off-ball runs. When the Billikens are attacking, they have second and third runners that come through supporting their teammates with the ball. They have accurate service and are one of the most skilled teams the Minutemen will face all season. UMass' speed will help them against Saint Louis because the Minutemen can move forward faster and use their quickness to defend on the counter-attack.

This is a crucial weekend for UMass, Saint Louis and Charlotte. Depending on who comes out with the win, it could secure a spot for the team in the A-10 playoffs. The Billikens are expected to win the tournament, but without a successful weekend they may not qualify.

"We're in the playoffs now, these are two playoff teams. This'll give us a great indication about how far we can go, and if we can go. Anything can happen on any day," Koch said.

"The main thing for us is to play well as a team, stick to our game plan and stay focused for the 90 minutes. We've been able to do that much better," Koch said. "Can we now do it in these two games which are our two biggest tests? We'll find out."

Koch and the Minutemen are confident that if they go out and play their best this weekend, they'll be practicing at Rudd Field on Tuesday, preparing for the A-10 tournament.

DeNormandie comes up big

By Scott Feldman
Collegian Staff

It takes some players more than a season of soccer to score their first goal.

For redshirt freshman Sam DeNormandie, it took one shot.

DeNormandie scored his first collegiate goal on his first and only shot last Sunday when the Massachusetts men's soccer team played against Fordham. Seeing his first action in a game in his entire career, DeNormandie drove home a header off a corner kick in the 51st minute of the game to give the Minutemen (7-6-2, 5-1-1 Atlantic 10) a 2-0 lead. The goal would prove to be the deciding factor as UMass won a 2-1 game to move to second place in the conference.

"We went nuts, I couldn't believe it," DeNormandie said. "I sprinted over to the sideline and the whole team was jumping all over me, the other team had no idea what happened, they thought it was just another goal."

It was a complete surprise to DeNormandie who, prior to last weekend, had not been traveling with the team on road trips. He was excited to be tabbed to go on the road with the team for the first time. DeNormandie did not expect to enter the game, and was thrilled to get a chance to play for the first time when Koch put him in.

DeNormandie will never forget what happened next.

"The ball went out for a corner kick and I was at the top of the box with (midfielder) Mike DeSantis and he said, 'Sammy, your going near post' so I said 'Alright.'" DeNormandie said. "Here [Arikan] whipped the ball in near post, it went on my head and it was perfect."

DeNormandie came into the UMass program listed as a defenseman, but he was subbed in as a forward because Koch felt that DeNormandie had a hard shot and would be more useful to the team on offense. His success shows the versatility that Koch wants from all of his players.

"We hope that most of our players can play anywhere, but he has a very good, hard shot, and we are very solid in the back," Koch said. "There's an old saying, don't fix something that's not broken and the back four [defenders] are doing fine. My feeling was he would give us new energy up top [on offense]."

DeNormandie did not mind the change of position and enjoyed playing in a new position.

"I'm a defender, but he put me up top to run around and terrify the defense a little bit," DeNormandie joked.

At the beginning of the season, DeNormandie and Koch had some differences and it seemed as though DeNormandie would spend another year in training, but his effort in practice earned him the chance.

"He didn't think that I'd been working as hard as I could've at the beginning of the season," DeNormandie said. "So I really worked hard to bust my [tail] in practice and he saw it and thought I deserved some time."

"He's trained hard, he's worked hard in practice and he showed us that he earned the playing time, so he got his chance and made the most of it," Koch said.

This weekend, the Minutemen host No. 10 Saint Louis and Charlotte in a pair of games critical to their season. Koch would not say whether DeNormandie would be inserted into the line-up.

"Yes he could be up there, will he come in? I can't promise anything," Koch said.

Murals link UM to area

BY S.P. SULLIVAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The student-initiated outreach program Student Bridges brought students from Peck Middle School and Holyoke High School to the University of Massachusetts on Saturday to design a mural for their upcoming event, Hip Hop Evolution.

Student Bridges community outreach coordinator Yajaira Cotto said the semiannual hip-hop event has been held three times before, but organization members wanted to expand its scope beyond those students who are musically inclined.

"It's a way to show youth that there are ways to express themselves in many different avenues," she said.

Hip Hop and the Visual Arts allowed students more interested in painting and design to express themselves, said site coordinator Ben Thompson.

"It's the first time we've incorporated visual art," he said. "Hopefully we'll institute it every semester."

Holyoke students designed a multi-panel mural in the Student Union Craft Center that explored "life's motivations, life's roadblocks and life's goals," according to Thompson.

Peck Middle School student Carlos Rodriguez said he got involved with Hip hop and the Visual Arts through Thompson, who also runs a boys' sports program as a liaison between Student Bridges and the Peck STEP program.

"Ben was telling us about UMass and he told us about a future project where we could draw murals," Rodriguez said. "We wanted to draw murals and create T-shirts, too, so we came."

Thompson said getting youth to see the University cam-

Kirsten Holmstedt will be discussing her book "Band of Sisters, American Women at War in Iraq" on Tuesday Nov. 11th from 7p.m. to 9 p.m. in the Student Union's Cape Cod Lounge.

The event is made possible by the University of Massachusetts Veterans and Service Members Association, the UMass Military Community Resource Center and the UMass Everywoman's Center. Holmstedt will talk about her experiences interviewing and researching female veterans of the Iraq War for her book, and a female veteran appearing in her next book will also speak.

Director of MCRC Judy A. Gagnon expects the Cape Cod lounge to be filled to capacity.

"There has been significant advertising, and the Everywoman's Center has been especially helpful in reaching out to the media and to the general public in general in our area. The event has also been advertised on military list serves," she said.

Women are serving in combat related positions in Iraq and Afghanistan more prevalently than ever before. Previous notions about who is fit to fight in war have been challenged. Captain Amy McGrath said the changes are good.

"We're there, and we're there to stay," she said.

Gagnon said, "After reading her book, I expect the talk to be a real eye-opener to those who don't [know] the role women play in the current wars in Iraq and Afghanistan."

Tuition hikes loom across U.S.

BY CHRIS RUSSELL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

College tuition and fees, as well as financial aid, increased slightly this year after accounting for inflation, but some experts believe the struggling economy may force substantial price increases next year.

Average tuition and fees for in-state students at public four-year institutions increased by 6.4 percent, or $394, reaching a total of $6,585, according to a report released last Wednesday by the College Board.

This is a .7 percent increase after accounting for a 5.6 inflation rate so far this year, the highest inflation rate in 26 years, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The University of Massachusetts' tuition and fees increased 3 percent from last year to $10,232. According to the College Board, this is roughly $2,000 more than the average in-state tuition and fees at four-year public colleges in New England, which have the highest of any region in the country.

Financial aid also increased across the country, according to the report. On average, undergraduates received $4,656 in grants and $3,650 in federal loans, about a 5 percent increase for both over the last year, after adjusting for inflation.

Since 1998, average undergraduate grant aid increased by $1,494 (in constant 2007 dollars), about two-thirds of the dollar increase in average tuition and fees at public four-year institutions over the same period.

Failure of grant aid to match tuition has increased the net price, the amount most students pay after receiving financial aid, of four-year public colleges over the past five years.

This year, there was an 11 percent increase in the average net price at public four-year institutions, from $2,600 to $2,900.

The American Council of Education predicts the declining economy will give the College Board report a "limited shelf life."

"I am afraid this year's report may prove only to be a snapshot of a time in history that we might soon be referring to as 'the good old days,'" said Molly Corbett, President of the ACE.

Minutewomen win A-10 tournament title

Maroon and White capture consecutive conference crowns

BY MELISSA GARBER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

PHILADELPHIA – Prior to the start of the Atlantic 10 field hockey championship game on Saturday, Massachusetts coach Justine Sowry turned to her team and made a spider out of both her hands. She threw the imaginary spider on the ground and crushed it beneath her feet.

It was a symbolic move for the top-seeded Minutewomen, who defeated the Richmond Spiders, 2-0, for their second straight A-10 tournament title.

"Words can't even describe it," UMass senior midfielder Mary Shea said after the game. "It's just amazing. It's something we had to work hard for."

Sowry credits the Minutewomen's motivation to their narrow win over Temple in double overtime to clinch the A-10 regular season title.

"Our philosophy this weekend was total team effort," Sowry said. "Our team played 100 percent brilliant [field] hockey in the final.

Sowry, who won the A-10 Coach of the Year for her second time in as many years, was proud of her team's accomplishment.

"It means the world," she said. "To come out with a championship we achieved our goal for this year."

On Friday, the No. 18 Minutewomen (16-4, 8-0 A-10) outscored Saint Joseph's 3-0, to enter the championship. Sophomore forward Katie Kelley scored all three goals for UMass. The Minutewomen finished the conference with an unblemished 8-0 record.

"It's really special that we made it here," senior midfielder Erin Parker said.

The title game was played at Temple University's Geasey Field, home to one of the largest permanent AstroTurf fields in the world. The Minutewomen are used to a slightly different surface on Garber Field, but

Microsoft, UMass team up for tech.

BY KIMYA HEDAYAT-ZADEH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Jonah Brucker-Cohen ignored the idea of wireless Internet when he first heard about it in 1999. A few years later, however, Wi-Fi technology re-emerged with projects and public community networks materializing, said the researcher and Ph.D. candidate at Trinity College in Dublin.

In the near future, Wi-Fi may not be the simplest, cheapest or most pervasive Internet technology around, says Brucker-Cohen. The new guy in town is Vi-Fi, a wireless technology developed by the University of Massachusetts and Microsoft researchers, which enables uninterrupted Internet access in moving vehicles.

Microsoft researcher Ratul Mahajan began to explore the technology in the summer of 2006, but UMass came into the picture when graduate student Aruna Balasubramanian joined Mahajan as an intern in 2007.

"We deployed a vehicular test bed, called VanLAN, both to uncover the challenges in using today's technology, Wi-Fi, and to deploy and evaluate the performance of our new technology, Vi-Fi," said Balasubramanian.

Measurements from the test bed on the Microsoft campus shuttles in Redmond, Wash., showed the main obstacle in accessing Internet connections with Wi-Fi from moving vehicles was the frequent disruptions in connectivity.

"Today, a Wi-Fi-enabled vehicle communicates with one AP at a time to gain connectivity," said Balasubramanian, referring to the Access Points connecting wireless devices to the Internet. "As the vehicle moves, it moves to a different AP, and so on."

"However, connecting to a single AP causes several disruptions because the connectivity can become poor unexpectedly," continued Balasubramanian. "When using Vi-Fi, on the other hand, a vehicle maintains connectivity with several APs at the same time, so that even if the connectivity with one AP becomes poor another AP can be used to connect to the Internet."

Mahajan uses "Tarzan" as a metaphor for those who are not familiar with the technical lingo.

"Think of Tarzan: he climbs tree to tree, hanging on one branch at a time," said Mahajan. "If one branch breaks, Tarzan is going to fall. But if Tarzan could hold on to multiple branches at once, even if one broke he still wouldn't fall."

Plus, the Internet connection on your laptop, smart phone and GPS system in the car will be better.

"The technical difficulty in implementing Vi-Fi is in figuring out which one of the several APs should be used to connect to the Internet," said Balasubramanian.

Members of the DewMass Marketing Team pose during one of its meetings. The group is charged with spreading the word about Mount Snow and the Action Sports Tour this winter.

No detour: 'Dew Tour' gives ISOM students real experience

BY ANNA BRIARLY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts Sport Management Department created a unique experiential learning course at the beginning of the semester. It offers undergraduate students the chance to put their management education to work firsthand.

"We're here to follow the rules, hand out lift tickets and blast really loud music," said Professor Mark McDonald, head of the course, during one meeting.

In truth, the class does much more than this. The demanding, six-credit sport management course, coined "DewMass," is designed to allow students to work directly with Mount Snow and the Action Sports Tour to advertise the Winter Dew Tour from Jan. 8 to 11. The tour has three stops across the nation, and Mount Snow, Vt., is the only one on East Coast. The other two will be in California and Colorado.

Some 13 UMass sport management majors and one marketing major make up the DewMass Marketing Team, which is broken up into three departments: promotions, partnerships and Internet marketing.

Mount Snow provides promotional materials and funding for events. The main goal is to reach out to college students and promote the Dew Tour in any way possible.

"This is our own marketing consultant company," said Ryan Connelly, one of the 14 students. "We get 10 grand to go out and reach college students with our advertising strategies."

"We work 10 to 20 hours a week on this, and we'll probably be working a lot more as we approach January," said Eric Ginsberg, a DewMass student.

Students were interviewed and selected to join the DewMass Marketing Course based on past internships and future goals. The team is student run, but receives guidance and feedback from McDonald.

"I don't tell students what to do," said McDonald. "I give advice by asking questions to get them thinking critically about the possibilities. If I think they're jumping into a decision without thinking of all the other options, then I start to ask more critical questions in hope that they will analyze the situation and figure it out themselves. I'm here to facilitate communication, build a team and make sure that they have the physical and informational resources they need to succeed."

Student Kat Karottki, head of partnerships and personal relations of the class, added, "Some of us don't have as much experience as others. Dr. McDonald will ask certain questions that will bring big ideas and issues to the forefront that we were overlooking."

UM, local kids prep for local 'evolution'

pus has serious impact.

"We try to get youth on campus because a big part of getting the idea of college in a middle school student's head is to bring them here," he said. "Most of these kids have never been to a college campus before."

Rodriguez and fellow Peck students Jacob Colon and Mykqual Ramos worked on a panel of the mural they had designed previously when they applied to take part in Hip Hop and the Visual Arts. It depicted a shield and two crossed swords topped by a crown.

"The crown is our goal," said Colon.

"The shield is something holding us back," said Ramos.

Students also designed T-shirts in Adobe Illustrator to be worn by performers at Hip Hop Evolution, which will be held in Holyoke on Nov. 21, and silk screened them at the Craft Center.

Thompson said the event was made possible by a $400 grant for supplies from the Fine Arts Center and the cooperation of the Craft Center, which volunteered its facilities for the day.

"We've worked with [Student Bridges] in the past with smaller programs that lead up to this," said Marjorie Valdivia, assistant director of the Craft Center. "But this is the first larger project."

Hip-Hop Evolution is the most recent incarnation of the semiannual event, which Cotto said has undergone a name change each time as younger students voted on its name.

"It evolves every year we do it – something new, something different," Cotto said. "It evolves into something creative that the youth create."

But Hip Hop Evolution, Cotto said, is here to stay.

"The youth always choose the name, but we polled them and now it's permanently Hip Hop Evolution," she said.

Thompson said the two events are designed to be mostly entertaining, but also to encourage students to attend all of the "six colleges" – the Five College system and Holyoke Community College.

Tuition jump feared

During previous economic downturns, states imposed double-digit tuition increases on public colleges, according to recent article on InsideHigherEd.com.

Shrinking state revenues and budgets have already forced public colleges in Rhode Island and Michigan to institute mid-year tuition increases. So far, 17 states have cut funding to public colleges this fiscal year.

Massachusetts is one of these states. Last month, Governor Deval Patrick announced a mid-year budget cut of 5 percent, forcing Chancellor Robert Holub to reduce UMass's budget by $12 million for this fiscal year.

This reduction will be accomplished by "one-time cuts to campus units and a halt to all hiring except for the most critical, strategic positions," Holub said in a campus-wide e-mail. "By taking these one-time budget actions now, we will not request mid-year fee increases, nor will we make cuts to student financial aid."

Holub cautioned these measures were only for this fiscal year, and said he would begin discussions with the campus community to deal "with this fiscal crisis and the base budget reductions these cuts represent in the next fiscal year's budget."

These "base budget reductions" in next year's budget have some UMass students apprehensive.

Phillip White, class of 2010, said he fears tuition increases next year, especially when informed of the ACE prediction.

"We were able to avoid tuition increases or cuts to financial aid this year, but what about next year?" White said. "The economy is going to keep getting worse, and UMass might lose even more state aid. They have to cut costs somewhere."

Keeping tuition down next year may make it harder for colleges to meet increased demand for financial aid, said Sandy Baum, a senior policy analyst for the College Board and professor of economics at Skidmore College.

"The tension may be: Are they going to decide they need more money for financial aid or to just hold tuition down?" she said.

This dilemma comes at a time when more people are seeking financial aid. The number of people who applied for the federal Pell Grant Program, which serves low-income students, increased by almost 800,000 in the first seven months of this year compared with the same period last year. This is the largest increase ever over such a time period, according to the Department of Education.

The College Board report put the total number of people receiving the grant at 5.4 million, a 5 percent increase over last year's number of 5.2 million. Department of Education officials said Congress may need to increase funding to the program by up to $6 billion to reflect this increased demand.

around the UMass campus, including a Voodoo event on Nov. 7 from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. on the library lawn.

"Just look for the big, black thing that's blasting music and looks like a S.W.A.T. truck, and you'll know you're not far from it," said Karottki.

Besides on-campus events, DewMass is involved in a lot of off-campus advertising, including partnering with local skate parks, a University of New Hampshire hockey game and the University of Connecticut football game.

"Our ultimate goal and objective is to get people to the event at Mount Snow in January," said Karottki. "That's our job."

Currently, the DewMass marketing program and Mount Snow are engaged in a three-year contract that began this year. The course has potential to continue afterwards.

"If it goes well, I'm sure they will want to continue the relationship," said McDonald. "I am more than optimistic that they will. We tend to under promise and over deliver. It's a wonderful thing for Mount Snow."

"To bring together 14 people and have us get to know each other and work together, it'd be like Mount Snow going out and hiring a grass-roots firm without having to hire labor and get materials," added Karottki.

The marketing course receives great support and funding not only from Mount Snow and the Action Sports Tour, but from the University itself.

"Mount Snow contacted the University in May about this organization. We took it to the Dean and the Associate Deans, and much to my surprise, they said that this is something we should do," said McDonald. "Even though we were going through tough budgeting times, the University still wanted to give the kids this opportunity. It was worth it for the 14 students to get this real world experiential learning opportunity. I'm very pleased with the support, especially given the late notice. Without them, this would've never been able to happen."

"DewMass gives us the chance to demonstrate why our Sports Management department is the one of the best in the country by showing what kids here get to do," Karottki said, "I mean, we're working with a nationwide tour. We wouldn't be able to do this if our department wasn't effective."

The course is designed to engage students in experiential learning, promote team work ethics, and prepare students for real world tasks.

When asked how effective the program has been overall for students, Ginsberg replied, "Incredibly. It gives you a full life experience, from event management to creating to retail – just everything you could need to know."

combat, because of the nature of these wars, they very often are in combat. Also, I expect she will reflect on the relationships between women soldiers and their male counterparts."

Kristen Holmstedt got her B.A. in journalism from Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa, in 1985. She later got her Master's Degree from the University of North Carolina, Wilmington. Her interest in the military began while she was living in a military community in Jacksonville, N.C. Jacksonville was home to the Marine Corps Base Camp Lejeune, the largest military facility of its kind on the East Coast. Seeing female marines coming and going from this base caused her to ask herself what it would be like to be in their boots.

Army Captain Tammy Duckworth wrote in the book's foreword, "I am not a big fan of being identified as a woman anything. I worked so hard not to be different from the other soldiers for most of my career." Many women in the book shared this sentiment; they were not interested in standing out but in serving their country in the same fashion as male soldiers.

"Our main goal was to reach out to the women soldiers who are students at UMass. Their voices are seldom heard. This program is mainly for them," said Gagnon. "For the general public, I hope for a new awareness of these wars – why people (women especially) choose to go to war." She said women should no longer be ostracized for their decisions regarding combat service.

After the talk there will be a question and answer session followed by a book signing sponsored by the University Store.

"The APs don't have time to talk to each other to figure this out. So the Vi-Fi algorithm that we developed allows an AP to independently figure out if it should be the one to connect to the Internet, or if it should let some other AP connect."

The research team, which includes UMass graduate student Arun Venkataramani, UMass Professor Brian Neil Levine and Professor John Zahorjan from the University of Washington, also tested the technology on DieselNet, a vehicular test bed at UMass.

"Vi-Fi worked really well in our experiments," said Mahajan. "We find that it reduces disruptions and doubles the performance of interactive applications in our deployed test bed. In practice, this would translate to clearer VoIP calls with far fewer interruptions and faster Web page downloads." VoIP calls refer to Voice over Internet Protocol enabling phone calls via the Internet.

Researchers for the VanLAN project believe the demand for Vi-Fi technology will be great and its applications far-reaching.

"Users want to stay connected and run their favorite applications such as the Web browser, e-mail client and VoIP," said Mahajan. "Today such connectivity can be enabled using cellular technology, but that tends to be both expensive and has low performance."

Mahajan also said Wi-Fi is becoming increasingly present in the form of hotspots, city-wide mesh networks and enterprise Wireless Local Area Networks (WLAN's).

"We ask if the Wi-Fi technology can be leveraged to provide network access to moving vehicles," said Mahajan. "Such access, if possible, would be both cheaper and higher performance."

Hope. Change. America.

Nick O'Malley

Well, I hope that everyone is enjoying their first week in the new era of hope and change under president-elect Barack Obama.

I must say to every Republican on this campus that was bombarded with condescending text messages from their Democratic friends on Tuesday, I apologize.

In time, however, they too will come to accept this new period of hope-ness and change-itude. No longer will we serve under this Republican regime of privatized health care and tax breaks for everyone. Now is the beginning of a new age, in which the American people will be able to change things to something else, which is different from how things are now.

Change.

But that's the thing about change. It's always changing, with hope. As long as we, with Barack Obama, can move forward and change things – that's progress. And progress is America.

It's already started to happen in Massachusetts. Just take a look at Question 1. There was a contingent in this state that wanted to go against change and mess with the state income tax. But the state knew what we needed and rejected that bill. Now that's change. And change is America.

Now, these views may be a little bit optimistic, and they may create a minor problem for the president-elect.

With the expectations that Obama has set, anything he could possibly accomplish in office will ultimately be a let-down. Obama has painted a very pretty picture of America, but there are just too many smudges on the current one to create a masterpiece.

The economy is awful and will take years to improve, regardless of how much hope and change we put into it. The War in Iraq roars on even though we've been showering the people with hope and democracy and America. Plus, this administration refuses to bring the Hamburglar to justice.

I digress.

Despite all of this, everyone that listens to Obama speak in public is transfixed by the hope and the sense of change that he exudes. The man literally sweats little droplets of hope. And hope is America.

So if people love listening to you and buy into everything you say, why stop? I mean, as long as people think you're going to change things, it really doesn't make a difference as long as they're happy about it. Obama should just skip his actual presidency and start campaigning again.

Obama's painted a very pretty picture of America, but there are just too many smudges on the current one to create a masterpiece right away.

Why end the dream? As soon as Obama takes office, America is going to be immediately faced with an utter lack of hope and change coming from their TV sets. President Obama is destined to fail to live up to campaign Obama.

When you think about it, Obama is like Christmas. There's nothing like waking up on Inauguration day with a shiny new president. But, in the end, he's nowhere near as good as the commercials make him out to be.

What's the fun in actually leading a country? No matter what you choose to do, you're bound to make some people angry. But if Obama just keeps speaking at rallies and colleges, he can keep that hope and change alive, along with the entire political sphere.

Let's face it: without a campaign going on, interest in politics takes a nosedive. While on the campaign trail, Obama was like the Johnny Appleseed of political interest. He would plant the seeds of hope and change and bring people out to rallies who don't even know what channel CNN is.

People are simply happier when Obama is roaming around the country. As long as he is in the White House, he has to buckle down and fulfill his presidential duties and he can't spread hope or change anything. So why even get settled?

In all honesty, simply not being there can't be much worse than the incumbent he-who-shall-W.-not-be-named. We have three branches in this little government of ours. Let's use them. There's an entire Congress, Supreme Court and a presidential cabinet that could make the same decisions as Obama. Plus, Joe Biden's an old white guy. He doesn't bring the aura of hope of Obama, but fits the contemporary presidential mold perfectly.

Hope and change don't stop for things like policies and decision-making. I suppose Obama could try to use his position of President of the United States to implement some things. But it just doesn't sound as good as when he's on stage talking about it.

The 2012 campaign isn't going to win itself. It's time to be getting a head start on the competition. It's not like Obama will have to change his message against whomever the Republicans trot out there. Hope, the War in Iraq, taxes, healthcare and some more hope sprinkled on top. Plus, what says change like an incumbent president?

Because that's America.

Family values: beyond the ballot box

Eric Magazu

The fact that there wasn't a major political realignment in America during this past election is made manifest in the results of ballot initiatives associated with the integrity of the traditional family and traditional marriage. The results were closer than would have been ideal, but Americans overall voted for the reaffirmation of the ideal of the traditional family. Some may view these results as leaning toward bigotry, but the issues involved are much more foundational.

Those who seek to alter the definition of marriage essentially rest their case on the idea of civil rights. However, there isn't a true civil rights claim here because there are many restrictions on who a person can marry based on other criteria, not just the sex of the intended partner, and these restrictions are applied equally to all members of society.

As seems to be the case with many issues that rest on morality and worldview, what we are really talking about with the discussion of marriage and the family is the way our society ought to be ordered. Should we base our foundational ethics on our personal whims and the fashions of our time, or should our ethics be rooted in certain enduring principles and moral truths?

For those who support the traditional family, ultimately the latter choice overrides all other concerns. It can be argued that the ballot initiatives unfairly singled out homosexual behavior for public ridicule, but the truth is that there is a wide swath of sexual and marital morality deficient in America today.

The truth is that there is a wide swath of sexual and marital morality deficient in America today.

The producers of popular culture have certainly encouraged, and many of us have eagerly adopted, an acceptance of many disordered behaviors. Fornication, that is to say, engaging in a sexual relationship outside of marriage, is seen to be acceptable and pornography is pervasive. These transgressions work against societal order by breaking down the more sanctified environment of the family. We, as a whole people, have given up the things that really matter in exchange for a cheap thrill.

In marriages, we have seen a continuation of this breakdown. Divorce is prevalent, spouses no longer spend any time attempting to preserve a marriage before it is dissolved. The result is that our next generation of children will grow up missing out on the best home environment possible. I'm not arguing against the personal merits of non-traditional family situations, but rather I'm arguing in favor of the most ideal arrangement. Our laws ought to encourage the most ideal and morally rigorous approach. Toward this end, I would have encouraged ballot initiatives making divorce much more difficult.

Secularists have argued that using biblical texts to defend marriage is an unacceptable course of action because of the American ideal of separation of church and state. The Constitution itself does not enshrine such an ideal, but the First Amendment is intended to limit the federal government from intervening in the religious and moral affairs of our individual states.

The idea that religious covenants have no role in our society is untrue. The covenant established by God through Moses at Mount Sinai is specifically given not to individuals, but to an entire nation. This is the nation of Israel, a society that is to be governed not by the whims and injustices of men, but by the perfect laws and statutes of God. This is the same model used by the early settlers that would constitute the new citizenry of the American republic.

Detractors tend to point out the laws of sexual morality that are given in the 18th chapter of the third book of Moses, called Leviticus, and argue that these are outdated and cannot be used as a model for a modern society. Perhaps these laws reflect a very harsh response to the sexual immorality of the nations that surrounded Israel at the time, but these were laws given to man after we had already made several mistakes.

Had man kept to God's more ideal state of purity, we would find that the actual ideal of marriage is not found in Leviticus, but in the 24th verse of the second chapter of the first book of Moses, called Genesis, where we are taught, "Therefore, a man shall leave his father and his mother, and cleave to his wife, and they shall become one flesh." This is the ideal of marriage and the family that we ought to be emulating.

A long-term solution is not for Americans to do battle with each other through ballot initiatives, but to work on restoring the basic nature of our people. The fact that we are debating what should be obvious issues, the idea that marriage is between one man and one woman, shows that we are already travelled far from the ideals of God and our forefathers. What America needs much more than political activism is people that will repair the breeches of discord in our society. The world can use people that want to set things right again. This goal is not far from us if we have the desire and will to see it through.

Civil rights and the march of time

Ben Moriarty

It's been a long time comin', but I know a change is gonna come, oh yes it will.

Sam Cooke, you were right. Tupac, when you said we weren't ready to see a black president, you were wrong.

America has successfully jumped a hurdle that many thought we would never make: electing a black man to our highest office. No matter who you supported in this election, this should be a proud time for us all – unless you're racist.

For many, including myself, we could finally say that we're proud of this country. I apologize for the mandated outrage zealous patriots must express hearing that statement. "Imagine the nerve of this brat, saying he's not proud of America while soldiers are dying for him?" Correctively, there's no doubt there are things to be proud of about our country. As far as I know, everyone can vote now and black people don't have to ride in the back of the bus.

We are really rich compared to the rest of the world, and we have this amazing thing called the American Dream which is only partly affected by the socioeconomic class you're born into.

For many though, this pride and joy was halted by the fact that there was nationwide support for banning gay marriages – occurring in California, Florida and Arizona, despite two of them voting blue this election. Their pain was not offset by the fact that both Massachusetts and California approved propositions that supported animals being treated all nicely and stuff.

The desperation regarding the approval of gay marriage is becoming very apparent in this country. People are crying hate, saying that those who vote against it are homophobic bigots. People are saying that it's a civil rights issue. People are saying marriage is a right.

All of these things are true – to very limited degrees. People who are against gay marriage aren't against it because they hate homosexuals, although there are always some pitiful exceptions. Unless gays can't drink from my water fountain and are going to be unfairly discriminated against in many ways, it's not a civil rights issue. To be honest, making the comparison of what gays are going through now to what blacks went through, not only devalues Obama's victory but also devalues what every single person involved with the Civil Rights Movement in the Sixties went through.

Unless gays can't drink from my water fountain … it's not a civil rights issue.

Really, it's just hyperbole and if it wasn't, you would think that maybe more than 30 percent of blacks would have sympathized with California's proposition. Marrying who you want is not a right, and I know this because I tried to marry my brother. I thought I could kill two birds with one stone, but the Man showed marriage ain't always a right.

I apologize for the mandatory outrage liberals must express to such words. To clarify, none of those things mean that gay marriage shouldn't happen. The reason it won't happen is because it's not meant to happen now and it can't happen right now. Like the Madman from Nietzsche's "The Gay Science," it's come too soon.

In California, 61 percent of people under 30 voted against the ban, in Florida a little over half and Arizona about half. The important characteristic is the trend, where from older to middle-aged to younger, the percentage of those against the ban consistently increased.

Attitudes on gay marriage are influenced more by cultural upbringing than religion. Yes, religion obviously plays a factor, but by looking at young religious people today and seeing the growing support for gay marriage and belief in governmental equality from them, it's not hard to see a dominating decisive factor.

If we've learned anything from American history, it's that America loves to be slow with granting groups of minorities things they want.

It doesn't matter what side you're on. Gay marriage will eventually happen, whether decided from a Supreme Court case or from the fogies dying and our generation taking over. Maybe even from Lance Bass telling us gay marriage is OK.

Aren't you damn proud to be an American? If there's one thing we're good at, it's holding out for as long as possible and ignoring the inevitable. Baby steps. Can't go too fast. One generation at a time, folks.

ARTS & LIVING

Conor Oberst and the Mystic Valley Band performed at the Academy of Music Theater in Northampton this past Thursday with supporting acts Ben Kweller and Rig 1.

Oberst's new material charms Northampton

Indie rock legend exchanges Bright Eyes for new sound

BY IAN NELSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NORTHAMPTON — Itching for some destined political balladry Thursday night, a member of the Northampton Academy of Music audience called out to Conor Oberst: "Play 'When the President Talks to God.'"

"The battle's been won, my friends," Oberst replied. "I don't have to sing that song anymore."

While Oberst did not perform that particular number, or any Bright Eyes tunes for that matter, he did play all but one track from his new self-titled record, as well as a handful of new songs.

Before Oberst's set, openers Rig 1 and Ben Kweller got their respective time to shine, or in the case of Rig 1, time to bore the audience into submission.

The trio consisted of a guitarist, bassist and utter bore of a front-man, struggling to entertain the audience in addition to struggling to pull off any sort of exciting wordplay or flow.

The emcee would surely consider himself a rapper, but one could more accurately describe him as a joke. Strutting halfheartedly around stage, wandering a few steps to the left, a few to the right, he produced a stage presence equal to that of a jar of Vaseline, but not nearly as slick.

As for the music, programmed beats ploddingly thumped behind the guitar and bass parts, creating confusion as to why the instrument portions were played live at all. Not one member of the band made an attempt to do anything onstage aside from nodding their heads in self-satisfaction while the audience nodded off to sleep.

Luckily, Ben Kweller's ultra-positive pep provided refuge from the monotony that was Rig 1.

Kweller's long, curly hair, faux-tuxedo t-shirt and velvety plum suit coat was just a top hat away from accurately resembling Willy Wonka – a 27 year-old-trapped in a 14-year-old's body.

"God, Northampton, I missed you," Kweller admitted.

Each of his songs rocked, ranging from country ruckus to sweet love letter odes. The highlight was his staple "On My Way," the title track from his second proper album, in which the whole band played, creating a wider scope than the single acoustic track found on the record.

Kweller closed with the single from his 2006 self-titled affair, "Penny on the Train Track," the perfect pop song to end a short but sweet set.

Conor Oberst and his Mystic Valley Band finally took the stage a bit after Kweller's conclusion (Oberst referred to Kweller's new record as "super dope"), fittingly segueing into "Sausalito," his side-burns creeping down below his cowboy-esque hat in the hardened vein of Neil Young.

"I'm very happy tonight," Oberst declared at one point.

Completely in his element, he truly seemed to be having fun, even from the get-go. He danced jigs, jested with the audience and deeply connected with his guitar and his band-mates, brothers in the same boat touring around the country.

The Mystic Valley Band knew how to please, playing "Get-Well-Cards" early on, just one of many highlights. This number saw Oberst dancing around his limited space, nimbly showing off what little moves he has.

He followed with "Cape Canaveral," the first track from the new record, a softer, subtler song, and a stark contrast from the previous track's upbeat rock n' roll.

Oberst continued with various other memorable moments including the road song "Moab," and the death-as-lighthearted number "Danny Callahan," supplemented with perfect harmonies by Nik Frietas (described by Oberst as "a very handsome S.O.B.").

Frietas and Taylor Hollingsworth took turns leading the vocal of separate songs, proving Oberst is not the only vocally adept member of the band.

Oberst seemed to appreciate the general admission status of the show, especially how the audience chose to forget the seats and cozy up to the stage, though he was "sorry for the distance" between him and the crowd.

"Rock n' roll sounds better when you stand up," he claimed, and the concert-goers in the theatre couldn't agree more.

The band left the stage for a minute or two, prompting uproar from the audience who begged an encore.

"NYC – Gone, Gone" thrashed about, right into the meaty (in a good way) tones of "Souled Out!!!," with Nate Walcott's keys resembling organs which recalled the vastness of Midwest prairies.

Before leaving the stage again, the Band played "Milk Thistle," the album's hopeful but downtrodden closing track, and "Lenders in the Temple," another slow, emotive ballad type.

The band rejoined Oberst for a Paul Simon cover and "I Don't Want to Die (In the Hospital)," which saw Oberst climbing atop high amps during a slightly extended intro, rocking out the hardest all night.

Oberst's last song, "Breezy" (from his tour-only EP "Gentleman's Pact"), changed the tune from the wanderlust themes of his recent album's offerings to one of near homesickness, a song for an easy-going love, its whimsy expressed in lines about strolling down the boardwalk, "full of beer, tequila, weed and candy" and America's pastime.

"Tried to teach me about baseball," Oberst sang. "My favorite was the part when they make it home."

No matter how much expedition Oberst (or any specimen for that matter) craves, it's never complete without the final stop at home. Perhaps he'll arrive back in his native Nebraska after his final Mexican tour dates at the end of November, ready to recharge and reflect.

Authors lead novel chat

BY RIVKA BARRETT
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

SOUTH HADLEY — Last Thursday evening, esteemed authors Stephen King and Richard Russo discussed the art of writing before a full house in the Chapin Auditorium at Mount Holyoke College.

Hosted by The Odyssey Bookshop and the Food Bank of Western Massachusetts, their conversation was moderated by Joe Donahue, host of "The Roundtable" on WAMC.

That night was also the 45th anniversary of The Odyssey Bookshop, the biggest independent bookstore in Western Massachusetts.

Two small tables and three armchairs were set up in the center of the stage, while a wooden platform and a microphone stood off to the side.

The event opened at 7 p.m., with the Odyssey presenting a hefty check to the Food Bank, amidst laughs and applause.

Soon after, Stephen King and Richard Russo walked onstage with Joe Donahue. The audience's reaction was overwhelming, with a deafening standing ovation King and Russo smiled and waved, waiting several minutes before sitting down.

Donahue started off with a question on the outcome of the recent presidential election. King expressed optimism that Obama would repair diplomatic relations, while Russo commented that Obama brought "a great spirit of hope" to the country.

Donahue also inquired about the authors' respective processes of writing short stories.

King's new collection of short stories, "Just After Sunset," is due for release on Nov. 11, but hard copies were provided for the event by special permission of Simon and Schuster.

Russo is best known for his Pulitzer prize-winning novel, "Empire Falls." He has also written a book of short stories, "The Whore's Child," and edited an essay collection, "A Healing Touch: True Stories of Life, Death, and Hospice," published this past spring.

Russo mentioned that many of the short stories in "The Whore's Child" developed from fragments of incomplete novels.

King and Russo also talked about themes in their writing. King said he puts a twist on everyday situations, even something as ordinary as seeing "two little kids in a hotel corridor."

This reference to "The Shining" elicited knowing laughter from King fans.

Russo denied that his novels on small towns were influenced by his own political views, saying, "I don't want you to think about my views. I want you to think about the story I'm telling you."

Despite the imperfect acoustics and some technical problems with microphones, the conversation was a success all around, raising around $18,565.

King and Russo both had remarkable stage presence and cracked up audience members as they bantered back-and-forth on a variety of topics.

After the event, the authors spent two hours signing books for over 400 audience members.

The Odyssey Bookshop continues to celebrate its 45th anniversary this week, with a children's costume parade and a reading by children's author Holly Hobbie on Saturday. There will be a live remote radio broadcast on "The River" WRSI, and a 45 second shopping spree at the bookstore.

Astronomers believe they have found valid proof of an alien solar system that surrounds the star Epsilon Eridani, which is about 63 trillion miles from Earth.

Evidence uncovered of solar system around nearby star

BY ROBERT S. BOYD
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

WASHINGTON — For the first time, astronomers think that they've found evidence of an alien solar system around a star close enough to Earth to be visible to the naked eye.

They say that at least one and probably three or more planets are orbiting the star Epsilon Eridani, 10.5 light-years – about 63 trillion miles – from Earth. Only eight stars are closer.

The host star, slightly smaller and cooler than our sun, is in the constellation Eridanus – the name of a mythological river – near Orion in the northern sky.

Epsilon Eridani is much younger than the sun, about 850 million years old compared with 4.5 billion years for our system.

"This really is a system like our solar system was when it was five times younger than it is now," said one of the discoverers, Massimo Marengo, an astronomer at the Harvard-Smithsonian Center for Astrophysics in Cambridge. "It's like a time machine for our solar system."

"This system probably looks a lot like ours did when life first took root on Earth," said Dana Backman, of the SETI Institute in Mountain View, Calif., the lead author of a report to be published Jan. 10 in The Astrophysical Journal.

SETI chose Epsilon Eridani as one of the first targets in its long – but so far vain – search for signs of extraterrestrial intelligence in 1960.

The suspected planets are too far away to be detected directly, so their presence has to be inferred by indirect

TV networks take on changes in primetime

BY RICK KUSHMAN
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

While most people were paying attention to that little business of picking a president, our friends in the TV world have been busy.

It starts with Fox, which announced this week that "24" will return on Jan. 11 and 12 – that's a Sunday and Monday – with two hours each night to open the new season and latest rough day for Jack Bauer.

This one will start with the Counter Terrorist Unit dismantled and Jack (Kiefer Sutherland on trial). Then, and I'm thinking this isn't a surprise, there will be a national crisis.

This will all be set up on Nov. 23 with a two-hour TV movie called "24: Redemption" that will have Jack working at a school in Africa where he'll end up battling a ruthless warlord. Have you noticed how trouble seems to follow ol' Jack everywhere?

For what it's worth, producers say they realize the problems that developed in season six, and are making serious changes to keep the show fresh. But they're not changing everything. The "real time," such as it is, will continue. Even the TV movie will take place over two hours, so in that one, at least we can buy into the idea that Jack doesn't eat.

Speaking of big shows that need some revamping, NBC has been at work behind the cameras on "Heroes," once a delightful mix of surprise, action and old-style romantic storytelling. This season, it's twisted itself into a dark, befuddling, unwatchable knot.

NBC dumped producers Jeph Loeb and Jesse Alexander, the guys running the show day to day in a year when "Heroes" continues to lose audience and is averaging under 10.5 million viewers, a drop of more than 20 percent from last season.

Now, according to Daily Variety, creator Tim Kring told the network he will take a more direct hand in simplifying the storytelling, and in getting back to character development and the show's once classic good vs. evil tales.

We hope it will take taking place in just one piece of the time-space continuum, instead of the multiple futures and pasts and general craziness that made Hiro (Masi Oka) going to feudal Japan feel like a simple fairy tale in comparison.

You would think fixing some of the problems would be easy. Part of the charm of "Heroes" in its first season was its comic-book dazzle, endearing characters and swash-buckling stories. Now, if you can even follow them, all the characters are angry, mean or just dull.

Although no one asked, here's some advice: First, make the heroes the people they were in the first season. Next, give us someone to root for, and let them have enough victories or satisfying moments that we don't feel ripped off. Also, let someone smile now and then.

Fans of "Law & Order: Criminal Intent" and Jeff Goldblum – include me in both groups – have to wait until January to see the show's new season and to watch Goldblum take over from Chris Noth in one of the detective teams.

"L & O: CI" had been set to return this week, but USA Network announced it was holding the show back until January, then would run it 16 weeks straight without interruption.

Given USA's success with other crime or semi-crime shows like "Burn Notice" and "In Plain Sight," not to mention it's duo of "Monk" and "Psych," it's likely the cable net will package those shows to run together in the spring.

And now, for in What'd They Do to My Shows action, the TV folks have been busy there, too.

Fox announced that "King of the Hill," now in its 13th season, will end its run sometime in the 2009-10 TV season. Then ABC, which already picked up "Scrubs" after NBC discarded it, is making noise that it might resurrect Hank Hill and his gang, according to the Hollywood trade papers.

Fox also yanked "Til Death" from its schedule with no word about when/if it will return. Probably, it's a goner but the network will burn off the remaining episodes soon.

And staying with Fox, the network renewed "American Dad," meaning the show will have a fifth season in 2009-10.

ABC announced "Samantha Who" will get seven more episodes this season, a slightly unusual move. Most shows start with an order of 13 episodes, then get a "back end" of nine more. "Samantha Who?," which is averaging about 10.7 million viewers in its second season, now will make 20 half-hours.

NBC ordered a full 22 episodes for the rookie comedy "Kath & Kim," despite low ratings – roughly 6.2 million – and bad reviews, yet another sign NBC is struggling. What that network needs is a good hero.

Fox's smash TV drama "24" will return on Jan. 11 following the show's made-for-TV movie, "24: Redemption," which will air on Nov. 23.

SETI finds new solar system

measurements. Their star is so near, however, that some astronomers think that they may be able to see its planets with better telescopes within the next decade.

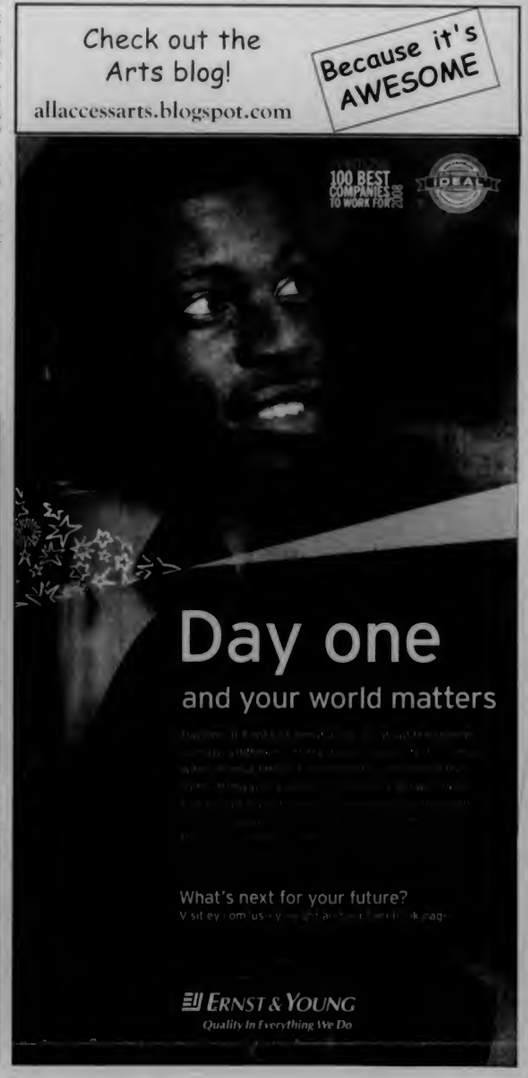
Now Backman's team has deduced the presence of at least two more planets, after space-and ground-based telescopes separately revealed two belts of rocky asteroids and an outer icy ring circling Epsilon Eridani.

The inner asteroid belt is about 260 million miles from its host star, the same distance as our own ring of asteroids orbiting between Mars and Jupiter. The second belt is about the same distance as Uranus is in our system.

Finally, a wide, third ring of icy objects extends billions of miles beyond Epsilon Eridani, resembling the so-called Kuiper Belt of mini-planets outside Pluto.

In 2002, Alice Quillen, an astronomer at the University of Rochester in New York state, reported that unusual clumps of material in the outer ring probably indicated the presence of a Saturn-size planet in a Pluto-like orbit. Her finding hasn't been confirmed, but in an e-mail, Quillen said, "I still think there is a planet out there of this size."

According to Marengo, the gaps between these belts were created when clouds of dust and rocks consolidated into planets, as happened in the early days of our solar system. He likened the process to the formation of Saturn's famous rings, which are separated by spaces cleared out by little moons.



"The easiest way to explain the gaps is to say there are planets there," Marengo said. "It's the same way as the rings of Saturn are kept stable by the moons of Saturn."

"I think these rings are probably telling us about how systems cleared after planets have formed," Quillen said. "It's pretty exciting to catch such a nearby system in this critical stage."

Marengo raised the possibility that more Earthlike planets might exist in the space between Epsilon Eridani and the inner dust ring.

"The inside belt is cleared, like in our solar system," he said. "There could be terrestrial planets inside, but we can't detect them yet."

they adjusted quickly.

"The ball tends to bounce a little bit more," Shea said. "We definitely adapted well."

The steady rain that drenched Philadelphia for the better part of the morning hours cleared up for the 2 p.m. game.

"It was a great day for a game," Parker said. "The turf was nice and wet and it made corners easier."

Both of UMass' goals were off of corners. Shea scored the initial goal in the middle of the first half off a rebound.

"We were scrambling for the net," Shea said, describing the goal. "And [a Richmond player] made it pretty easy for me to hit it in."

The Minutewomen dominated the first half with seven shots on goal – scoring once on Shea's shot.

"This is some of the most consistent passing play hockey all year," Sowry said.

UMass' second goal came in the second half with 21 minutes, 12 seconds to go. Junior forward Cher King scored off a corner pass from sophomore defender Jackie Tait.

"You just send the ball in and trust that someone is going is to be there," Parker said.

Tait was named the A-10 Championship's Most Outstanding Player after the UMass defense had what Shea called "an awesome game."

"They were really organized reading Richmond's press," she said.

The ball spent the majority of the final 15 minutes of the second half in UMass territory. Freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdall was up for the challenge, making two late saves to preserve the shutout.

"Richmond is a good team offensively," Parker said. "They had the potential to give us a lot of trouble."

Richmond coach Gina Lucido was impressed with the Minutewomen.

"UMass is just a very disciplined and well-coached team. I think one of their greatest strengths is that it's really tough to finish on them," she said.

The Minutewomen are set to play Kent State at Garber Field at 1 p.m. on Tuesday for the NCAA tournament play-in game.

Five members of the Minutewomen made it onto the A-10 All Championship Team: Tait, King, sophomore defender Jamie Bourazeris, sophomore midfielder Makaela Potts and sophomore forward Katie Kelly.

Black Bears pile up 296 rushing yards

The defense came out of the locker room sharp as well, coming up with an interception by Jeromy Miles (19 tackles, one interception) that led to another UMass touchdown. The Minutemen tied the game, 14-14 on a 3-yard run by fullback Chriz Zardas.

The Black Bears (7-3, 4-3 CAA) answered back with their only score of the second half on the following drive. Maine drove 73 yards on 12 plays and capped off the drive on a 3-yard touchdown run by Jared Turcotte.

While Maine took 12 plays to take the lead, UMass needed just one play to get back in the end zone. Coen found Jeremy Horne (nine receptions for 141 yards and a touchdown) short on the left side and turned the reception into a 58-yard catch and run that brought the Minutemen within one at 21-20.

"[The kick] hit the upright. I don't know if he just missed it or not, but obviously there was some question whether he was ready for it or not," Brown said.

The extra-point attempt by Cuko went off the right upright and failed to tie the game at 21. The Minutemen still had three attempts in the remaining 11:39 to take the lead against Maine, but instead turned the ball over three times.

After UMass brought the deficit to one, the defense forced Maine to punt. The Minutemen were pinned inside their own 5-yard line, but started to move down the field before Coen threw his second interception of the day.

Coen took the snap and scrambled to his left and threw downfield and was intercepted by Maine's Andrew Downey.

UMass' defense came up big again after the interception, forcing Maine to turn the ball over on four plays, but the offense once again could not capitalize.

On the fifth play of the drive, Coen was intercepted by the Black Bears' Lamir Whetstone giving Maine the ball back with 1:37 left.

With just 11 seconds remaining, Maine coach Jack Cosgrove called an ill-advised timeout that allowed the Minutemen a chance to get the ball back.

"I'm still upset with myself about it. A minute thirty-seven seconds is left on the clock and with the forty second [play] clock rule; I didn't pay attention to it as sternly as I should have," Cosgrove said.

Maine tried to run the final 7 seconds off of the clock on fourth down, but when the clock failed to start with the play, the Minutemen were given the ball with 2 seconds on the clock on their own 48-yard line.

Coen took one shot down field but came up with the same result as the previous two drives; Coen was intercepted for the third time in the final 11:39 of the game, this time by Maine's Norman Smith at the 5-yard line.

"It was very frustrating to not play as well as you want to, to kind of hurt your team more than to help them," Coen said.

No playoffs in '08, but UMass seniors should still be proud

it was very frustrating to not play as well as you want to – and kind of hurt your team more than you helped them."

That isn't something you can say about Coen very often. The four-year starting quarterback has all the numbers, accolades and accomplishments that a coach could ask for. And his leadership qualities and character off the field are strong, as well.

Coen had a chance to be the hero with 2 seconds remaining in the game. With the ball nearly at midfield, Coen launched a hail mary toward the end zone.

"I saw a lot of [UMass] jerseys. Shoot, a lot of teams have seen like that this season," Coen said, describing the play which ended in his fourth interception of the day. "You hope, hope, hope, but we shouldn't have been in that situation to begin with."

As the pass landed in Norman Smith's hands, the game – but more importantly, UMass' postseason hopes – ended. But safety Jerrell Miles (19 tackles, interception) and the Minutemen are the type to just fold the end of the season.

We want to win two more meaningful games. It's definitely a pride thing, too. Nobody wants to just let the season go and not fight for it," Miles said. "These next two games are must-win, because our pride is on the line."

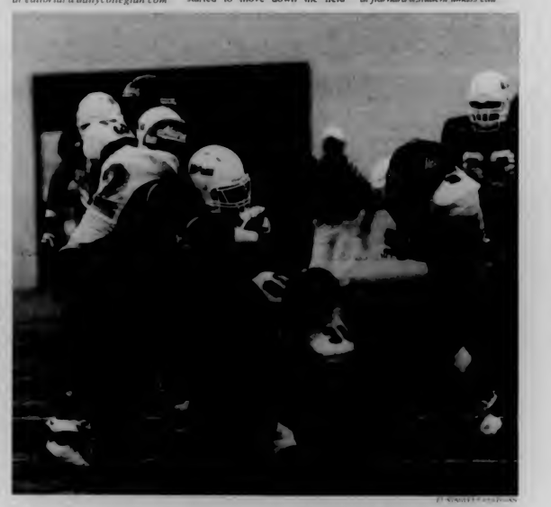
Coen's legacy, and the accomplishments of Smalls, Calicchio and Robinson are not on the line these next two Saturday's. Win or lose, those four UMass stars and the entire senior class should feel proud of what they've accomplished.

Even with a down season, this senior class is a combined 36-13, including a 24-6 mark in the conference (Atlantic 10 in 2005-06, Colonial Athletic Association in 2007-08). They have two playoff berths, a national title appearance and have been ranked in the Top 25 for 53 weeks in a row. That's pretty special.

Coen, who leads all active quarterbacks in the Football Championship Subdivision with 87 career touchdown passes, is 35-8 against FCS opponents in his four years as the starter.

Calicchio, Coen's good friend, roommate and protector on the offensive line, doesn't get the same amount of attention as his buddy, but has also had quite the career.

The senior captain on the offensive line was a 2008 Preseason All-Conference selection and has excelled at nearly every position on the offensive line. Anytime someone seems to go down, Calicchio willingly shifts positions and dominates the line of scrimmage. No matter where he's playing, Coen never seems to get sacked.



On the defensive side, Smalls and Robinson have been locking down wide receivers for years. Easily the best 1-2 cornerback combination in the FCS, the two have almost too many accolades to list.

Statistically, they don't have too many interceptions to list – but that's because opposing quarterbacks don't dare throw in their respective directions. Robinson has also contributed offensively in the return game, ranking highly in the UMass record books. He started last season with a 100-yard kickoff return touchdown in the season-opening win over Holy Cross.

This group of seniors has two more games left in their terrific careers. None of them could have envisioned that their final season would end this way, but the three years before that were pretty darned good.

An extra point a few too many inches to the right doesn't change that.

84 yards and a touchdown on 13 pass attempts. Session gained 76 yards on 16 carries and tallied a career high rushed for 74 yards on 9 carries and scored one touchdown. Brown averaged 8.7 yards per carry. Brown rushed only six times but for 52 yards.

Brusko rushed 14 times for 31 yards, usually on designed quarterback draws and others on scrambles when the quarterback was pressured.

Usually a team uses the run to set up play actions and passing plays, but that wasn't the case until the end of the third quarter and the beginning of the fourth. Brusko only passed seven times completing five attempts, but was on target to his receivers Kenneth Fersner, Landis Williams and Turcotte when it mattered.

With the game tied at 14, Brusko used the play action to help move the Black Bears down the field in the fourth quarter, leading them to their only second half score – a three yard touchdown run by Turcotte.

"He [Brusko] made a couple of big pass plays," UMass coach Don Brown said. "I thought we were all over it, so you have to give credit to him."

Despite the difference in time of possession the Minutemen played much better in the second half. UMass adjusted to the wide variety of packages the Black Bears used, slowed down the run and gave the offense a chance to gain the lead.

"I thought we did a good job of that in the second half," Brown said of his team's adjustments. "We gave ourselves a chance, and that's all you can ask. We had a chance to move [the ball] and to get it done, but we didn't. That's that."

Arikian, Simmons help UM claim regular season crown

"I don't know if you guys noticed but we have an invisible force field in front the goal," Koch joked. "[Corner kicks] are hard to stop. I don't want to give up 22 corner kicks, that's not our game plan. But, we defended well and we have a good group that defends the front of the goal and we were able [to stop them]."

Friday's game against the Billikens was a double overtime thriller that came down to the final minute after nearly ending in heartbreak. Mark DeSantis scored the game-winning goal with 1 minute, 16 seconds remaining in double overtime after the Minutemen allowed a game-tying goal by the Billikens with 12 seconds left in regulation.

"[It's tough] having to go back on the field against any team with 12 seconds left when they score," DeSantis said. "I felt like we deserved the win today, but it's good that we fought back and it shows a lot about this team."

The Minutemen struck first when Arikian lofted a corner kick to the far post that freshman defender Andrew Henshaw headed into the net. It was Henshaw's first career goal and gave the Minutemen a 1-0 lead with 14 minutes left in the first half.

It appeared that lead would hold up after neither team could score over the next 57 minutes, but a late foul gave the Billikens a free kick with 24 seconds remaining, and Billiken forward Jimmy Holmes slipped the ball into the net to tie the game with 12 seconds left.

DeSantis' winning goal in the second overtime was set up when midfielder Ben Arikian dribbled the ball into the offensive zone and threaded a pass to midfielder Stuart Amick, who was charging to the left post of the goal. Amick got a shot off from 10 feet away that SLU goalkeeper Pat Disbennett managed to deflect, but DeSantis was there to kick home the rebound.

"The goalie made a great save, and I was just lucky enough to be there, so I got to thank my teammates for that [goal]," DeSantis said.

The Minutemen will play in the A-10 tournament this Friday. They have the No. 1 seed and will receive a bye in the first round. The Minutemen could play either No. 4 Saint Louis, No. 5 Fordham or No. 6 Rhode Island.

Third-seeded Dayton takes on URI, and Fordham plays SLU. Temple earned the No. 2 seed and the other first-round bye in the quarterfinals.

they adjusted quickly.

"The ball tends to bounce a little bit more," Shea said. "We definitely adapted well."

The steady rain that drenched Philadelphia for the better part of the morning hours cleared up for the 2 p.m. game.

"It was a great day for a game," Parker said. "The turf was nice and wet and it made corners easier."

Both of UMass' goals were off of corners. Shea scored the initial goal in the middle of the first half off a rebound.

"We were scrambling for the net," Shea said, describing the goal. "And [a Richmond player] made it pretty easy for me to hit it in."

The Minutewomen dominated the first half with seven shots on goal – scoring once on Shea's shot.

"This is some of the most consistent passing play hockey all year," Sowry said.

UMass' second goal came in the second half with 21 minutes, 12 seconds to go. Junior forward Cher King scored off a corner pass from sophomore defender Jackie Tait.

"You just send the ball in and trust that someone is going is to be there," Parker said.

Tait was named the A-10 Championship's Most Outstanding Player after the UMass defense had what Shea called "an awesome game."

"They were really organized reading Richmond's press," she said.

The ball spent the majority of the final 15 minutes of the second half in UMass territory. Freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdall was up for the challenge, making two late saves to preserve the shutout.

"Richmond is a good team offensively," Parker said. "They had the potential to give us a lot of trouble."

Richmond coach Gina Lucido was impressed with the Minutewomen.

"UMass is just a very disciplined and well-coached team. I think one of their greatest strengths is that it's really tough to finish on them," she said.

The Minutewomen are set to play Kent State at Garber Field at 1 p.m. on Tuesday for the NCAA tournament play-in game.

Five members of the Minutewomen made it onto the A-10 All Championship Team: Tait, King, sophomore defender Jamie Bourazeris, sophomore midfielder Makaela Potts and sophomore forward Katie Kelly.

Black Bears pile up 296 rushing yards

The defense came out of the locker room sharp as well, coming up with an interception by Jeromy Miles (19 tackles, one interception) that led to another UMass touchdown. The Minutemen tied the game, 14-14 on a 3-yard run by fullback Chriz Zardas.

The Black Bears (7-3, 4-3 CAA) answered back with their only score of the second half on the following drive. Maine drove 73 yards on 12 plays and capped off the drive on a 3-yard touchdown run by Jared Turcotte.

While Maine took 12 plays to take the lead, UMass needed just one play to get back in the end zone. Coen found Jeremy Horne (nine receptions for 141 yards and a touchdown) short on the left side and turned the reception into a 58-yard catch and run that brought the Minutemen within one at 21-20.

"[The kick] hit the upright. I don't know if he just missed it or not, but obviously there was some question whether he was ready for it or not," Brown said.

The extra-point attempt by Cuko went off the right upright and failed to tie the game at 21. The Minutemen still had three attempts in the remaining 11:39 to take the lead against Maine, but instead turned the ball over three times.

After UMass brought the deficit to one, the defense forced Maine to punt. The Minutemen were pinned inside their own 5-yard line, but started to move down the field before Coen threw his second interception of the day.

Coen took the snap and scrambled to his left and threw downfield and was intercepted by Maine's Andrew Downey.

UMass' defense came up big again after the interception, forcing Maine to turn the ball over on four plays, but the offense once again could not capitalize.

On the fifth play of the drive, Coen was intercepted by the Black Bears' Lamir Whetstone giving Maine the ball back with 1:37 left.

With just 11 seconds remaining, Maine coach Jack Cosgrove called an ill-advised timeout that allowed the Minutemen a chance to get the ball back.

"I'm still upset with myself about it. A minute thirty-seven seconds is left on the clock and with the forty second [play] clock rule; I didn't pay attention to it as sternly as I should have," Cosgrove said.

Maine tried to run the final 7 seconds off of the clock on fourth down, but when the clock failed to start with the play, the Minutemen were given the ball with 2 seconds on the clock on their own 48-yard line.

Coen took one shot down field but came up with the same result as the previous two drives; Coen was intercepted for the third time in the final 11:39 of the game, this time by Maine's Norman Smith at the 5-yard line.

"It was very frustrating to not play as well as you want to, to kind of hurt your team more than to help them," Coen said.

No playoffs in '08, but UMass seniors should still be proud

It was very frustrating to not play as well as you want to – and kind of hurt your team more than you helped them."

That isn't something you can say about Coen very often. The four-year starting quarterback has all the numbers, accolades and accomplishments that a coach could ask for. And his leadership qualities and character off the field are strong, as well.

Coen had a chance to be the hero with 2 seconds remaining in the game. With the ball nearly at midfield, Coen launched a hail mary toward the end zone.

"It was a lot of [UMass] jerseys. Shoot, a lot of teams have finishes like this this season," Coen said, describing the play which ended as his fourth interception of the day. "You hope, hope, hope, but we shouldn't have been in that situation to begin with."

As the pass landed in Norman Smith's hands, the game – but most importantly, UMass' post-season hopes – ended. But safety Jeromy Miles (19 tackles, interception) and the Minutemen are not a team to just fold the end of the season.

We might to win two more football games. It's definitely a pride thing, too. Nobody wants to just let the season go and not fight for it," Miles said. "These next two games are must-win, because our pride is on the line."

Coen's legacy, and the accomplishments of Smalls, Calicchio and Robinson are not on the line these next two Saturday's. Win or lose, those four UMass stars and the entire senior class should feel proud of what they've accomplished.

Even with a down season, this senior class is a combined 36-13, including a 24-6 mark in the conference (Atlantic 10 in 2005-06, Colonial Athletic Association in 2007-08). They have two playoff berths, a national title appearance and have been ranked in the Top 25 for 53 weeks in a row. That's pretty special.

Coen, who leads all active quarterbacks in the Football Championship Subdivision with 87 career touchdown passes, is 35-8 against FCS opponents in his four years as the starter.

Calicchio, Coen's good friend, roommate and protector on the offensive line, doesn't get the same amount of attention as his buddy, but has also had quite the career.

The senior captain on the offensive line was a 2008 Preseason All-Conference selection and has excelled at nearly every position on the offensive line. Anytime someone seems to go down, Calicchio willingly shifts positions and dominates the line of scrimmage. No matter where he's playing, Coen never seems to get sacked.

On the defensive side, Smalls and Robinson have been locking down wide receivers for years. Easily the best 1-2 cornerback combination in the FCS, the two have almost too many accolades to list.

Statistically, they don't have too many interceptions to list – but that's because opposing quarterbacks don't dare throw in their respective directions. Robinson has also contributed offensively in the return game, ranking highly in the UMass record books. He started last season with a 100-yard kickoff return touchdown in the season-opening win over Holy Cross.

This group of seniors has two more games left in their terrific careers. None of them could have envisioned that their final season would end this way, but the three years before that were pretty darned good.

An extra point a few too many inches to the right doesn't change that.

84 yards and a touchdown on 13 passing attempts. Session gained 76 yards on 16 carries and tallied a score. Hamlin rushed for 74 yards on 19 carries and scored one touchdown. Brown averaged 8.7 yards per carry. Brown rushed only six times but for 52 yards.

Brusko rushed 14 times for 31 yards, usually on designed quarterback draws and others on scrambles when the quarterback was pressured.

Usually a team uses the run to set up play actions and passing plays, but that wasn't the case until the end of the third quarter and the beginning of the fourth. Brusko only passed seven times completing five attempts, but was on target to his receivers Kenneth Fersner, Landis Williams and Turcotte when it mattered.

With the game tied at 14, Brusko used the play action to help move the Black Bears down the field in the fourth quarter, leading them to their only second half score – a three yard touchdown run by Turcotte.

"He [Brusko] made a couple of big pass plays," UMass coach Don Brown said. "I thought we were all over it, so you have to give credit to him."

Despite the difference in time of possession the Minutemen played much better in the second half. UMass adjusted to the wide variety of packages the Black Bears used, slowed down the run and gave the offense a chance to gain the lead.

"I thought we did a good job of that in the second half," Brown said of his team's adjustments. "We gave ourselves a chance, and that's all you can ask. We had a chance to move [the ball] and to get it done, but we didn't. That's that."

Arikian, Simmons help UM claim regular season crown

"I don't know if you guys noticed but we have an invisible force field in front the goal," Koch joked. "[Corner kicks] are hard to stop. I don't want to give up 22 corner kicks, that's not our game plan. But, we defended well and we have a good group that defends the front of the goal and we were able [to stop them]."

Friday's game against the Billikens was a double overtime thriller that came down to the final minute after nearly ending in heartbreak. Mark DeSantis scored the game-winning goal with 1 minute, 16 seconds remaining in double overtime after the Minutemen allowed a game-tying goal by the Billikens with 12 seconds left in regulation.

"[It's tough] having to go back on the field against any team with 12 seconds left when they score," DeSantis said. "I felt like we deserved the win today, but it's good that we fought back and it shows a lot about this team."

The Minutemen struck first when Arikian lofted a corner kick to the far post that freshman defender Andrew Henshaw headed into the net. It was Henshaw's first career goal and gave the Minutemen a 1-0 lead with 14 minutes left in the first half.

It appeared that lead would hold up after neither team could score over the next 57 minutes, but a late foul gave the Billikens a free kick with 24 seconds remaining, and Billiken forward Jimmy Holmes slipped the ball into the net to tie the game with 12 seconds left.

DeSantis' winning goal in the second overtime was set up when midfielder Ben Arikian dribbled the ball into the offensive zone and threaded a pass to midfielder Stuart Amick, who was charging to the left post of the goal. Amick got a shot off from 10 feet away that SLU goalkeeper Pat Disbennett managed to deflect, but DeSantis was there to kick home the rebound.

"The goalie made a great save, and I was just lucky enough to be there, so I got to thank my teammates for that [goal]," DeSantis said.

The Minutemen will play in the A-10 tournament this Friday. They have the No. 1 seed and will receive a bye in the first round. The Minutemen could play either No. 4 Saint Louis, No. 5 Fordham or No. 6 Rhode Island.

Third-seeded Dayton takes on URI, and Fordham plays SLU. Temple earned the No. 2 seed and the other first-round bye in the quarterfinals.

No point after, no playoffs

Missed PAT attempt dooms Minutemen

By JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The extra-point attempt is rarely more than an afterthought, but when the Massachusetts football team hosts Maine, it never seems to be.

The last three times that the two teams have met in Amherst, it was a missed extra point that decided the game. This weekend, however, was the first time the point-after try went in the favor of the Black Bears, who defeated the Minutemen, 21-20.

With the loss, the Minutemen's playoff hopes appear to be over.

Two years ago, Maine missed an extra point with 1 minute, 44 seconds left to give UMass the 10-9 victory, and in 2004 the Minutemen blocked the extra point in overtime to come out on top 35-34. This time with 11:39 remaining in regulation, UMass kicker Armando Cuko missed the kick (he was 38-for-38 prior to the miss) that was the difference in the game.

After a first half where the No. 13 Minutemen (6-4, 3-3 Colonial Athletic Association) were shut out, UMass responded in the second half. Senior quarterback Liam Coen (15-of-33 for 200 yards, two touchdowns and four interceptions) led the offense on an 81-yard drive to open the second half and bring the Minutemen within a touchdown at 14-7.

"I thought we did nothing with the first 30 minutes," UMass coach Don Brown said. "[We were] very unsettled, didn't play well, but showed our true colors in the second half."

See FOOTBALL on page 6

Maine running back Jhamal Fluellen is brought down by two UMass defenders in Saturday's 21-20 loss for the Minutemen. The Black Bears rushed for 296 yards, keeping the UMass defense on the field constantly.

Black Bears run all over defense in victory

By RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

They knew it was coming and they still couldn't stop it.

The No. 13 Massachusetts football team allowed 296 rushing yards on 63 attempts in Saturday's 21-20 loss to Maine.

The Black Bears found what worked and stuck to it, over and over again. Using an array of running backs and even their quarterback Michael Brusko, Maine ate up the clock, keeping Liam Coen and the Minutemen offense off the field for a great majority of the game.

Maine's offense was racking up yards on the field for 40 minutes, 8 seconds. The fourth quarter was completely dominating for the Black Bears, as they controlled the ball for 12:28. The Minutemen (6-4, 3-3 Colonial Athletic Association) handled the ball for only 2:32.

"When they had the ball for that long, I just felt like that kind of killed the game," UMass cornerback Jeromy Miles said.

Miles led both teams with 19 tackles. Miles played up near the linebackers for a good portion of the game in an attempt to try and slow down the Maine running game.

Tailbacks Derek Session, Pushaun Brown, Jared Turcotte and Jhamal Fluellen led the Black Bears to victory.

The Maine running backs consistently made the UMass tacklers miss, breaking tackles frequently. The company of tailbacks juked, sprinted and fought their way through a flurry of UMass defenders. All of them, with the exception of the quarterback, averaged more than 4.5 yards per carry on the day.

Turcotte led the Black Bears (7-3, 4-2 CAA) with

Seniors still quite a class

Eli Rosenswaike

In some ways Armando Cuko's missed extra point defined the 2008 season for the Massachusetts football team.

At the very least, the failed PAT certainly ended it.

Simply put, the Minutemen can't make the playoffs now. Too many losses (four), not enough wins against quality opponents (zero) and way too many teams in their conference (six) with substantially better playoff resumes.

UMass had an extremely difficult schedule, there's no doubt about it. But no playoff berth for a team ranked No. 5 in the preseason and with so much recent success is extremely disappointing.

The missed extra point in the one-point loss was the defining moment against Maine Saturday. But a missed kick and a disappointing season doesn't come close to defining the careers of seniors like Liam Coen, Sean Calicchio, Sean Smalls and Courtney Robinson.

Throwing four interceptions in a one-point loss – on his birthday, no less – left Coen pretty demoralized after the game.

"I'm pretty ticked. Like [UMass coach Don Brown] said, we wasted the first half – we absolutely wasted it," Coen said. "I thought we played tough in the second half, but individually

See ROSENSWAIKE on page 6

UMass senior quarterback Liam Coen takes a snap against Richmond in a game earlier this season. Coen, along with senior center Sean Calicchio (No. 63) won't make the playoffs this season, but that doesn't take anything away from what they accomplished in their respective UMass careers.

Behind a combination of stifling defense and opportunistic offense, the Massachusetts men's soccer team gave its departing seniors the best gift they could ask for – an Atlantic 10 title.

The Minutemen (9-6-2, 7-1-1 A-10) clinched their first A-10 regular season title since 2002 with a 1-0 win over Charlotte on Senior Day Sunday afternoon. UMass earned the opportunity to play for the championship with a 2-1 victory over No. 10 Saint Louis in double overtime Friday before clinching the conference yesterday.

Ben Arikian scored the winning goal against Charlotte Saturday, leading the Minutemen to their first A-10 regular season title since 2002.

After losing its conference opener to Rhode Island, UMass went on an eight-game unbeaten streak, including a six-game winning streak on their way to the championship.

"When we played at Rhode Island, we played well but we just didn't get the result," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "We knew that even though things didn't go our way that we weren't a bad team."

On a day meant to honor the seniors, it was a sophomore who made the difference. Sophomore midfielder Ben Arikian scored the game-winning goal Sunday against Charlotte and assisted on both goals in UMass' win against the Billikens Friday.

It was not an easy weekend for Arikian. Charlotte focused all of its energy trying to contain him and he was knocked around throughout the game. He had to leave the game briefly when he was elbowed in the head with 2 minutes remaining in the first half.

Arikian would not let the hit go unpunished. He returned in the second half and scored on a header in the 48th minute to give UMass a 1-0 lead it would never surrender.

"He's a big part of our team. The way he goes, we go," Koch said. "He played really well on Friday and really well [Sunday], when he does that we are not going to lose."

UMass' defense, led by senior Chris Brown, was outstanding against Charlotte. The 49ers did not register a shot on goal until the 65th minute and finished with three shots on goal total.

The most impressive aspect of the defense was its ability to stop teams from scoring on corner kicks this weekend. The Minutemen allowed 22 corner kicks this weekend (13 for SLU, nine for Charlotte), but neither team converted those chances into goals.

Warriors suffocate Mass Attack in win

NORTH ANDOVER – Looking to vindicate last weekend's 14-goal output, the Massachusetts hockey team entered Saturday's game against Merrimack with high offensive confidence and expectations.

But the Warriors rode a strong goaltending performance from Andrew Braithwaite (34 saves) and played exceptional transition hockey to defeat the Minutemen, 3-1, Saturday night at Lawler Arena.

The Maroon and White (4-2-1, 2-1-1 Hockey East) seemingly had its best chance to tie the score during the final 3 minutes, as two Merrimack (3-4-1, 1-3-0 Hockey East) penalties gave UMass a 5-on-3 advantage. But the Minutemen failed to create quality scoring chances on that opportunity – just as they had the previous 57 minutes.

"I thought our effort was pretty good and our execution a little off," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "But I thought that our discipline was horrendous and that speaks to the end result."

The Minutemen committed six penalties over the first two periods. But the team neutralized the Warrior power play to extend its streak of successful kills to 25 attempts over the past five games.

However, that unusual reliance on special teams conflicted with the team's ability to establish an offensive rhythm.

We spent far too much time killing penalties," Cahoon said. "It disrupts your offense and continuity of line changes. It also fatigues the most important people in the lineup."

Freshman defenseman Matt Irwin made his debut for the Minutemen Saturday night, paired on the third unit with Michael Marcou. Irwin found himself on the ice during the team's 5-on-3 power play at the left point across from veteran blueliner Justin Braun.

"We know what kind of a player he is going to be," Cahoon said of Irwin. "We had used [Martin Nolet] in that situation previous to that, but we thought that maybe just a little bit of different look would help us. Hopefully it was an experience that will help [Irwin] the next time around."

Though that unit cycled the puck well during the 5-on-3, it failed to create a quality scoring chance and only put two shots on net.

The best chance during the last 3 minutes came after the penalties expired, when winger Chris Davis skated past two defenders through the right slot and deked Braithwaite. But Davis' backhand shot grazed the crossbar and fell harmlessly behind the net.

Forward Rob Ricci broke a 1-1 tie in the second period when he collected a failed clear attempt in the UMass zone and launched a wrist shot that slipped just below goaltender Paul Dainton's glove.

Brian Keane scored the lone UMass goal.

Obama eyes former UM prof.

FDIC Chair Bair speculated as one of top picks for Treasury Secretary

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A former University of Massachusetts professor is a dark-horse candidate for President-elect Barack Obama's Treasury secretary, according to news sources such as The Politico and Bloomberg.com.

Sheila Bair taught financial regulatory policy at the UMass Isenberg School of Management (ISOM) before going on leave after being appointed chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. (FDIC) by President Bush in 2006.

Bair, a self-described moderate Republican, was named the second most powerful woman in the world by Forbes magazine this year, behind Chancellor of Germany Angela Merkel, and has proven to hold strong pro-regulation views in regards to the banking industry.

She has worked with the White House to combat foreclosures and has been praised by Democrats and Republicans alike for her seizure of IndyMac, a debt-ridden federally insured mortgage lender now run by the FDIC, and for selling off pieces of Washington Mutual (WaMu) and Wachovia after the two banks nearly collapsed.

"I believe in capitalism and markets. But in free-for-all markets, capitalism doesn't always work," Blair told an audience in February when she came to campus to speak on the current mortgage crisis, according to The Springfield Republican.

Thomas O'Brien, a professor and former dean of ISOM, became interested in hiring Bair when he learned that she was moving to Amherst to work for the UMass Center for Public Policy and Administration. She had just left her job as assistant secretary for financial institutions at the U.S. Department of the Treasury.

When Janet Rifkin, the dean of the UMass College of Social and Behavioral Sciences, which governs the CPPA, decided there was not enough money to support Bair, O'Brien recruited her to ISOM.

"I thought somebody with her background would be a terrific complement to the work we were already doing, we have a very strong financial group," said O'Brien, who teamed up with Bair to teach a course on corporate governance.

O'Brien said he first became aware of Bair's consideration for Treasury secretary after seeing her appear on TV repeatedly in the wake of the nation's current financial crisis.

O'Brien said he heard Sen. Christopher Dodd (D-Conn.), the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, say that he thought Bair would make a good secretary.

O'Brien then learned that Warren Buffet, the CEO and largest shareholder of Berkshire Hathaway and one of the richest investors in the world, said the same thing.

"I think she's got the kind of experience and skills that make her a standout [candidate]," said O'Brien. "She's very well respected on both sides of the aisle. She's an excellent listener and she's a very astute Washington observer."

However, critics say Bair has been inconsistent in her regulation, crushing creditors at WaMu but spared them at Wachovia.

Others say she mismanaged negotiations with Wachovia by paring it with Citibank until Wells Fargo came in with a higher offer at the last minute.

Former ISOM professor Sheila C. Bair may serve as Treasury secretary for the president-elect.

Bair could not be reached for comment yesterday.

She has been the senior vice president for government relations for the New York Stock Exchange, the commissioner and acting chairman for the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the counsel to then-Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole (R-Kan.) and is a bar-certified lawyer.

According to Politico.com, other top candidates for the job are Larry Summers, former President Clinton's last treasury secretary; Timothy Geithner, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York; Paul Volcker, former Federal Reserve chairman, and Robert Rubin, an Obama campaign adviser who served as Treasury secretary during Clinton's first and second terms.

Springfield allies with University

BY KIMYA HEDAYAT-ZADEH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Springfield Mayor Domenic J. Sarno and University of Massachusetts Chancellor Robert C. Holub signed a "Memorandum of Understanding" to mark a new partnership between UMass and the Greater Springfield area.

The partnership, announced on November 7th in downtown Springfield, intends to boost Springfield's economy by forming environmentally friendly industries, supporting the city's arts economy and expanding UMass' involvement with "relevant teaching and outreach initiatives," according to a statement from Springfield City Hall.

Specifically, UMass will contribute research on energy conservation, Green fuels production and other University developments in conjunction with the city's existing industrial center.

This will include an "assessment of research programs at UMass that can be dedicated to creating jobs in green technology and clean, renewable energy with the long-term goal of making the city a center for green industries," the statement said.

Mayor Sarno spoke of the advantages of partnering with UMass.

"Bringing [UMass] in on research and development ... means that you're going to have to create a plug," said Sarno. "And when you're creating a plug, that means that you're going to be creating jobs, and that's what drives the economy. There's a phenomena going on right now in the nation: empty-nesters and baby-boomers are downsizing, and they like to go to urban centers, urban areas that are clean and safe."

An evaluation will also be made of the city's and UMass' ability to support "the creative economy driven by performance arts" in downtown Springfield, the statement said.

The partnership also intends to create progress in Springfield's workforce development, public health and education.

"We view this as a collaboration that will benefit all concerned," said UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski. "Broadening our efforts may help us, for example, build new connections to recruit students and potentially identify ways to help translate research into products and jobs. Such success would help us fulfill our land-grant mission to serve the citizens of the commonwealth."

Funds supporting the partnership total more than $320,000, with funds from Springfield, UMass and a $150,000 grant from the Economic Development Administration of the U.S. Department of Commerce.

"Such grant applications are competitive, and the University and city made a convincing case that such a project holds the potential to yield notable results in revitalizing Springfield," said Blaguszewski.

"By combining the efforts of the University's faculty with the time-tested ingenuity of the people of this great city, we ... celebrate the possibilities of this partnership and the opportunity to harness the creation of new knowledge and bring it to our global society for the betterment of all," Holub said.

Green comes to town

Building materials conference held at UMass

BY ANGELA HILSMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Green movement is engulfing the world, and recently hit close to home. Last Monday and Tuesday, the "Green Building Materials '08" conference was held in the UMass Amherst Campus Center, and ended with a tour at Cowls Lumber in North Amherst.

During the conference, Scot Horst, chair of the Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design (LEED), took the stage and addressed the importance of "thinking creatively" to further reduce any damage to the environment.

David Damery, associate professor and director of the UMass Building Materials and Wood Technology Program, discussed the upcoming courses, workshops, seminars and degree programs to be offered at the University, all of which concentrate on Green Building.

The conference also included other speakers' new classifications of Green building and a viewing of the Forest Stewardship Council forest management practices.

Green awareness has improved as more than 80 percent of the total U.S. adult population shows some type of Green motivation, according to new research by the Natural Marketing Institute.

Awareness is on the rise, but "what we don't have now is a ready supply chain that can deliver Green building materials from [a] certified forest, for the Green home," said Damery.

He felt the conference was effective for those attending.

"The speakers at the conference did a great job and provided a diverse set of perspectives on the green building problem," Damery said.

Although the attendance at the conference was lower than Damery hoped for, during the conference some attendees provided positive feedback.

Several said they left more educated and more motivated to do their part for the environment.

"The speakers at the conference did a great job and provided a diverse set of perspectives on the Green building problem," said Damery.

Throughout all the Green hustle and bustle, UMass has been trying to educate students.

"Our most popular Green building class over the past 15 years has been our Energy Efficient Housing class, with an average enrollment of almost 60 students with close to 1,000 graduates over that time span," said Damery.

Renewed interest in energy efficiency and sustainable design has sparked the creation of a new Professional Masters Degree option in green building, a new faculty hire, five new courses on topics from sustainable design to green construction, and thoughts of a future online certificate program in green building at the University, Damery said.

He said many graduates go directly into Home Energy Technician or Home Energy Specialist careers with firms such as the Conservation Services Group.

The new Professional Masters Degree in Green Building has grabbed a lot of attention from students. According to Damery, it is expected to grow quickly, and there will be a great demand for graduates from many different business segments.

University Press publishes biography of photo legend

COURTESY UMASS PRESS

Patricia Fanning's book chronicles photographer F. Holland Day's life.

BY DINAH GORELIK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Press recently published Patricia J. Fanning's newest biography, "Through an Uncommon Lens," which chronicles the life of legendary photographer F. Holland Day from his creation of a publishing firm to his impact on pictorial photography.

The book takes the reader to Day's founding of a publishing company, Copeland and Day, which published novels such as Oscar Wilde and Stephen Crane.

His talent for capturing an image was controversial at times. Blacks, children, and allegorical subjects such as the crucifixion of Jesus were Day's prime muses in his goal to turn photography into a "fine art."

After living most of his life in Boston, Day spent his last years in Norwood, where his home was turned into the Norwood Historical Society. However, his legacy did not end.

It took Fanning several years to complete the research for the biography because most of the archives and photography was located at the Library of Congress in Washington D.C, the National Media Museum in England and at the Metropolitan Museum in N.Y.

Since Fanning is an associate professor of sociology at Bridgewater State College and curator of the Day Collection at the Norwood Historical Society, the research was primarily conducted during her breaks.

Growing up in the same town as Day, Fanning toured his house as a child, joined the Norwood Historical Society and became a volunteer there.

After assisting a number of researchers in their work in the Day archives, Fanning said she became fascinated with Day, his talents, lifestyle and multi-faceted personality.

"I worked on a few shorter pieces about him and then, following a symposium on his life and work which I organized in 1997, I decided to write a biography," Fanning said.

When asked what she hopes readers will take away from the work, she said, "I think I'd like readers to understand what a multi-faceted man he was: publisher, photographer, local historian, collector and philanthropist, a gifted artist. But also, what a fine man he was, sincere, kind, an excellent friend and a mentor to many young people."

Fanning includes unavailable archival materials and more than a hundred photographs throughout the book.

The biography of F. Holland Day encompasses not only the history of his photography, but also the history of New England, Massachusetts, literature and art.

The Obama family is seaching for a hypoallergenic First Dog to accompany them in the White House. Barack Obama described his family's decision as a "major issue" right now in their household.

Experts say all dogs carry at least some allergens

BY STACY ST. CLAIR
(MCT)

CHICAGO — The Obamas' quest for the future First Dog has left some allergists howling.

Medical experts contend media reports of the family's desire to adopt a dog that won't trigger 10-year-old Malia Obama's allergies has left the public with the wrong impression of hypoallergenic pets. While some pooches may be less aggravating to Malia, all canines have the ability to kindle an allergic reaction, according the American College of Allergy, Asthma and Immunology.

"Unfortunately, there's not a 100 percent allergy-free furry animal in the world," says Dr. Kimberly Ricaurte, a Winnetka-based allergist and immunologist. "Any breeder who tells you differently is wrong."

About 10 percent of Americans are allergic to dogs, with reactions ranging from irksome symptoms such as itchy eyes to more serious complications such as asthma attacks or constricted breathing, according to ACAAI statistics. Humans, however, aren't allergic to animal hair, but rather to the protein found in dander and saliva.

But with a little research and a lot of rule-following, Malia and the would-be First Dog could lead a happy, healthy coexistence.

"Even if you have allergies, it's still possible to have a dog," Ricaurte said. "But you have to be careful."

Medical experts recommend considering breeds that produce low dander such as poodles or terriers. The American Kennel Club also lists hairless dogs, including Chinese Crested and Xoloitzcuintlis, as possible options for families with allergies.

Malia, however, has declared the goldendoodle - a golden retriever-poodle mix - the "optimal dog." President-elect Obama said while campaigning in Iowa last year. The adorable designer dog can be a low-shedding option if it has a poodle's coat, but if the coat favors a retriever, it could pose a problem for the eldest Obama daughter.

When a dog is still a puppy, it's difficult to determine which characteristic a dog's coat will take on.

"I don't think I'd recommend a goldendoodle for the Obamas," said Paula Fassens, founder of the PAWS animal shelter in Chicago. "I see a poodle or a terrier being better for them."

In his first post-election press conference, Obama described the dog debate as a "major issue" in his home and expressed doubts as to whether they could find a hypoallergenic dog at a shelter.

"Obviously, a lot of shelter dogs are mutts like me," said Obama, the son of a white mother from Kansas and a black father from Kenya. "So whether we're going to be able to balance those two things I think is a pressing issue on the Obama household."

But it might not be as hard as he thinks. According to Petfinder.com, an online database of shelter animals, there are more than 5,000 low-shedding dogs currently available for adoption in the United States.

In case the Obamas want to make sure their mutt comes from hypoallergenic stock, PAWS can perform genetic testing on its pooches for $50. The simple blood test will tell the family if the dog has any high-shedding ancestry.

Allergists recommend spending time with the pet at the shelter or breeder's before bringing it home. If, for example, Malia doesn't have a reaction after being around a puppy during a lengthy visit, it's unlikely the dog will cause her problems in the future.

Once home, the puppy should be banned from Malia's room at all times, Ricaurte said. HEPA (high-efficiency particulate air) filters also should be placed in the rooms she frequents to reduce allergen exposure.

Rat extinction mystery solved

BY SCOTT HARPER
(MCT)

NORFOLK, Va. — In 1899, an English ship stopped at Christmas Island, near Australia. Within nine years, the island's entire native rat population had gone extinct, and scientists have wondered ever since what exactly happened.

Now, researchers led by an Old Dominion University scientist think they have unraveled the mystery and, they say, the lessons of Christmas Island apply today to issues such as disease, invasive species and the law of unintended consequences.

Turns out, says ODU biology professor Alex Greenwood, that a British black rat had stowed away on the ship in a bale of hay. Upon reaching the island, the rat - or several rats - escaped on land and spread a "hyperdisease" among the native population.

"Anyone who has ever tried to kill a rat - let alone a whole population - knows how hard that can be," Greenwood said in an interview Monday. "That's what made Christmas Island so fascinating for so long. Imagine, a whole species - especially one as tough as a rat - gone within 10 years of exposure!"

The study by Greenwood and eight colleagues, including ODU graduate student Kelly Wyatt, is published in this month's PLoS One, a scientific journal. It is being celebrated as the first evidence for extinction of a mammal entirely because of disease.

The results come as Virginia and Maryland are pondering a possible introduction of a foreign oyster species into the Chesapeake Bay to help restore stocks.

Concerns about the Asian oyster carrying a new pathogen to the Bay or sparking an unforeseen disease "is definitely an issue" and "should be considered very, very carefully," Greenwood said.

"The chances for a new pathogen are very high, and should be seen as a high risk," he said.

Greenwood, who came to ODU two years ago from Germany, said disease often is overlooked as a root cause for an animal or plant species struggling to survive in the wild. But, he said, disease is probably playing a larger-than-expected role in the decline of Tasmanian devils, African wild dogs and North American amphibians, including the common frog.

Conventional wisdom for years has stated that the frog is likely suffering the side effects of global warming. But recent research indicates this explanation is too simplistic, if not entirely wrong, Greenwood said.

"It seems to indicate a pathogen is more to blame," he said. "Now, climate change might have exaggerated the impact of the pathogen, but it's a pathogen that appears to be the underlying issue."

Humans probably cannot be wiped out by a hyperdisease, Greenwood said. "Because there's just too many of us at this point."

Elections and cheaters

Katherine Marr

The last time I was asked for ID was at Blockbuster when I rented a DVD.

Before that, I was occasionally ID'd by overzealous – ahem, rightly thorough – Big Y employees when I bought scratch tickets. But it seems to me that the last time that everybody should have been ID'd was November 4th. Why is it that we are consistently ID'd to rent a PG-rated movie or buy a $2 scratch ticket, but in half of the United States, people are simply handed election ballots?

If I've learned anything in the past election year, it's how invested people become in particular candidates and laws. Personally, I rank pretty low on the scale of election-hype. Sure, I caught the presidential debates, watched whatever shenanigans Tina Fey was up to on "Saturday Night Live" and listened to the students who spoke in the lecture halls against Question 1.

Clearly, I'm not gung-ho enough to be found waving a sign on a street corner. Yet many people are extremely passionate about who should run the country and what laws should govern the community. And some of these individuals may go to any length, including fraud, to help their party or proposition win.

That is why it is shocking that over half of the United States lacks preventive measures against voter fraud. In only 24 states are voters required to show ID prior to casting a ballot. Seven of those states mandate a photo ID, while 17 accept other forms of identification. That leaves 26 states whose lax regulations practically beg for voters to manipulate the system.

I recently read a letter to the editor in The Boston Globe, in which a woman expressed her dismay at not being ID'd at the polls last Tuesday. She even went as far as to confront an inspector and ask what would stop her from voting twice. The inspector's answer was not too reassuring: she couldn't possibly vote twice because she would be recognized.

I know from experience that this explanation is entirely unrealistic. Over the summer, I worked at a pool where I photo-ID'd everyone who paid to swim. I saw hundreds of people a day, and I wasn't just crossing their names off a list. I usually talked to them about pool prices or rules, in addition to looking at their IDs and writing down their information.

Yet, it was near-impossible for me to recognize these same people later in the day if they exited and reentered the pool area. I had to ID them again to confirm that they already paid. I couldn't remember all of the faces, and I imagine that I'm sharper than the senior citizens who man the polling tables in my hometown.

Put in a little bit of thought, and it seems incredibly easy to impersonate another voter. In the letter to the editor, the writer says that she very well could have voted as her mother, whom she knew was not voting. Similarly, I heard various students state their dissatisfaction with both presidential candidates, and conclude that they were going to forgo voting on November 4th.

Anyone who announces publicly that they aren't voting may save someone else from having to scrub the obituaries for people to safely impersonate at the polls.

This is an age-old problem that needs a solution stretching beyond a mere 24 states. Fear of fraud was especially high around this presidential election, which in many ways mirrored the major 1960 Kennedy-Nixon election, which raised concerns about voter fraud in Chicago. But even more so than in national elections, we need to worry about voter fraud in local races in which people have personal investments, and a win or loss can come down to a narrow margin of votes.

For instance, I had a personal investment when a relative of mine ran for a town office. If I were feeling extraordinarily ambitious (and, more importantly, willing to commit a felony), I could have voted once in glasses and a ponytail. Then, a couple of hours later, I could have voted a second time with my hair down sans glasses.

Voila – I'd be a new person. Say I did this at every precinct in town under the names of old classmates (who I doubt requested absentee ballots or returned home to vote for selectmen or school committee members.) Say my sister and my cousin did the same. We could really rack up the votes.

I would love to say that I actually did this as an undercover journalistic exposé, but the truth is, I didn't. And, for the record, I voted by absentee ballot, so I'm completely in the free and clear.

The next step: keep making history

Matt Kushi

It is finally over. That much we know is certain. The 2008 Presidential Election is finally over, and Senator Barack Obama (D-Ill.) will be the next President of the United States of America.

For those of you out there who are breathing a sigh of relief now that Presidential Election 101 is done, take another breath, because this is the week for analyzing what this means to America.

In the past year, we have witnessed two women make serious bids for the White House, and one African-American man win the Presidency. It has taken us 232 years to reach this point.

The historical significance of what has just happened in this country is mind-boggling. While most of us voted on the basis of the ideals that Senator Obama and Senator McCain stood for, it is impossible to ignore the historical measures that this election captured.

No matter which way you look at it, the fact remains that for the first time the United States of America elected an African American man as President.

While I was certainly aware of the meaning of the night of November 4, 2008, the truth of what we accomplished as a nation did not strike me until I heard what a friend of mine had to say. On Instant Messenger, my friend's away message simply read, "145 years from the Emancipation Proclamation." I was struck with the realization of how far this country has come in its history.

Just think about that: It has been 145 years since President Abraham Lincoln declared in 1863 that all slaves within the states that seceded prior to the American Civil War were free. It has been 143 years since the 13th Amendment was passed, the law that banned slavery in the United States. It has taken us that long for the majority of this country to partly overcome the obstacle of human inequality. Only 40 years ago, we were fighting over the same issues that almost tore this country apart 145 years ago.

It has been 145 years since President Abraham Lincoln declared in 1863 that all slaves within the states that seceded prior to the American Civil War were free.

Martin Luther King Jr. said in his "I Have A Dream Speech" in 1963, "I have a dream that my four little children will one day live in a nation where they will not be judged by the color of their skin, but by the content of their character."

Last Tuesday, we fulfilled that dream.

There was yet another historical note to this election. Sarah Palin became only the second woman to be on a Presidential ticket as Vice-President. The first was Geraldine Ferraro, who was on the ticket with Walter Mondale in 1984.

We also all know the historical meaning of Hillary Clinton's run for the Democratic Party nomination. She has helped make the idea of a female president in the future one that is not too hard to envision.

We, the youth of America, have also made a difference. Not since the 1960's has the United States seen such activism among the youth of America. We voted and made sure that our voices were heard, shutting down the argument that we are too content with the world as we see it.

As Robert F. Kennedy once stated, "Few will have the greatness to bend history itself; but each of us can work to change a small portion of events, and in the total of all those acts will be written the history of this generation."

With this election, we have shown that we are the authors of our generation.

Senator Obama's main theme throughout his campaign was change. However, this change was not simply a change of policies. It was a change in America as a whole. This change signified what America is all about: equality. There was, and there still is, much resistance to the change of one era of life to the next. While we can always make progress towards equality for all humans, there will always be opponents to it. It is an everlasting work that will have to be tackled time and time again.

While we have surely accomplished something that is truly a footnote in history, there is much more work to be done. There is much more work to be done to ensure that the United States remains among the top powers in the world. To borrow a line from President Abraham Lincoln during his famous Gettysburg Address,

"It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us – that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion – that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain – that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom – and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

Many leaders have died trying to uphold the values that make the foundation of this country and many have died defending the United States of America. The task of keeping it going falls to us.

Building a self-reliant United States

Adam McGillen

In his victory speech, Barack Obama listed a great deal of challenges facing America today, painting a grim picture of the future if we do not make changes. It can be quite overwhelming to hear Obama speak as if the sky were about to fall: "two wars, a planet in peril, the worst financial crisis in a century."

One could easily begin to think that we're about to face both World Wars and the Great Depression, as if all of America's historical setbacks were about to repeat themselves.

Indeed, we as a nation do face a delicate road ahead, but to claim that this election proved that "a government of the people, by the people and for the people has not perished from this Earth," is a bit excessive. It demonstrates Obama's eloquence, something dearly missed in the Oval Office, but shows a flare for the dramatic. Yes, Obama's victory is a historic one, but I am far from the belief that America was or is on the brink of perishing.

The simplest answer to all the problems Obama listed lays within his speech: Self-reliance. It's a philosophy at the foundation of conservative politics, but you'll find it held close to Obama's own bosom.

It does not mean isolationism, sealing off America from the rest of the world in order to extricate ourselves from issues beyond our borders. We have a vested interest in the well-being of all nations for the sake of our own, and we must realize that by bettering America through self-reliance we will give the world a light to follow into the dark days ahead.

At the core of the dilemmas facing our nation today is our reliance on foreign oil. Our dependence on other nations to feed our need for black gold has developed hostilities in the Middle East, fostered a general disdain around the world for American greed, propagated extremist terrorism and helped in the proliferation of global warming, all while having a crippling effect on our economy.

Now is the time for pioneers, the epitome of the self-reliant. When the colonists of New England grew unhappy with their unfair treatment by the English they had only themselves to rely on to break away and create a new nation. As Americans set out west to find new beginnings, they had only themselves to rely on in the wilderness.

We must now hold true to our pioneer heritage, we must remake our industries to develop the technologies necessary to power the most powerful country in the world.

Striving for ... self-reliance is no easy task, but it is necessary to resolve all the other issues we face.

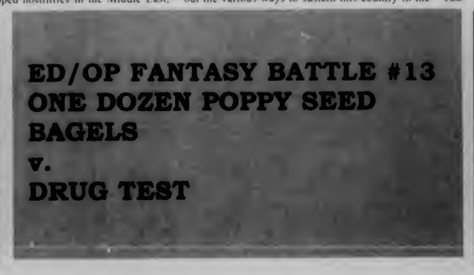
Striving for such self-reliance is no easy task, but it is necessary to resolve all the other issues we face. If we become reliant only on the energy sources available within our borders we will be forced to cut back on the fossil fuels that generate gross climate change.

Dollars shipped to the Middle East for oil will stay within the U.S., bandaging our wounded economy rather than bolstering terrorist ranks with new weaponry and supporting the governments that harbor the terrorists who hate us.

Going "green" offers many companies an opportunity to begin again as entrepreneurs, seeking out the various ways to sustain this country in the long run. Developing the technologies necessary to deliver the energy America needs will require massive amounts of labor and productivity, a new sort of industrial revolution to bring our economy to staggering new heights. Going "green" is synonymous with becoming self-reliant.

America has an opportunity to reinvigorate itself as a beacon of progress in a redefined world. Self-reliance centers on a philosophy of having the capability to stand alone, but we can use that strength to lead others so that they may learn to stand on their own as well.



Other nations relying on the U.S. to become self-reliant sounds a bit counter-intuitive, right? I assure it's not when you consider this "planet in peril." We may pioneer a rebuilding of America into a more self-reliant union, but the necessity for this approach to survive in a shrinking world will push other nations to follow our example.

In Ralph Waldo Emerson's essay on self-reliance, he described this global development much more eloquently than I ever could: "The genesis and maturation of a planet, its poise and orbit, the bended tree recovering itself from the strong wind, the vital resources of every animal and vegetable, are demonstrations of the self-sufficing, and therefore self-relying soul."

The roots America has cast down to drink up the world's oil are too widespread, too weak to withstand the hurricane of troubles on its way. But America the self-reliant will find new energy to grasp our planet with stronger, deeper roots that stem from within our pioneer spirit, so that our maturation as a nation may coincide with the maturation of our planet.

'Rosencrantz and Guildenstern' survive

ASC applies wit and charm to Shakespearean performance

By Michelle Fredette
Collegian Staff

Absurdity reigned at the University of Massachusetts Rand Theater Sunday night. The American Shakespeare Center performed Tom Stoppard's "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead" with an artful blend of humor and desperation.

Walking into the theater, one was met by actors throwing programs into the balcony in exchange for a dollar, while a hodgepodge of performers in black played guitars and accordions on stage, singing the Beatles' "Carry That Weight."

The ASC kicked off the humor before the performance even started. Brandi Rhome and Dennis Henry, who play Ophelia and Polonius respectively, explained the troupe's traditional staging techniques with a heightened comedic effect.

Henry, deciding to explain in the role of long-winded Polonius, unfurled a long scroll to read from.

The two bantered and joked as they went through the list. They detailed the troupe's gender bending, their casting of the same actor in multiple parts, and that they, as Rhome suggestively put it, "do it with the lights on!"

Although most people know the general story of "Hamlet," "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead" would be difficult to understand if one were only vaguely familiar with it.

However, the ASC's Stark Raving Sane troupe kindly performed a song-telling story of "Hamlet" just before the performance began.

"Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead" is a comical play – with its puns and word games – but there is also a dark undercurrent to it.

The question of "what it all means" plagues Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, and that nothing and no one is reliable.

In order to keep the play lighthearted, director Jim Warren let the wordplay do its job but also hammed up the delivery.

Rosencrantz, played by Rick Blunt, does a Michael Jackson-esque dance when he wins yet another coin after it comes up heads; Hamlet, played by Luke Eddy, moonwalks onto the stage, and the players do a take on the "pound-it" during their initial interaction with Rosencrantz and Guildenstern.

The players get increasingly rowdy and explicit throughout the show, with lots of sexual jokes and pantomimes.

Alfred (Josh Carpenter) added an extra dose of comic relief as the player who is always forced to play the woman who gets ravished. His blond wig and shirt, tied up to reveal his stomach, enhanced the amusement.

The clever choice of props also added to the humor, as Hamlet lay on a "Dora the Explorer" towel and wore a multi-colored sunhat and sunglasses.

Even the traditional staging conditions had a hand in the performance's comedy.

In one scene, Guildenstern asks if Rosencrantz sees anything. Rosencrantz, after taking a long, hard look into the crowd, merely says, "No," which was particularly humorous because the ASC "does it with the lights on."

The constant word games that are played require sharp attention from the audience. For the most part, the Stark Raving Sane troupe kept the pace quick without losing the audience. Though, there were a few areas that could have benefited from slowing down the pace.

When Rosencrantz and Guildenstern finally got the chance to question Hamlet, the action moved so quickly that even one who knew the story of "Hamlet" was left a bit disoriented.

Yet even with this minor difficulty and the more lowbrow humor courtesy of the ASC, the Stark Raving Sane troupe's performance put on an extremely professional performance. It was clear that Warren had directed this play before because everything ran smoothly.

With actors chosen after scouring the entire country, it is no surprise that the performers were able to flawlessly capture their characters.

Ginna Hoben as Guildenstern was brilliant. Her mixture of uncertainty, distress and joyfulness worked well, as did Rick Blunt's curious questioning as Rosencrantz. The back-and-forth between the two felt natural and genial and their pairing truly made the performance.

Daniel Kennedy as the Lead Player was excellent, as his glee, outrage and solemnity all came across as genuine. The interactions between the Lead Player, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern were artfully acted by all three.

The ASC's performance of "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead" was of high caliber, in addition to being well acted and directed.

Warren's directing successfully blended the serious aspect of the show with humor, allowing the comic to take its rightful place at center stage.

National holiday in London remembers fifth of November

By Christina Fong
Collegian Staff

Four hundred years after Guy Fawkes' failed attempt to blow up the Houses of Parliament, the tradition has survived and transformed into a national holiday that has incorporated a great deal more extravagance.

"Remember, remember, the fifth of November, gunpowder, treason and plot," goes the notable quote made popular by the 2005 film "V for Vendetta." It is actually a line from a nursery rhyme about the gunpowder plot and subsequent capture of Fawkes in 1605, after which Londoners lit celebratory bonfires around the city.

Typically called "Bonfire Night" or "Guy Fawkes Night," it is known for its mild-mannered debauchery and thunderous revelry.

Debauchery comes in the form of Fawkes effigies, affectionately called "Guys," burning on bonfires and revelry in the form of fireworks displays.

In London, fireworks were scheduled for the entire week of November 5. Starting on November 1, an increasing number of fireworks displays across the city were showcased in different locations on each day.

Most people however, make the night a private affair, inviting friends and family to their homes or rented outdoor spaces. The size and enthusiasm of the parties vary from city to city.

In Fawkes' hometown of York, his old school never burns an effigy of him because he was a former pupil.

The festivities usually commence by lighting up a bonfire or "bone fire" as they were once called and throwing the "Guy" onto the flames. The effigies are normally made out of cardboard and old clothes stuffed with newspaper.

An outdated custom that is no longer prevalent in modern day society had children carrying their newly made effigies around and begging people for "a penny for the Guy." Any money they managed to collect would go towards fireworks or candy.

"We don't have a bonfire. I'm worried because there are lots of children," said Juliet Alexander, a professor at Regent's College.

It's a just concern considering the number of incidents London Fire Brigade had to deal with due to bonfires that become out of control or problems caused by fireworks. The Brigade took upwards of 600 calls on November 6 – over 100 of which were related to Bonfire Night.

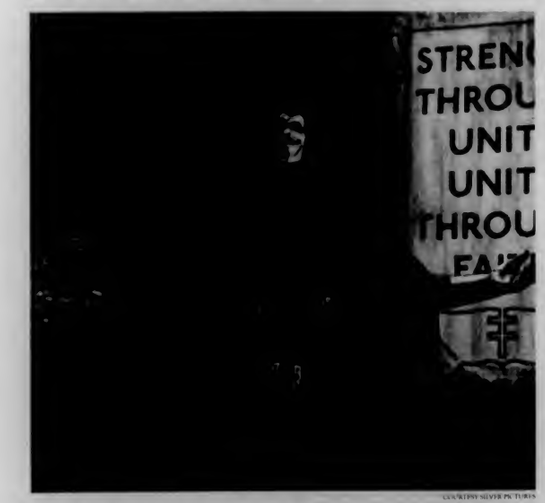
Along with any celebration, food is a must. In this case, comfort food is often the favorite choice.

Serving a party of three families, Alexander said, "We always have a set menu of bangers and mash," with a variety of potatoes and sausages.

Other popular Bonfire Night foods include jacked potatoes, roasted marshmallows and Parkin cake, which is a spicy cake made up of oatmeal, ginger, treacle and syrup.

The night customarily ends with a literal bang, including an array of fireworks displays being set off from party to party.

Alexander said, "It's mainly just fireworks now. Sometimes I buy my children sparklers so they can write their name in the air."



Bonfire Night was particularly unique this year. Taking place the day after the United States' Presidential election, the evening was riding the waves of Barack Obama's victory over John McCain.

"It was weird this year because of the election," said Alexander.

She felt the party this year was less about Guy Fawkes and more about the new President-elect.

"We set off fireworks in celebration of Obama," she said.

'Tourism' for the intellectual eye

By Hannah Nelson
Collegian Correspondent

Richard H Gassan's historical record of early American tourism in his book "The Birth of American Tourism: New York, the Hudson Valley, and American Culture, 1790-1830," reads as a modern tourist's guide through the eighteenth and nineteenth century, as would any guide book showcasing a major attraction.

Tourism was yesterday's form of improving a national image and solidifying an identity, something transferable to today, as it was a method of which to revive the economy after the War of 1812.

Even more relevant was the formation of the middle class out of the arising tourism industry, an argument of Gassan's that has eerie pertinence to the present fears of the dwindling middle class.

With a cementing middle class, it was getting easier for the lines to blur, but with the affordability of luxuries came the loss of authenticity.

Gassan takes the reader from the origin of spas and natural springs (as advertised cure-alls for cancer) to rehabs for alcoholism and the evolution of the wealthy's monopoly on resort living.

That monopoly, however, could only last so long, as tourism became accessible to the growing middle class and spas and springs evolved from health care retreats to fashionable social scenes.

Whether knowingly or not, Gassan presents an almost perfect celebrity parallel of then and now.

The tour was the form a travel for famous names of the time, and spas and springs were the source of more than just mineral water, serving as rumor mills ridden with all sorts of gossip that would make any nineteenth century version of Perez Hilton proud.

The emergence of brand naming products foreshadowed the Industrial Revolution through near mass production of luxuries such as art, only without the mass production of the scale that would follow a few decades later.

By far the most influential and long lasting product to come out of the earliest era of tourism in the United States would be the tourist's guidebook.

Competition was stiff, and variety soon exploded, from descriptions that were closer to fiction or glamorized travel ads, to accounts that sounded more like instruction manuals.

RICHARD H. GASSAN

Gassan's novel discusses 19th century American tourism.

They were a form of branding in the other respects, stamping the locations in question such as Niagara Falls and Saratoga Springs as purely American. This sparked ideas that consumerism was a form of patriotism, a sentiment not too far from certain government maneuvered ideas in the twenty-first century.

The start of consumerism within an American culture through tourism was the start of creating something uniquely American in identity, particularly when it came to severing a certain amount of English ties.

"Pure consumption" was present in tourism like no other product or service before it in American society. It was a time that concreted American artists and writers, putting the country's sceneries on canvas and its stories in ink.

Tourism was likewise a contributing factor to the birth of American Romanticism. Stories such as Washington Irving's "Rip Van Wrinkle" and "The Legend of Sleepy Hallow" created tourist attractions in New York, not so different than the "Harry Potter"-themed trips in the UK or "The Lord of the Rings" tours in New Zealand, solidifying certain locations as fan homages.

Once the heavy factual information has been launched and the theme repetition surpassed, it's clear how tourism – in a short span of 40 years – became such a lasting influence on art and literary movements, in addition to a "back to nature" school of thought.

It is a Cultural Revolution-influencing social life in a way that impacted more than just fashion, art, travel and literature, by bringing small luxuries to the middle and lower classes, such as the advent of the beloved three day weekend.

While "American Tourism" is a far cry from a beach read, that's hardly the intent. A better fit would be at home somewhere in a course offered by the School of Management's Hospitality and Tourism Management Department, if only through choice passages.

Reading "American Tourism" gives a new practicality to understanding the major and how the service industries can revive a post war economy.

The polar lesson is to be learned through the beginning of American consumerism, while that lifestyle is in a marginal jeopardy today.

Dance company to perform FAC

Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

"To put it simply, I make dances because I can't help it," Paul Taylor writes in his essay "Why I Make Dances." "Working on dances has become a way of life."

Taylor, 78, no longer performs, although his dancing legacy is preserved by his unwillingness to quit and by his troupe, the Paul Taylor Dance Company.

The Company will perform Thursday night at the Fine Arts Center, presented by Silverscape Designs, Cooley Dickinson Hospital and 93.9FM The River.

Taylor got his start with the famed Martha Graham Dance Company after attending Syracuse University. Fittingly, he won scholarships there for both swimming and painting, two art forms which, when combined, define dance at its core: feats of physicality joined with feats of aesthetic creativity to develop a singular work.

Studying with Graham, Taylor attracted attention from other modern dance giants of the time such as José Limon and Doris Humphrey, steppingstones on his way to becoming an independent dance entity.

In 1954, Taylor founded his own company, after working with choreographers George Balanchine and Merce Cunningham.

See DANCE on page 6

Taylor brings dance to UMass

DANCE from page 5

Intent on infusing the every day into the elitist world of high art, Taylor struck out to capture the essence of every day movement within the frame of dance.

One dance, entitled "Duet" (1957), featured a single female dancer lying down and a single male dancer standing next to her. Neither of the dancers make a single movement in the entirety of the piece's four minutes, putting emphasis on body-to-body interweaving and posture as opposed to strictly athletic movement.

Taylor's experimental nature, gave his creative career a boot. The left-of-center take on dance eventually mixed with more traditional ventures, such as ballet, accentuating fundamentals such as the aforementioned posture and space between dancers under ballet's technical subtlety, producing beautifully crafted, stunning works.

Themes were woven together as well, taking programmed, mundane movements and putting them to music, providing a window with which one could squint to see that the beautiful is not restricted to a concert hall or canvas.

Taylor's obsession with dance apparently came from a need to reach out, to connect with someone, anyone.

"From childhood on, I've been a reticent guy who spends a lot of time alone," he reveals in "Why I Make Dances." "I make dances in an effort to communicate to people.

"A visual medium can be more effective than words," he continues. "I make dances because I don't always trust my own words or, for that matter, those of quite a few others I've known."

This need for trust drives Taylor, apparently troubled by liars, whether it's the doorman or himself. One must trust one's partner completely, and allow them to wrap around one's being in order to create something elegant and pleasing.

However, Taylor's fear of human contact is also aided by the same concept of dance.

"I make dances because crowds are kept at a safe distance," he wrote. "That's what proscenium stages are good for."

The xenophobia continues and permeates into his leadership abilities.

"When on the job I find that a benevolent dictatorship is best," he said. "I don't make dances for the masses, I make them for myself."

His dances, while personal, touch on social issues, introspective emotion meeting global ills in a culmination of beauty both physical and sonic.

All issues aside, Taylor uses dance as a mechanism to comprehend human affairs and chew over his own existence.

"I make dances because it briefly frees me from coping with the real world," he explained. "Because it's possible to build a whole new universe with steps."

For classical pop singer, art does not always imitate life

By Preston Jones
McClatchy Newspapers

A riddle: What do the 2008 Olympics, the gore-streaked "Saw" movie franchise and famed composer Andrew Lloyd Webber have in common?

Give up? The answer is Sarah Brightman.

Gifted with a glistening, ice-carved soprano known the world over, the 48-year-old Briton began her eclectic career in the late 1970s as a member of the dance troupe Pan's People and, later, Hot Gossip (even recording a cover of the 1963 teen-pop confection "My Boyfriend's Back."

Brightman made the transition from light-as-air pop music onto the stage and the London debut of "Cats," where she met Lloyd Webber, whom she would marry in 1984 (they divorced in 1990).

For his then-wife, Lloyd Webber created one of the most indelible musical roles of the 20th century, that of Christine Daae in his titanically successful 1986 musical "The Phantom of the Opera."

Away from the glow of stage lights, Brightman remade herself as part of the "popera" vanguard, taking her place alongside other notable, classical-minded contemporaries like Andrea Bocelli, Josh Groban and Charlotte Church.

This year has proved to be exceptionally busy for the vocalist: the release of two albums, "Symphony" and the holiday-themed "A Winter Symphony"; a cameo in the Beijing Olympics opening ceremonies; a rôle in director Darren Lynn Bousman's peculiar rock musical "Repo! The Genetic Opera" and a world tour promoting "Symphony."

"I do have a real passion for what I do, and I love to make it as complete as possible," Brightman says during a recent phone interview. "It's hard at times because my career is often a whirlwind. But I actually do feel extremely privileged with what I do because, in a way, it's my hobby."

"I enjoy various parts of it tremendously and get such a huge creative satisfaction out of it; it does allow me to go in all sorts of different directions."

You'd be forgiven if you picked up a copy of "Symphony," Brightman's first album of new material in five years, and thought you'd grabbed an Evanescence album by mistake.

The artwork, much like the music, reflects a darker, more Gothic tone. For that matter, "A Winter Symphony" may be one of the chilliest Christmas albums in recent memory.

But art does not always reflect life. Brightman simply claims that the more austere tone stems from having the luxury of time; some four years in all were dedicated, off and on, to "Symphony's" creation.

"It was interesting to see my tastes and what I wanted to do for the album change completely during that time," Brightman says. "Taking time is a good experience. So 'Symphony' ended up being a much more interesting album than had I completed it in a year. Everything about it is a much richer piece."

While "Symphony" was afforded breathing room, Brightman had to hustle to wedge the recording of her first-ever holiday album, complete with bombastic treatments of "Silent Night" and "Ave Maria," into her often hectic schedule.

"I'd always wanted to make a Christmas album, because I love that time of year," Brightman says.

"We never really got it together because ... it was a timing issue. I finally got to the point where I said, 'I don't care anymore – I've got to make a Christmas album.' What I didn't expect was how I would feel trying to make a Christmas album during the summer months in Europe."

Brightman's summer wasn't exclusively devoted to sonically evoking the dead of winter – she also took time out to travel to Beijing and perform "You and Me" (in both Mandarin Chinese and English) with Chinese vocalist Liu Huan.

It marked the second time the singer has appeared at the Olympics – in 1992, she and Jose Carreras performed the soaring "Amigos Para Siempre" at the closing ceremonies in Barcelona, Spain.

Sarah Brightman's lastest release, "Symphony," is a far cry from her past albums.

For her part, Brightman – who admits that travel is "the most difficult aspect of (her) career" – said her role in this year's Olympic ceremonies was minor, crediting her Chinese hosts with making the event quite painless.

"It was a lovely experience," she says. "It was very different than anything else I've gone to, I suppose because ... I think it was being surrounded by all those people who had worked for so many years on it and I came in on the tail end of it. It was their moment of showing it all off and you could feel the emotion of all the people that were around you and what was going on."

In another unlikely turn, Brightman makes her American feature film debut as Blind Mag in the eclectic, eccentric rock musical "Repo! The Genetic Opera," which also stars Paris Hilton and Paul Sorvino.

Bousman, who directed two sequels in the bloody "Saw" films and is reportedly set for a sixth installment, had his mind set on Brightman from the early going.

"I don't really perform in movies," Brightman says. "I've done bit parts and things ... but not a proper feature in America. Darren just called me out of the blue and said, 'I'd really, really like you to come over and do this part, you're perfect for me. I've been watching all this stuff on YouTube and your Web site – you're perfect for it.'"

Brightman took some convincing, as she was in the midst of finishing up "Symphony," but once Bousman described the film to her, she signed on and soon found herself on a Toronto soundstage.

"It was a part I felt I really could get hold of and work with," Brightman says. "Otherwise, I wouldn't have done it, I don't think."

The idea of Brightman swapping lines and belting out lyrics with Hilton is bizarre, but the songstress, who recently caught a screening of the film in Hamburg, Germany, insists that the finished product is far from a pop cultural train wreck.

Hamburg "was the first time I'd seen it ... with a normal audience coming in to watch," Brightman says. "I was expecting to go 'Oh, God' and not be able to look at myself, but I loved it; I had a really good evening. Darren's a good director and he really put everything into this. It might not be everyone's cup of tea, but it's different."

Injuries doomed team, forced new game plan

Minutewomen stayed tough, fought through season

Adam Miller

From the beginning, the season was practically robbed from the Massachusetts women's soccer team, losing three potential starters.

The Minutewomen lost alum Britt Canfield's apprentice Sydney Stoll, who would have been the team's top scorer if it wasn't for her knee injury, which followed a broken collar bone.

They also lost midfielder Meghan Gould, who is out with a bad concussion and is questionable for the near future.

Gould has shown improvement in what limited action she's had at practice, but has not been cleared by doctors yet – even for next season.

The third injury that UMass suffered was to freshman Amanda Carvalho.

The forward has great accuracy when getting a shot at goal and could've given the Minutewomen a tremendous offensive boost.

She too, has a knee injury.

During the season, UMass dealt with midfielder Katie Ruggles and forwards Vanessa Patry and Vanessa Lima all going down, which affected the offense significantly.

I know injuries are part of the game and UMass coach Jim Rudy will never use the health of his team as an excuse for why he couldn't give one of his favorite groups of seniors the winning season he would've liked.

But when six players in the starting line-up either can't play or aren't playing at full health.

In that case you're asking for a team to deal with a little more than their share of injuries.

Rudy believes that at full strength, the team would've had anywhere between 10 and 15 goals, putting them in the same league as Fordham and Saint Louis.

"It would've allowed us to be a lot more attack-oriented and rely less on our defense," Rudy said.

"I think we would've been in the ball-park to win or tie every game."

He's right.

The Minutewomen beat No. 2-seed Dayton, 1-0, and is one of only two Atlantic 10 teams to hold Charlotte to one goal.

Rudy said before the season that he wanted his team to be in every game.

For most of the season, UMass stayed competitive in every game.

Of its nine losses, five were by a single goal.

That isn't even taking into account the three tie games this season.

During the non-conference schedule, it looked like the Minutewomen could overcome the injuries and win with their defense.

They had one of the league's better defenses with an experienced senior in Melissa Toulouse leading an otherwise young, but talented backfield and goalkeeper Lauren Luckey.

It wasn't until UMass followed up a win against St. Bonaventure on Sept. 26 with a tie two days later against Temple. The game was played in terrible weather and a performance unsatisfactory to Rudy's expectations.

From there, everything seemed to go downhill with a three-game scoreless streak.

The Minutewomen found some breathing room after beating Xavier and the Flyers, which made themselves a serious contender for a spot in the A-10 tournament.

But UMass couldn't translate the momentum from its upset win into more offense, going without a goal in its last five games of the season.

The Minutewomen had a young team already, with seven freshmen and four sophomores.

An injury-free squad would've easily given the younger players experience on the bench behind some experienced veterans.

It's a luxury that Luckey had playing behind Kristen Walker and Christina Adams had behind Canfield.

Rudy didn't have that luxury this year as he was forced to go deep in his bench with all the injuries he had.

It's too early to tell if the window of opportunity for the Minutewomen making the post-season has passed.

Even though they aren't going to have an established team leader, a lot can happen between now and next season.

With the spring season starting in February, some players who didn't get a chance to see much playing time will now get that chance to earn a starting spot.

Much of that young talent is going to improve, and if all goes well, should have a good recruiting class coming in.

However, with the recent $12 million budget cut for the University, it's going to be much harder for Rudy to offer spots to out-of-state players and his status past 2010 is up in the air.

No other coach at UMass has to win as badly as Rudy, who prior to 2001 has a resume that competes with the best coaches in the nation.

The Minutewomen came very close to making the A-10 tournament in 2007, if it wasn't for a team that ended with more bruises than goals.

But Rudy can't settle for close. Not when he's coached for 28 years (21 at UMass) and is in the later part of his career.

It would be one thing for him to go out with teams that had no chance at winning simply because of recruiting resources.

It's another when those teams come close every year and can't pull off an A-10 berth because they aren't at full health.

Atlantic 10 tourney set, teams prepare

League teams try to fix errors after previous meetings

By Holly J. Galvin
Collegian Staff

The once dominant No. 17 Saint Louis (10-3-5, 6-3 Atlantic 10) and Dayton (12-4-2, 6-2-1 A-10) men's soccer teams find themselves in an unusual position at this week's A-10 tournament in Pittsburgh: win or go home.

With regular-season champions, Massachusetts, 19-6-3, 7-1-1 A-10) and surprise contender Temple (10-4-4, 6-1-2 A-10) earning first-round byes by clinching the top two seeds, the Billikens and Flyers will have to fight their way back to capture an A-10 tournament crown.

Ranked third and fourth, respectively, the former conference leaders will play the tournament's lowest seeds during the opening round on Nov. 13.

Winners of Thursday's games will take on Massachusetts and Temple in Friday evening's semifinals, with the first-place Minutemen facing the lowest remaining seed.

Dayton vs. Rhode Island

Third-ranked Dayton will meet sixth-seeded Rhode Island (8-7-3, 4-3-2 A-10) at 6:30 p.m. Thursday.

The Flyers find themselves facing a squad that was just lambasted by Saint Louis at the end of regular season play, 5-0.

The Rams, who bumbled their way into the final tournament slot by way of a complicated tiebreaker, have not met the Flyers yet this season. Rhode Island is a streaky 2-3-2 in its last seven games, which included a 3-2 double overtime win over former powerhouse Charlotte.

Against fellow championship tournament participants, Rhode Island's record is 1-2.

This lone Rams win came against first-place Massachusetts back on Oct. 12, accounting for the last time the Minutemen have lost in their current seven-game streak.

Dayton is 2-1 against tournament opponents, with 1-0 victories coming against both Saint Louis and Fordham and a loss to Temple (4-2).

The aggressive Flyers, who lead the A-10 with an average of 3.78 offside penalties per game, have posted a 6-2-1 record and averaged over 2.4 goals per game in the past month of conference play.

Flyer standout and Hermann Trophy candidate Alex Torda leads the conference in points per game with 1.78.

Saint Louis vs. Fordham

In what looks to be a heated rematch of Fordham's Oct. 12 upset over SLU, the nationally ranked and fourth-seeded Billikens look to upend an underdog that has only once won an A-10 championship, in 1996.

Much like UMass, fifth-seeded Fordham exploded out of mediocrity within the last weeks of regular season conference play.

Stepping up their game to hold four of the other tournament clinchers to within a one-goal differential, the Rams went 5-3-1 in the last month, holding A-10 runner-up Temple to a 0-0 double-overtime tie.

Strong goalkeeping has been key, as freshman and two-time A-10 Rookie of the Week honoree Ryan Meara has shined.

Along with a stifling .872 save percentage, Meara's goals-against average of only 0.65 is second only to that of UMass keeper Zack Simmons (0.53). Meara was critical in Fordham's October upset of SLU, making six key saves.

SLU, on the other hand, was ranked ninth nationally at the time of last month's 1-0 loss to Fordham.

It was then that the Rams handed the Billikens their season's first loss of only three losses overall.

SLU has floated around the top 25 NSCAA rankings for much of this season.

All three losses, however, have come against top conference opponents and fellow A-10 tournament participants: Fordham, Dayton and Massachusetts.

Two of those defeats have come in double-overtime, as SLU has played a somewhat unusually high total of six double-overtime games this season and is winless in extra time situations.

The Billikens enter A-10 tournament play leading the conference in all major offensive statistical categories and riding a five goal trouncing of Rhode Island, whom the Billikens would only face again if both teams were to make the championship round.

Fighting the weather

Duquesne University, though not fielding a team in competition, will serve as host at Pittsburgh's Arthur J. Rooney Athletic Field. As of Nov. 10, the Weather Channel predicts showers prior to and throughout the evening for Thursday's match-ups.

However, Rooney field is composed of Sportexe synthetic turf, which features a drainage system.

about half of each game. Instead, the main threat that Sowry had her players focusing on was Miller.

Much of the success against the Kent State offense can be attributed to UMass' ability to outlet the ball and beat the press.

"The way they pressed, it left so much space on the other side of the field where our outletting went pretty smoothly and allowed us to get past [the midfield]," sophomore defender Jaime Bourazeris said.

Kent State's defense allowed freshman defender Nikki Pancrocco to play more aggressively in the offensive zone than normal.

The Minutewomen silenced Kent State's offense for most of the game, but it was when Potts was barred for the game for five of the last six minutes that the defense truly stepped up.

"When you're a player down, it's tough. You're defending a one goal lead. But we prepare for these situations," Sowry said. "We got onto the ball quickly. We communicated well and made them force the play a little bit."

"When that happens, we like to keep it at our tempo," Rodgers said. "So when we have a free hit we'll try and slow it down and get organized. Because they're rushing and we're just trying to keep it at our own pace."

UMass has had experience with being a player down. During last week's A-10 championship game against Richmond, the Minutewomen played without senior midfielder Erin Parker for 20 minutes and still shut out the Spiders.

Tuesday's 1-0 win gives the Minutewomen three shutouts in postseason play. With its recent success on defense, UMass has lowered its goals against average to 1.00, the fourth best mark in the country.

The Minutewomen's ability to shut down opposing team's offenses is a far cry from the team's expectations at the beginning of the season. With two sophomores, a junior and a freshman on defense and a freshman goalkeeper, the UMass defense has played far beyond its expectations and is taking that confidence into the NCAA tournament.

"We didn't want to be the weakest link coming into the post season. So, we've been competing to be the strongest unit that we can," Tait said against Drake, who qualified for the NCAA tournament as a fifth seed, 65-62, on Feb. 13 in Carbondale, Ill. The Salukis finished third in the MVC with an 11-7 record. Their success qualified them for the National Invitation Tournament, but lost in the second round to Arizona State, 65-51.

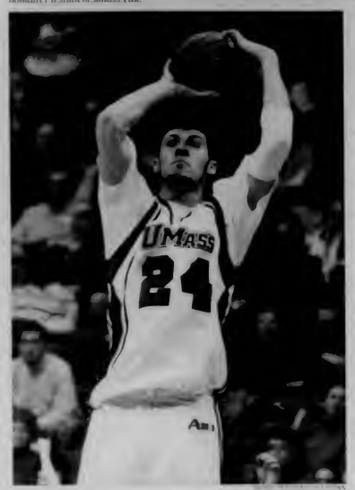
SIU is in a rebuilding year after losing its two leading scorers, Randal Falker and Matt Shaw, to graduation and is a young team with six players who played their first game against the Vulcans. Five of those players are incoming freshmen while sophomore Justin Boost is playing his first season after sitting out last year to catch up on his grades.

However, the Salukis expect to rely on guard Anthony Dillard and forward Anthony Booker to highlight the team's youth.

SIU's top newcomer is Tony Freeman who transferred from Iowa after averaging 13.8 points per game. However, Freeman will redshirt this season due to NCAA eligibility rules.



Their top returning player is point guard Bryan Mullins (10.7 ppg).

The Minutemen have had one prior meeting with SIU on Dec. 21, 1999. In their last meeting, the Salukies squeaked out a win against UMass, 65-63.

With a win against the Salukies, the Minutemen could find their way back to Madison Square Garden - a place they are very familiar with after last season's NIT run. The winner of this game will play No. 5 Duke on Nov. 20.

SIU is going to need a similar defensive game to its last meeting against UMass if it expects to advance in the tournament. Despite losing Gary Forbes to graduation, the Minutemen still have three strong scorers in Lowe, Ricky Harris and Anthony Gurley.

Regardless of what happens tonight, UMass' next game will be significantly tougher as Kellogg will return to the site of his former job

Minutewomen set for Spring

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

In its final tune-up of the fall season, the UMass women's tennis team held its own against the upper echelon schools of the Northeast in the Big Green Invitational.

The tournament began for UMass on Friday against Akron and Syracuse, and continued through Saturday against Temple. It concluded on Sunday against Boston University.

UMass struggled and was unable to pull out a victory against Temple (0-4 singles, 0-1 doubles), yet still impressed against Syracuse (3-5 singles, 4-1 doubles), Boston University (3-4 singles, 1-2 doubles) and Akron (2-3 singles, 2-1 doubles).

Though sophomore Tanisha Hodgson and seniors Laura Danaii and Stephanie Gimenez stepped up with victories at the fifth, sixth, and seventh flights, respectively, UMass dropped the top four flights in singles against the Orange.

However, UMass won three of four doubles matches, headlined by Danai and Hodgson combining for an 8-3 win at No. 3. SophomoreKaitlyn Carpenter and freshman Magdalena Ploch won 8-6 at No. 2 as well as senior Lauren MacKay and Gimenez securing a victory at No. 4.

Throughout the weekend, numerous mixed doubles teams were formed, including freshmen Gabriella Jannotta of UMass and Boston University's Inayat Khosla. The new duo was solid, going 1-1, losing only to UMass doubles team Gimenez and MacKay.

Standout Performances

Laura Danai finished 5-0 overall in the tournament, totaling 2-0 in singles play and 3-0 in doubles with sophomore Tanisha Hodgson.

Freshman Magdalena Ploch debuted in her first collegiate action with a strong performance, going 2-1 in singles play and 3-0 in doubles with Kaitlyn Carpenter. One of the three victories for the pair came at the expense of Boston University's doubles team, Vanessa Steiner and two-time reigning First Team All-American East member, Yana Sadovskaya. Ploch and Carpenter prevailed in what was a hard fought 3-6, 7-5 and 10-6 victory.

After beginning the season with the Eastern Collegiate Invitational, followed by a matchup with Connecticut and now the Big Green Invitational, the Minutewomen look poised to open up the spring campaign hosting Long Island on Sunday Feb. 1, 2009.

Binghamton down, invitational next

UMass men and women successful throughout pool

By Kyle Predki
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts swimming and diving teams notched another win as it defeated Binghamton this past weekend.

The dual match was the fourth of the season for the two teams, and the second of two consecutive away meets. This win also sets both teams' records to 3-1 and continues their winning streak to three.

The all-around performance of the both teams highlighted UMass' performance for the third week in a row. Both teams combined for 21 first place finishes (Men: 162-138, Women: 195-105), out of 32 events, with the women's team collecting 12 and the men accruing 11. The women's team was supported by top finishes by both of its relay teams.

By winning his two individual events and supporting his relay team, Nate Bromage earned this week's Atlantic 10 Conference Swimming and Diving Performer of the Week. Bromage clinched first in the 100 fly (51.57 seconds) and the 200 fly (1:56.59). His 400-free relay team placed first (3:10.65). Juan Moliere, Nick Shordon and Max Butler swam the remaining legs of the relay.

Elizabeth Walsh had another outstanding week. Walsh finished first in her two individual events, the 100 back (1:00.48) and 100 free (53.94). She swam the first leg of the first place 400-free relay, along with Christa Narus, Jennifer Corriveau and Kathryne Chalikis.

Narus finished first in the 100 fly (59.15) and second in the 500 free (5:23.12). Chalikis would follow Narus for second in the 100 fly (1:01.25) and put a first place win in the 50 free (25.03).

Freshman Kayla Tegeler stood out for the women as she won both of her individual events. Winning the 200 fly (2:10.97) and the 1000 free (10:53.90), Tegeler displayed her best performance of her young collegiate career.

Freshman Joey Shordon took two first place finishes for the Minutemen in the 1000 free (9:44.73) and 500 free (4:44.16). He also finished second in the 200 free (1:45.83).

Juan Moliere returned to his normal race schedule this week, finishing first in the 100 free (47.89) but falling to second in the 50 free (21.75). Along with assisting in the first place 400-free relay team, he helped the 200-free relay finish second (1:36.89).

Both diving teams proved their dominance once again, taking first place in all four events and accounting for 10 of the 12 top three spots in the diving events.

Freshman standout Jason Cook, A-10 Swimming and Diving Rookie of the Week, continued his impressive collegiate career as he clinched the first place spots in the 3-meter (310.65) and 1-meter (308.55) for the third week in a row.

Adam Duffield and John Clark collected points in the diving events. Duffield finished third in the 1-meter (255.53) and Clark placed third in the 3-meter (267.98).

Returning this week to her top diving spots was Karen Epperso. Epperso was forced to sit out last week with an injury, but shows no weakness as she placed first in both the 3-meter (279.75) and 1-meter (251.32) diving events. Anne Logarty and Sarah Hortsmann rounded out the top three with the second and third place spots in both events.

The two teams will have this weekend off as they prepare for the Terrier Invitational. The Terrier Invitational is always a favorite for the Minutemen and women. The invitational will take place on Nov. 21st, 22nd and 23rd at Boston University.

By defeating the Kent State Golden Flashes 1-0 Monday, the Minutewomen earned a trip to the NCAA Tournament. UMass will play No. 2 Syracuse on Saturday in the first round of the NCAA Tournament.

UMass off to second-straight NCAA Tournament appearance

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

For the second time in two years, the No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team is headed to the NCAA tournament after beating Kent State 1-0.

On one of the coldest days of the season, UMass had many opportunities to score. But Golden Flashes' goalie Caroline Suitch often smothered anything that came her way.

Junior forward Jill Powers scored the only goal in the contest, putting the Minutewomen (17-4) past No. 19 Kent State (12-5).

The goal came after a penalty corner that was deflected into the air and Powers tipped the ball in on a backhanded shot.

The Minutewomen had many fast-break opportunities early in the first half, partially because of smart lead-passing and moving the ball well in transition.

Freshman Alesha Widdall earned the win in goal for UMass, making four saves in her seventh shutout of the season. Widdall led a Minutewoman defense that allowed eight shots, only four of which were on goal. Midfielder Rachel Miller played opposite fellow Australian Makaela Potts, who didn't allow any of Miller's three shots to be on goal.

"We've worked hard for this," UMass coach Justine Sowry said of UMass' 21st trip to the NCAA tournament in program history. "It's truly a total team effort and we worked really hard across [all of] the lines. We would have had only ourselves to blame if we'd lost this match."

Early in the first half, the Minutewomen had the shot advantage, taking the first four shots and not allowing a Golden Flash shot for the first 15 minutes of the game. Kent State mustered only five shots to UMass' eight in the first half and the Golden Flashes were outshot 18-8 by game's end.

The Minutewomen ran the length of the field for the entire game and Kent State couldn't handle the pace of the game, often times finding themselves out of position and doing things to compensate.

| UMass | 1 |
| Kent State | 0 |

Many quick defensive adjustments for the Golden Flashes led to penalty corners for UMass, who had four in the first half and 10 by the end of the game.

The Maroon and White displayed great possession of the ball on corners, gaining five second-chance shots in three opportunities.

UMass earned penalty shots almost five minutes apart in the first half as they kept the pressure on the KSU defense in the circle. The UMass defense line boxed out the Kent State forwards to prevent any second-chance opportunities.

The Minutewomen appeared to slow down by the end of the first half but returned with a much stronger showing of intensity in the second frame. Both forward Cher King and Potts were given green cards when the referees saw play get too aggressive.

Later in the half, Potts was called for an illegal takedown of a Kent State player and given a yellow card.

Even while playing a player-down, the UMass defense only allowed two shots for the remainder of the game.

With experience on a gold medal-winning United States team at this year's Junior Pan Am Games, Widdall's leadership played a major factor in the Minutewomen winning the play-in game for the second straight year.

"It feels amazing to win," Widdall said of defeating the Golden Flashes. "And not only that but just to be part of this team and be going to the NCAA [tournament]."

Powers' history in field hockey is equally as interesting. After spending two seasons at URI, the field hockey program disbanded and she was left without a team until she came to UMass. Until becoming a Minutewoman, Powers didn't know if she'd ever play the game again and now she's going to the sport's national collegiate tournament because of her game-winning goal.

"I just can't stop smiling," Powers said of being part of this UMass team. "I can't describe it. I never thought a year ago that I'd be playing and now we're going to the NCAA tournament. It's unbelievable."

The team gathered last night to watch the selection show via webcast to see who and where they will play on Saturday in the Sweet Sixteen. The first and second rounds of the tournament will be held Saturday and Sunday, with the championship games on the 21st and 23rd at the University of Louisville.

UMass will face No. 3 seeded Syracuse (20-1) in the first round of the NCAA Tournament on Saturday. This will be a rematch of when The Minutewomen overcame a four-goal deficit at halftime to nearly upset the then-No. 2 Orange, who won by a final score of 5-4.

The game will be held in Syracuse, N.Y. at 11:30 a.m. The winner will play the victor of the Princeton, Penn State game, which will be played later that day at 2 p.m.

Filled with emotion, UMass delivers

Stingy defense holds powerful, potent Kent State offense

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

For the final six minutes, 20 seconds of Tuesday's NCAA tournament play-in game, the No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team proved that it could play the same type of lockdown defense it had all game with 10 players instead of 11.

Holding on to a one goal lead, the Minutewomen (17-4) were in the process of defending a surge by No. 19 Kent State when UMass midfielder Makaela Potts was hit with a yellow card.

The call, at such a vital point in the game, was enough to set off UMass coach Justine Sowry on the sideline.

"In the state of the game, you can get emotional. At the time, I didn't think it was warranted. I thought she came in with a legal tackle," Sowry said. "But after thinking about it and talking to a couple of people, perhaps it was warranted."

Sowry's players, however, were less forgiving to the officials.

"It was just a cumulative thing. They were thinking about her past tackles and she just got unlucky," sophomore defender Jackie Tait said.

Up to that point, the Minutewomen had held the Golden Flashes (17-5), which has the 16th best offense in the country, scoreless. Kent State tallied eight shots in the game, as UMass rarely allowed the Golden Flashes in the offensive zone.

Coming into the game, the Minutewomen placed their focus defensively on sophomore midfielder Rachel Miller and the team's offensive leader – freshman forward Debbie Bell.

"We were just trying to shut [Bell] down and make sure she doesn't get any quick shots off," junior defender Christine Rodgers said. "We were focused on her, but we were also focused on everyone they brought."

The UMass defense was able to shut down the Golden Flashes' two top scorers and limited Bell, who is the nation's fifth best scorer, to only one shot in the game.

While Bell is the team's most prolific player, she only plays for

Minutemen win first, prepare for So. Illinois

Defense and quality shooting night vital in Minutemen win

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

It might have not been the most thrilling way to open the season, but Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg will take a 1-0 record any day.

The Minutemen (1-0) downed Arkansas-Monticello in the first round of the Coaches vs. Cancer Classic, 90-71. After the Boll Weevils took a 33-31 lead with 3 minutes, 40 seconds to go in the first half, UMass put pressure on the defensive end and went on a 13-0 run.

"Defensively, I want to make sure our team is the hardest working one out there," redshirt senior Tony Gaffney said, who finished with 16 points and 13 rebounds.

The Minutemen also saw an improved effort from point guard Chris Lowe (18 points, 11 assists). As a former point guard himself, Kellogg is expecting the team's success to ride on Lowe's performance throughout the season.

|---|---|
| UMass | 90 |
| So. Illinois | 71 |

"How Chris Lowe goes is how our team is going to go," Kellogg said. "Our style of play is conducive to having a very good point guard."

Despite having a poor shooting night (7-for-19), junior Ricky Harris was on fire from 3-point territory (5-for-9), and finished with 22 points.

As a whole, the Minutemen had a great shooting night from beyond the arc, finishing with 11 baskets from beyond the arc. UMass was four 3-pointers away from tying its record for most 3-point field goals against Temple (1997) and Wisconsin-Green Bay (Nov. 17, 2007).

While the loss may be overwhelming for UAM, the Division II season doesn't start until Friday so the game only counts as an exhibition. The next game against California (Pa.) will count as an exhibition for both teams and will be played today at 11 a.m. in an empty SIU arena.

UMass' next opponent is Southern Illinois. The Salukis (1-0) don't have a roster that will impress anyone, but they have had a fair amount of success in the improved Missouri Valley Conference.

The most impressive win came

Flag display honors veterans

By Sadie Trombetta
Collegian Staff

On Tuesday, Nov. 11, the UMass Republican Club began its Veteran's Awareness Week in honor of Veterans Day. As part of the recognition, members set up flags on the Student Union lawn.

"The visual creates a better sense of reality," said UMass Republican Club President Greg Collins. "We have been doing it for the last couple years."

Thousands of students passed by the 240 flags staked into the ground on their way to class, the library or the Campus Center.

Jenna Tessier, sophomore political science major, stood back and carefully took in the sight.

"I think it's important for us to recognize this holiday," she said. "I mean, most of us just enjoy the day off from classes without considering its meaning. I think this display really gives us all a chance to reflect on the hard work and dedication of not only our veterans but also soldiers overseas today."

The Republican Club set up a table in front of the display with information about veterans. They also collected donations for Disabled American Veterans (DAV).

The DAV works toward improving the lives of disabled veterans and their families through free aid and benefits and aims to make sure they are not forgotten by lawmakers, according to the group's Web site. Because the DAV is not a governmental agency it relies on member dues and contributions for funding.

"I think they [veterans] frequently go unrecognized for their efforts," said Collins. "They're over-

Students join UM task force

By William McGuinness
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association President Malcolm Chu and Student Trustee Lindsay McCluskey took positions on Chancellor Robert Holub's Budget Planning Task Force yesterday.

Each maintained that student participation in the University's response to a 5 percent reduction of its budget is needed, though they are making no promises.

The board consists of 14 professors, two undergraduates and one graduate student charged with making decisions essential to the University of Massachusetts' growth during an economic crisis.

The UMass budget recently took a $12 million hit, one it is believed will have major effects on student fees, tuition and faculty recruitment.

Holub has previously said he hoped to bring the University to the upper tier of research institutions. He admitted the nation's financial crisis was unforeseen, but said progress is not impossible during a period of cuts.

Chu said a happy ending is unlikely given the financial situation.

"I don't expect students to be happy with the outcome," he said. "I don't expect to be happy with it myself."

Holub said the main effects of the University's budget cuts are yet to be seriously felt. Major decisions will be made closer to the end of the semester, when Holub said the board will be better able to contextualize mid-year budget cuts.

"You can't take people out of the classroom, you can't cut programs in the middle of the semester," Holub said.

He is instead asking the task force to look for "what areas are less central to the campus mission" and "consider other revenue sources."

The task force originally consisted of only the 14 professors, but Chu and McCluskey pushed for a more formal role. The chancellor was holding input from the community through a Web site put up specifically to address the budget cuts as well as informing the campus of his actions via e-mail and the University's Web site.

Chu and McCluskey were concerned about the accessibility of information despite its being public.

Inequality in women's sports

New study finds Title IX may not be insuring equal funding

By Ricky Flynn
Collegian Staff

For many years, women's sports have taken a back seat to men's sports and struggled to attain the level of attention and revenue that men's sports have always received.

"Title IX is a federal statute that was created to prohibit sex discrimination in education programs that receive federal financial assistance," says the National Collegiate Athletic Association's Web site. However, there has recently been some dispute as to whether it is achieving its intended goals.

Initially, Title IX did not include athletic teams established inside of educational systems. This led to the 1974 passing of the Javits Amendment, which required that Title IX include a section about equal treatment of athletic associations of different sexes.

Since the Javits amendment, colleges have been required to give equally-proportional funding to men and women's sports. However a recent study revealed that schools have been drifting away from Title IX's rules.

"A biennial gender equity report released without fanfare by the NCAA on Thursday [Oct. 30] finds that colleges that play Division I sports directed a smaller proportion of athletics spending to women's teams in 2005-06 than they did in 2003-04," according to an article from Inside Higher Ed.com.

The trend appears to be that the larger the school is in terms of athletics, the larger the difference in men's and women's athletic funding.

According to the article, Division I schools with a football team split their funding 70 percent for men and 30 percent for women, while Division I schools without a football team divvied their funding 52 percent for men 48 for women.

Division II schools stayed consistent with their funding from 2003-04, at a ratio of 58 percent to 42 percent for men and women, respectively.

Division III schools have decreased the spending ratio from 58 percent for men and 42 percent for women to 56 percent for men and 44 percent for respectively.

"Other data in the NCAA report suggest that the major sports of football and men's basketball are responsible for most of the diverging fortunes of men's and women's sports programs," the Inside Higher Ed article said. "The average Division I college spent $7,095,000 of the $8,635,600 it laid out on men's teams on these two sports."

At the University of Massachusetts, where there is an active athletics program with a number of nationally recognized and some nationally ranked teams, Title IX's rules are followed to a degree similar to that found in the Inside Higher Ed article.

While female athletes make up 49 percent of the athletic population on campus, women's athletics are given 42 percent of athletic related student aid.

According to the Equity in Athletics Data Analysis, of the $4,001,633 spent by the University on athletics, $1,345,682 is spent on women's athletics, which accounts for 34 percent of total expenditures.

The money spent on men's football and basketball accounts for some of the ## Author and veteran relate war experience

By Sean McDonough
Collegian Staff

In honor of Veterans Day, author Kirsten Holmstedt and veteran Rachel McNeill spoke Tuesday about the combat experiences of women at the University of Massachusetts.

Holmstedt discussed her new book "Band of Sisters: American women at War in Iraq," while McNeill related some of her experiences as a Marine in Iraq.

After a brief introduction from Andrew Masciola, the president of the UMass Veterans and Service Members Association (VASMA), Holmstedt began by asking all of the veterans in attendance to stand so she could thank them. She said she never served in the military, but her interest started when she was living in Jacksonville, N.C., the home of Marine Corps Base Camp Lejeune.

There she said she would often see women soldiers about to be deployed to and returning from Iraq and Afghanistan.

In her book she said she wanted to represent as many branches, locations and ranks as possible so that many women in the armed forces could relate to it.

"Women are really resilient and I think the public underestimates them. The military underestimates them," Holmstedt said.

"They love their country as much as their male brothers in arms and they want to serve with them [but] women are often treated like second-class citizens

Sen. Kerry on secretary of state shortlist

By Shalini Jayarama
Collegian Staff

There is one question everybody has been asking in Massachusetts political circles: Will John Kerry be the next United States secretary of state?

By now it is well-known that Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) is considered a possibility for the position in President-elect Barack Obama's administration.

John Kerry was re-elected on Tuesday to serve another six-year term by Massachusetts voters. If Kerry is appointed secretary of state, the question will become one centered around who will fill the empty Senate position.

According to state law, a special election must be held in which Massachusetts citizens vote for a new senator.

Some have proposed the idea of appointing Massachusetts Gov. Deval Patrick to the position, although such practice is not approved by the state's constitution.

Ed O'Reilly, former Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate, suggests in an online blog that a new bill be passed that allows Patrick to appoint a senator on the condition that the appointee will not run for re-election in the next statewide election. According to O'Reilly, money that would go toward a special election can go instead toward improving public health and education.

He said that if Patrick appoints a senator on the conditions he suggested, the appointee "will speak boldly for 'ordinary' working people, fight special interests and not worry about being re-elected," he said.

Michael Hannahan, a political science professor at the University of Massachusetts, said that when it comes to public office, the best policy is to stick with the law.

"I don't think we should do what we think is right or wrong," he said. "I think they should do whatever is currently in the constitution."

Several students echoed Hannahan's sentiments.

"[The process] should follow constitutional rules of the state and not digress from pre-defined laws for such scenarios," said UMass freshman Avital Perchet.

"You don't get to change the rules just because you like or dislike someone," said fellow student Shawn Flynn.

"The law is a special election. So that's what's going to happen," said political science major Rebecca Hoell, also a freshman.

The law changed from appointment to special election before Mitt Romney took office as governor.

"[The Massachusetts House and Senate] didn't want Romney to be able to appoint a senator" said Flynn. "They might as well have it the way it is. It gives more power to the people."

New grant to advance RFID technology

By Adam P. Coulter
Collegian Staff

Three engineers at the University of Massachusetts have received a $200,000 National Science Foundation Cyber Trust grant to develop cheaper and more secure radio-frequency identification technology (RFID).

These identification technologies, called tags, are found in numerous everyday items such as driver's licenses, toll passes, inventoried commercial products and military supplies.

"In most cases, the idea is to securely identify an object," said Wayne Burleson, professor of electrical and computer engineering at UMass. "The object could be a person, a box, a product, a weapon, etc. By securely identifying, we can prevent counterfeiting and misuse, as well as allowing easy inventorying."

Burleson worked with colleagues Dennis Goeckel and Robert Jackson to improve the current RFID equipment by maintaining security and improving efficiency.

They focused on RFID because businesses and governments are now finding an increased use for the technology and "system breaches can lead to financial loss, identity theft and other privacy compromises," Burleson said.

The most recent local high-profile case of a system violation occurred with the Boston MBTA Charlie Cards RFID system. Researchers based in

Transition back to civilian life poses difficulty for many vets

they were on their base, they often dealt with rocket attacks.

McNeill also mentioned the transition back to civilian life.

"The hardest part was coming back to school with people who had no idea what the experiences, not just women, but men as well, are going though over there," she said. "The most important thing people can do is learn, talk to people, talk to veterans."

McNeill also fielded a question about sexual harassment in the military, after an audience member cited a statistic stating that one out of every seven women in the military reported being sexually harassed in some way.

McNeill said that there was sexual harassment that occurred and that people were sometimes pressured not to do anything about it because of the effects it could have on the perpetrator's career.

When asked how universities can help the transition back to civilian life McNeill said, "The most important thing a school can do is to eliminate the stress of getting into school."

She said the paperwork related to getting into school is a bit much to deal with while still transitioning into civilian life and universities should have more resources to help veterans to help with that.

VASMA was created in 2005 by veterans at the University to aid in that transition from military to student life.

"We thought the event went well, it was a nice way to say 'Thank you' to female veterans and let their story be heard," said Andrew Masciola, the VASMA president. "We do events like these so that people are aware that there are soldiers and veterans on campus."

"Military women are all too often misunderstood or ignored by the general public, and we feel this event will highlight the complexity and diversity of their lives, experiences, and sacrifices," said VASMA Treasurer Jon Yee. "We thought it would be a good opportunity for people to learn about military women, they are a very underrepresented demographic, especially on a college campus."

The event was co-hosted by The Military Community Resource Center, and the Everywoman's Center.

seas, doing work we don't see in America."

He said lack of recognition was why the Republican Club started its annual awareness week.

The Republican Club will conclude its awareness week with the playing of Taps, a musical piece played during U.S. military flag ceremonies and funerals and a moment of silence at 5:30 p.m. Thursday on the Student Union lawn. The club will then host a presentation by the Vets for Freedom at 7 p.m. in room 168 of the Campus Center.

Vets for Freedom is a nonpartisan group whose mission "is to educate the American public about the importance of achieving success in these conflicts by applying our first-hand knowledge to issues of American strategy and tactics in Iraq," according to its Web site.

"It doesn't matter if you support the current war or not," said Tessier. "We need to support our troops fighting for our freedom, and we need to appreciate the veterans who have fought for our democracy in the past".

UMass faces 'real danger'

In addition to their participation on the board, they hope to drum up student support following the next cabinet meeting. They echoed Holub's goal to make the task force a panel of consensus – and hope that students' taking a greater roll will ease tension between students and the administration.

"We don't want it to get to the point where there's a massive mobilization against fees," Chu said, adding that he is not looking to battle other constituencies. "They're planning on raising student fees, and that's a problem. But at the same time, students need to be aware of the process. This is the biggest issue we face by far as a student body and as a campus."

Holub said Chu's and McCluskey's influence on the board will be appropriate to their arguments. He said the board will be asked to help establish the University's priorities.

"I've instructed [the board] not to consider themselves as an interest group but to base decisions on what is best for the campus as a whole," Holub said.

However, Chu and McCluskey said their main interest is the student body.

"We have a real danger to face," Chu said. "The worst thing I could see happen is a massive fee hike and massive cuts to student programs."

Researchers hope to boost security of tags

the Netherlands successfully cracked the MIFARE Classic cryptographic cipher used in many mass transit systems around the world.

In 2006, a new generation of credit cards using the RFID technology caused controversy and demonstrations that exposed the harm, which resulted from their data being relayed by radio waves, allowing opportunity for a "digital eavesdropper" to steal the card's info.

"As a real threat to a consumer that threat really doesn't exist," said Brian Triplett, senior vice president for emerging-product development for Visa, in a New York Times article.

The RFID security depends on scrambling or encoding information digitally in the tag before it goes to the reader, which is a fairly energy-intense process.

The UMass researchers are exploring a data encryption method that would use ultra-wideband (UWB) radio waves instead, leading to less energy output.

"The main advantage, we hope, is that the tag will consume less energy and hence will have a longer battery life," Burleson said. "In addition, the tag could be cheaper since it will have less circuitry."

Using this method, the tag would send simpler, low-power coded pulses "buried in everyday background noise," said Goeckel.

The engineering and computer science research team members, in collaboration with RSA Labs, hope the current project will lead to a second phase, although developing a more complete prototype of a UWB RFID tag requires more money.

"A real chip design with UWB radio will require more funding," said Burleson.

If the second phase commences, there will be new challenges to address.

"Advanced signal processing methods for dealing with interference and jamming, commercialization and licensing of the technology will also be explored," he said.

difference in spending. Nearly half of the school's spending on men's sports goes to men's basketball and football.

Excluding football and men and women's basketball, total spending on athletics is $2,208,072. Spending by the school on women's sports excluding basketball is $978,975, or 44 percent.

"In recent years, most Division I colleges have tended to deal with financial shortfalls by cutting back on men's sports other than football and men's basketball, which has often led advocates for those sports to blame the push for gender equity [...] for their plight," the article said.

SNOW EMERGENCY PARKING – ESSENTIAL PERSONNEL - *ONLY WITH APPROPRIATE PERMIT

During a snow emergency closing period, essential personnel who report to work may only park in the following areas:

Lot 21 (west of Southwest)
Lot 25 (west of Physical Plant and north of roadway to Yellow lot only)
Lot 30 (adjacent to Power Plant)
Lot 31 (north of Engineering and Lederle Graduate Research Center)
Lot 32 (west of Lincoln Avenue only, closest to Prince Dormitory)
Lot 34 (south of Isenberg, SOM)
Lot 62 (south of Morrill Science Center)
Lot 63 Worcester Dining Common lot only (west of Worcester D.C.)

SUGGESTIONS / IDEAS FOR PARKING "SMART" ON A SNOW DAY ...

1. Park your vehicle next to other parked vehicles.
2. Use the UMass bus service.
3. Car pool rides whenever possible.
4. Walk if possible.
5. Have someone drop you off.
6. If space is not available in your assigned lot, go to either Lot 25 (north of roadway) or Yellow lot (south west of Physical Plant). During snow conditions, it is not possible to guarantee normal lot capacity will be available.
7. If you receive a parking citation and believe it was improperly issued, you may appeal it at Parking Services within 14 days from the date issued. Appeals can be submitted in writing, appealed in person to the Hearing Clerk, or appealed online at https://parking.umass.edu

RESCHEDULING OF FINAL EXAMS ON OFFICIAL SNOW DAYS - FALL 2008

In order to reschedule final examinations in case of snow, two alternate exam periods have been devised. They are 6:30 p.m. and 8:45 p.m. each exam day. The use of these alternative periods in the event of closings is outlined below. This policy goes into effect ONLY if the University is officially closed. The snow day Hot Line is 545-3630. If the University is open, all exams are expected to take place as scheduled. Each faculty member should inform his or her class of the planned time and location of the rescheduled final exam in the event of a snow day. All rescheduled exams will be held in the same location as published in the final exam schedule.

Revitalizing ComCol

Dear Commonwealth College, The Dean's Book Course is not working.

Let's be honest: the DBC does not accomplish its well-intentioned goals and draws tremendous ire from honors students. We walk out of the class without a meaningful skills exercise and feeling like we've spent a few weeks checking out a book club.

Steven Hoeschele

Commonwealth College is clearly chaffed by Dean's Book, because its leadership has instituted a couple "experimental" sections to try out different approaches to the course. My understanding is that ComCol is looking to scrap the program and start from scratch. Let's drop the snarky commentary surrounding DBC and talk earnestly about why.

The DBC is supposed to fulfill the general education 'interdisciplinary' requirement: great idea. But we already take Gen-Eds (including some "I" courses) for that express purpose.

It's supposed to help network honors students among various majors: understandable, if not elitist in nature. But we already take several honors classes with people from other random majors – with the exception of STPEC students, whose intense core classes are already designated with that "I."

ComCol, your heart is in the right place, but you're working from an ineffective plan. The honors program is clearly thinking about how to graduate some of UMass' brightest students, many of whom will continue on in academia. And so ComCol should be investing us with skills training to prepare us for what lies after UMass.

Frankly, we're not getting that from the Dean's Book Course system. Some of these skills are covered, but only glossed over; we give poster presentations and learn a bit about research. But the course isn't taking time to really train us on public speaking, for example, and give constructive feedback.

Yes, the books make it a little more fun – if you like the one assigned – but fun isn't always the point. That's not what students need from Commonwealth College, which was reorganized several years ago to be the state's vanguard of higher education.

We don't just need to graduate with 'cum laude' on our résumés, but we need skills training in order to confidently tackle the tasks handed to us at the job site or in grad school.

So, ComCol administrators, here is my recommendation: keep the three single-credit system, but ditch the book approach and impart students with concrete skills.

ComCol, your heart is in the right place, but you're working from an ineffective plan.

Course One: Research, Research, Research. Break it down into hard science and social science tracks. Some seniors don't know how to cite, and not until my senior year did a professor mandate that we learn the ropes of the library databases. That's simply not right.

Course Two: Public speaking, to include poster presentations, panel discussions, keynote addresses and even rally speeches. It's clear that many young people don't have the skills or courage to speak in a small circle, let alone a crowd of elders.

Course Three: Grant-writing. Yeah, it won't be the most exciting class, but grads will thank the dean personally when they write their first grant application – without help – at the age of 23. It is a travesty that anyone should graduate from a four-year college without grant-writing experience.

Now, if ComCol administrators want this program to run in succession, you could mandate a single project for all three components, similar to the Citizen Scholars Program approach.

Students dive into a research topic related to their major or minor for Course One. Then they hone speaking skills and present on that same subject for Course Two. Finally, by their senior year, they're actually drafting a grant to research the issue further. Who knows, maybe they'll actually score some money.

ComCol offers research grants for Capstone Experiences. Perhaps if they mandated each senior to submit that application during his or her third skills course would make the process more competitive (and thus a greater prestige).

Another component that would need to change: the DBC system draws professors from all kinds of fields, which is great for fostering the interdisciplinary nature it seeks. I have a communications professor for DBC this semester, and while I'm sure she'd make an awesome instructor on public speaking, the nature of the DBC is withholding her expertise from us.

So each instructor needs to be proficient in the skill each class explicitly addresses. Hire reference librarians or legal clerks to teach the research classes. Communication professors or even elected officials would make great public speaking instructors. My congressman teaches at UMass; why not others? And nearly any non-profit administrator or professor who's obtained at least three grants could teach the grant-writing course.

None of these changes are outside the realm of reason or practicality of administration. In fact, the process of revamping this specific Honors component is underway as we speak. Now is the time for thoughtful input from students.

So finally, ComCol, if you like my ideas and are looking for someone with teaching and organizing experience and an interdisciplinary degree with 'cum laude' next to it, I know the right guy to help institute this new program. I graduate in May.

Budget crisis

Facing $24.6 million in budget cuts for the University of Massachusetts system – $11 million from the Amherst flagship campus alone – in the wake of the international financial crisis, Chancellor Robert Holub sent an e-mail to the campus community on Oct. 15.

"By taking these one-time budget actions now, we will not request mid-year fee increases, nor will we make cuts to student financial aid," Holub wrote in the e-mail.

Holub's e-mail was a small but valuable reassurance to the student community, many of whom were worried about the status of their financial aid in an unstable economic climate. Holub was reassuring but not unrealistic.

"Virtually all economic indicators predict that this downturn is significant and will not be easily reversed," he said. Based on the loss of $11 million, 5 percent of the University's budget, he announced a freeze on all hiring except "critical, strategic positions."

These are not the circumstances under which Holub had anticipated taking the reigns of a burgeoning research university.

But to his credit, setting up a task force, as he alluded to in his e-mail, was a step in the right direction. The chancellor's office also set up a Web site, umass.edu/chancellor/budget.html, to field questions, comments and concerns from the campus community.

Holub was also receptive to constructive criticism of his plan from Student Government Association (SGA) officials. President Malcolm Chu and Student Trustee Lindsay McCluskey approached Holub with concerns that students were underrepresented in the administration's evaluation of the UMass budget.

Although Holub solicited student input via his Web site, the original incarnation of his "task force" consisted of 14 faculty members appointed by Faculty Senate leadership, it excluded other campus constituencies. While the administration had assured students and staff that they would have their best interest in mind when handling budget considerations, last year's student strike is evidence that such claims don't always hold water.

Chu and McCluskey advocated direct student involvement with the process and are, as of yesterday, officially on the Budget Planning Task Force that Holub publicized in a subsequent e-mail to the campus community on Nov. 6.

Furthering those suggestions, the administration has expanded the task force to include University staff representatives, as well as a yet-to-be-determined representative from the Graduate Student Senate. As soon as a graduate student representative is selected, Holub said the task force will begin taking an intensive look at the University's budget, aiming to minimize the impact of the financial crisis on campus.

Past administrations have said much about student involvement in University affairs, and ended up doing very little. Holub's accessibility and willingness to engage with student leadership – even, and especially, if they disagree – should be commended.

Hard times lay ahead for UMass students, as they do for most students given the current fiscal situation. Mid-year fee increases and cuts to financial aid were avoided, but could very well become a reality come spring.

The Budget Planning Task Force has their work cut out for them. But at the very least, a few of its members will have your interest in mind.

Yes we can talk to Iran

John Glaser

I'm thankful McCain lost, but an Obama presidency gets me about as giddy as I've been these past eight years under Bush. That is, not at all.

I sure felt left out when clusters of jaunty, overjoyed students screamed into the night, enthusiastically hugging each other in warm embrace, convinced their problems would evaporate with the passing old-world Bush years and that Barack Obama would fulfill every dream they envisioned in their unencumbered Election Night ecstasy.

A friend then thoughtfully changed the chants and cheers to regard the decriminalization of marijuana which, I think, enjoyed more support among the student body than Obama and about which I could earnestly join in the celebration. What are friends for, right?

There is one aspect of this prospective wave of Obama-induced change for which I am admittedly hopeful. And that's Iran.

No, this isn't because Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad released a statement congratulating Obama's victory, despite the power this event had in convincing people that even Ahmadinejad was voting Democrat in '08.

The real reason I'm hopeful (kind of) is because Obama has said it would be his policy to engage Iran in open unconditional talks with Iranian officials. This actually would constitute change.

Five successive U.S. administrations have failed to make progress on the Iranian front, the telling common denominator being that all five have refused unconditional negotiations, embracing instead a consistent policy of hawkish antagonism.

With a people and a leadership uniquely at odds with ours since our CIA covertly overthrew their legitimate, democratically-elected government in 1953 and installed our clients the Shah, Iran is now at the forefront of our foreign policy obligations.

Making significant progress on any of our other Middle Eastern concerns – Iraq, Afghanistan, an Israeli-Palestinian deal, et cetera – will be dramatically more difficult without positive developments in our relationship with Iran.

Can open-unconditional talks promised by Obama rekindle a constructive relationship with Iran

Part of this is because of Bush policies that have thrust Iran into the role of the singular superpower in the region. Saddam Hussein's Iraq and the Taliban's Afghanistan, both neighboring adversaries of Iran, have been toppled and are mired in continuing wars with our military, effectively fostering Iran's ascendance as the preeminent regional hegemony.

So much for Bush stickin' it to Iran.

Additionally, Iran is sandwiched directly in the middle of Iraq and Afghanistan, where we have more than 140,000 troops and 30,000 troops, respectively. We have at least 36 Navy warships, two aircraft carriers and 25,000 troops directly south of Iran in the Persian Gulf as well as military bases in every one of the gulf's states except Iran.

Funny that the media would have you believe that they are the instigators.

The hawkish confrontational approach of the Bush administration actually cost us valuable progress with Iran. After the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Iran (then led by moderate President Mohammad Khatami) strongly condemned the attacks and actually cooperated with the United States in the fight with the Taliban in Afghanistan. U.S.-Iran diplomats met on an almost monthly basis.

And then in 2002 Bush slumped Iran in with Iraq and North Korea in a group he called the 'axis of evil.' In the next elections in 2005, conservative hawk Ahmadinejad would be elected and our hopes for diplomacy with Iran effectively sunk. This was a missed opportunity spoiled by hostile unilateralism toward Iran.

Can open-unconditional talks promised by Obama rekindle a constructive relationship with Iran? Maybe. It certainly couldn't hurt to at least recognize the potential coinciding interests between Iran and the U.S.

On Iraq, popular vote has brought a majority of Shiites to power in government there, which certainly pleases the Iranians. They also agree with Obama and most Americans that we should begin significant troop withdrawals.

With a development like that (if Obama keeps his promises) Iran would no longer have a need to support militant insurgents against our troops, because there would no longer be an occupation.

On Iran's support for Hamas and Hezbollah, these are actions of desperation. These are the types of actions for states which have been put through decades of tough economic sanctions and international isolation, who have been deprived of a formal voice in global affairs.

It's not unreasonable to begin negotiations by eliminating the economic sanctions on Iran (considering they've produced exactly zero desired results) and integrating them into the international community to give them a political voice so that they don't have to rely on violence to pursue their ends.

On the nuclear issue, Iranian diplomats have stated clearly that they would only consider suspending their uranium enrichment programs with a security guarantee from the United States, that we put regime change and military options off the table at least temporarily.

Since nearly three decades of antagonism and isolation, driven by hawks and war-mongers that apparently lose sleep over the fact that Ahmadinejad denies the Holocaust but still loves Mel Gibson, have proven utterly ineffective and even counterproductive to our interests, we should embrace Obama's call for negotiations.

He's just got to keep his promises.

Around Campus

A lofty task force

S.P. Sullivan

Robert Holub had no idea what he was getting into. When the University of Massachusetts chancellor arrived on campus in May, he said at a press conference that for a public research institution, fiscal responsibility is key.

"At the end of the day, it's just as important or more important to use the funding that you have in as effective a manner as possible," Holub said.

Now he's gotta put his money where his mouth is.

In the wake of the $11 million budget cuts to University funding following September's financial crisis, Holub initiated a task force to assess the UMass budget. Inaugurated in a campus-wide e-mail from the chancellor, the Budget Planning Task Force was created to help the administration make smart, egalitarian cuts in the best interest of the campus community as a whole.

But for a while, the task force panel looked a little – well, old.

The original task force consisted of 14 faculty members, but no students or University staff. Student Government Association President Malcolm Chu and Student Trustee Lindsay McCluskey approached Holub with a reasonable question:

Remember us?

"Lindsay and I expressed some issues we had with the e-mail that really pushed for transparency and accountability," Chu said in an interview Wednesday. They suggested to Holub that he include students and staff in budget considerations, considering an awful lot of that money is theirs.

Unlike administrators in the past, Holub is much more receptive to student input. That's why you're probably not going to see any devil-horned Holub effigies at the next large gathering. Mike Gargano could've learned a thing or two.

He said in an interview Wednesday that he was going to get around to it one way or another.

"I always had the notion to consult with campus constituencies," he said. "The only question was how to go about that."

This isn't the administration that brought you the undergraduate student strike, but UMass didn't exactly undergo a regime change, either.

Chu said he and McCluskey pushed for four undergraduate representatives and two graduate student representatives. Holub split the deck; the task force now includes Chu, McCluskey and a graduate student not yet chosen, in addition to a few non-faculty staff members.

Chu said it isn't ideal. But it's workable.

"We were originally looking for four undergraduate representatives and two graduate students," he said. "I still maintain that it would be more appropriate considering there are 14 faculty members on the panel, but we're looking to move forward with the two spots we were given."

Holub stressed that the student body would be represented on the task force regardless of whether or not any undergrads were on the board. .

"I think they'll be given their say whether they're on the task force or not," he said.

This isn't the administration that brought you the undergraduate student strike, but UMass didn't exactly undergo a regime change, either. Forgive me if I don't take your word for it, Bob.

Of course, Holub put students on the task force, and UMass students would be wise to stay on top of Chu and McCluskey to advocate for cash-strapped students. Chu said his cabinet is assessing the situation and will be trying to inform students as soon as possible.

"Once we know our set plan, we'll be getting out there with an awareness campaign," he said.

But both Holub and Chu are looking at more than just the silver lining.

"Virtually all economic indicators predict that this downturn is significant and will not be easily reversed – here in Massachusetts or around the world," Holub wrote in his initial e-mail to the campus. "Therefore, we must immediately begin discussions to deal strategically with this fiscal crisis and the base budget reductions these cuts represent in the next fiscal year's budget."

Yet Holub's rallying cry when he arrived on campus was an increased focus on making UMass the best. Research. Institution. Ever.

And in an economic slump, Chu is worried that undergraduate education will suffer, and rightly so.

"Unfortunately, when the state deprioritizes the University as a whole, because research brings in so much money from corporate donors, that's what gets prioritized," he said.

The task force, of course, should look at the UMass budget holistically. Students, staff, faculty and those guys that squat on the couches in the Campus Center basement all have a stake in the inevitable trimming of UMass' fat.

While the Budget Planning Task Force will operate more on consensus than a vote-by-vote basis, I wondered how much sway the SGA officials' opinions would hold.

"As much as the weight of their arguments, I guess," Holub said.

Let's hope Chu brings his megaphone.

A question for the ballots

Too much power to the people

Michael Phillis

There is a danger in too much democracy.

America was founded on what was an elitist principle that leaders should make decisions. The Constitution was written to try to protect minority rights and separate the common man from the elected official.

To this end, James Madison, author of many of the Federalist Papers said, "Democracies have been found incompatible with personal security or the rights of property; and in general been as short in their lives as they have been violent in their death."

As time has progressed, the nation has been for a more democratic America. It was this principle that would seemingly give ballot questions their validity.

The most famous ballot question around the country this year was Proposition 8 out of California asking voters to eliminate gay marriage. The initiative passed. This question was a serious blow to gay rights and was made not by legislatures or an educated arm of the government but by the often naive citizen.

What kind of progress would have been made if civil rights were put up for a vote in Georgia or Alabama or Kentucky in the 1960s?

A good measure of the impact of majority rule can be found by thinking back on the defining moments of American history. What kind of progress would have been made if civil rights were put up for a vote in Georgia, Alabama or Kentucky in the 1960s?

Simply put, there are many issues where the majority may not know best. Slavery was extremely popular in our history, established religion was at one time very popular and a women's right to choose or even to vote at one point in our nation's history would never have been passed.

Ballot questions give authority to a majority; a majority that is sometimes harmful.

Let's take a more local example in Massachusetts. Question 1 on this year's ballot asked voters whether or not they preferred a speedy elimination of the state's income tax.

While Massachusetts (thankfully) does not have ballot questions that instantly become law if they are passed like in California, they are still taken very seriously.

With an issue as important as eliminating the income tax, think of the people you may deal with on a regular basis. There is that guy in class that asks questions that you know the professor just explained 30 seconds ago. There is also that friend who can't name the vice president (Dick Cheney).

With the ballot question system in place those, we'll say slightly less well-informed people, have an equal say about the future of the income tax as an economist who studies the consequences of tax policy. Is this really the smartest way to make decisions?

We have a system that works well even if our government can be frustrating and slow. Everybody gets to vote for someone who is then elected to office. We elect people, as a state, nation or town, to make the right decisions because we believe in those people, their ideas and abilities.

It's important to remember that, as good as it may feel to think that you have a say on some issue and that our country is 'democratic' in nature, we have these barriers up to protect minority groups and a sustain a stable nation.

One positive side to ballot initiatives is that they make the average citizen feel more involved in the political process. However, it is the job of journalists, politicians and indeed individuals themselves, to inform their own intellect and inspire curiosity in the world.

We need to find a way to eliminate these initiatives from the voting process. Leave the important decisions up to the professionals. From the elimination of civil rights to numerous other issues that so many people don't understand (how much do you really know about dog racing?) the nation is collectively shooting itself in the foot with these ballot questions.

Let's stop letting dumb people make the decisions and put the constitutional right of legislation back into the hands of the nation's legislatures.

Better ask the masses

Jon Peterson

Government is best managed at smaller levels. This is the fundamental reason why planned economies failed as spectacularly as they did in Russia, India and other Marxist countries in the 20th century.

It should logically extend that government would therefore be best which governs least on its highest levels, and that it is better to govern in the state rather than federally, in the county rather than the state – and in the town – rather than the county.

Ballot initiatives, in this respect, work as a sort of check and balance for political and social change. The question of whether or not ballot initiatives are relevant to today's society, or whether the issues they address would better be addressed by politicians, representing the people, is one that is simple enough.

The questions proposed are generally social in nature, and left trustingly to politicians. These issues have the potential to be actively ignored, or twisted according to what group has the most influence over the politician.

In an ideal world, there would be no initiatives, as politicians would always work in the best interests of their constituents. What people driving initiatives presuppose is that not all the issues important to voters are being addressed properly by their representatives. Also they think the society at large would be more willing to vote favorably for their issue than their representatives would be.

In a time when incumbency rates in certain branches are normally above 90 percent, it becomes essential that groups of citizens take political initiative rather than make it easier for special interest groups, and politicians' personal beliefs, to limit the freedom of the people by giving in to ideals that may not be compatible with those of the people.

It is amazing how many of these special interest groups there are, and even more amazing is how these groups think that it is the role of our politicians to give them what they want while taking from others to supply for it.

Initiatives sidestep many of the difficulties of normal legislative measures by taking the issues directly to the public, and while it is less difficult for special interest groups to lobby individual representatives, it is much more difficult to lobby an entire populatson.

Special interests and personal beliefs extend to both parties, and when politicians speak out against special interest groups, they don't ever consider their own interests to be just those. It is always the case, though, that when these ideals invade our higher voting systems that we lose our representation, and that our government does worse than it should.

Environmentalists' special interests are not considered to be special interests by many Democrats. Every presidential nominee since Nixon has alluded to some plan for energy independence, yet since Nixon's presidency, our dependency on Middle Eastern oil has doubled from one-third to two-thirds of our usage.

Today, environmentalists work as one of the most restrictive groups, and in the past, the speaker of the House of Representatives, Nancy Pelosi, has refused to let the House vote on measures to allow drilling on our own land.

Where there is now a general consensus that America is not doing enough to ensure its energy independence, the people espousing the environmentalists' interests could have voted to open these areas to more drilling.

They would have lost special interest money however, and when gas was at $4 a gallon, Pelosi still knew that by avoiding the voting all together, her next political campaign would not lose the votes of the people who were being hit hard by these prices, nor would she lose the special interest money.

Ballot initiatives, in this respect, work as a sort of check and balance for political and social change.

While there may be unity amongst a people, what others consider to be their rights may intrude upon the belief of what everyone else feels these rights may be. Gay marriage is what many people consider to be a right that is infringed upon by an overly restrictive government. However, is this truly a right when centuries of traditions – traditions that have stayed in place for a reason, because they work – have promoted different values?

While there is outrage by the groups who are for these marriages, initiatives to allow gay marriage are regularly defeated at polls. Can this truly be an injustice when it is society voting on what their own values and beliefs are, and what they want their government to endorse?

This brings us back to the initial question. When politicians with their own personal beliefs and special interests bring about law in many ways, and restrict voting on other issues, can we be left to trust them to bring about all the issues which are important to us? Any answer affirming this position would likely to be special indeed, and in a way, extremely disinterested.

FORGETTING DEFLUMERI'S COLUMN

(Re: "Forgetting lessons of 9/11," Brad DeFlumeri, Editorial, Nov. 5)

Dear Editor:

In his vindictive and childish November 5 column, Brad DeFlumeri – embodying that hideous endangered species, the fear-mongering Bushie – suggests that another attack like 9/11 would clarify our thinking and set our priorities straight once again.

In his 'humble' opinion,' the years since those attacks have seen a dangerous change in our national character, brought down to "self-pity, defeatism and hysterical self-analysis," from what his readers can assume is his ideal national mood, choking paranoia tempered only by blind patriotism.

DeFlumeri's romanticizing the fall of 2001 is shocking not only for its simplicity but for the blatant attempt he makes to rewrite the history of the Bush Administration. Bush was not a hero or an inspiration on 9/11.

He will be remembered not for his "inspiring response in speeches and memorials to 9/11" but rather for being asleep at the switch and through gross negligence (at best) failing to prevent those attacks.

Further, Bush's legacy will not be the American lives he "saved [...] fighting terrorism around the world," but rather his party's outrageous political opportunism in the wake of 9/11, culminating in the illegal invasion of Iraq. Far from the administration that defeated terrorism, Bush and his cronies will instead be remembered for stripping Americans of their rights at home and prosecuting unwinnable, unnecessary wars abroad.

The columnist accuses the American people of "failing to recognize national security as the defining issue for our generation." With this he proves himself a blind zealot who would prefer that we live in fear, running from our shadows and sacrificing any right so that we will never be attacked again. FDR would be proud.

I might be wrong, but I sincerely believe the American public has grown up a bit since 9/11, to a point where we can look at terrorism for the minor threat that it is, and look at the Bush Administration's response to terrorism as the greatest blow we as a nation have suffered in decades. DeFlumeri would prefer you stop asking questions and go back to being scared.

Dear Editor:

On November 5, you printed an optnion piece by Brad DeFlumeri in which he shared his views on the recent presidential election. In his editorial, Mr. DeFlumeri tried his best to explain away Senator McCain's loss on Tuesday, blaming a poorly run campaign.

He also attempted to discredit President-Elect Obama's historic accomplishment, claiming the campaign was nothing but a product of well-financed "smoke, mirrors and class warfare."

Mr. DeFlumeri went on, in soothsayer-like fashion to predict a "remarkably dangerous turn in our national dialogue from collective patriotism and American resolve."

He had the audacity to suggest, "An attack on a major American city [...] would clarify this thinking." Is Mr. DeFlumeri honestly proposing national tragedy as a means of teaching liberals a lesson?

I find this sentiment disturbing and furthermore, Mr. DeFlumeri's willingness to exploit the painful memory of September 11 for the sake of his argument is outright offensive.

In his piece, Mr. DeFlumeri complained at length about the "liberal media," alleging that despite the barrage of personal opinion polls which we found ourselves subjected to this campaign season, they failed to pose the all-important question: which candidate makes you prouder to be an American?

I would like to be the first to respond to Mr. DeFlumeri by saying, in my 20 years on this earth I have never been so moved, so hopeful, so inspired and never have I been more proud to be an American than at the moment Tuesday night when we, as a nation, elected Barack Obama our next president.

As an American, I am proud to have elected a president who will strengthen foreign relations and work to regain America's dignity. I am proud to be an American because I know that we now have a commander-in-chief who will finally bring our loved ones home from Iraq.

I am proud to have a president who understands the importance of education and who will strive for America to once again lead the world in science and technology.

I am proud to live in an America where women's health may no longer be a joke and where government will not put laws on my body. I am proud to be reminded that we truly are created equal, that the American dream is never out of reach, and that America is a country where all things are possible.

Mr. DeFlumeri, this campaign has embodied the very collective patriotism and American resolve that you claim is at risk. I am so proud to take part in it, so very proud to look forward and say, yes we can.

CORRECTING ZIONISM

Dear Editor:

(Re: "Bye George W. Bush, it's been Israel," Alana Goodman, Editorial, Oct 31)

Wow. Where to start? As an "unrighteous gentile" who doesn't want to see a confrontation between the 1.5 billion Muslims of the world and the United States of America, I am hopeful that President-Elect Barack Obama will deliver on his promise of stopping special interest and lobbying groups from running Washington.

Because, extreme as it may seem, the views expressed in the editorial "Bye George W. Bush, it's been Israel" have been setting the agenda of our government for decades much longer than the reign of George W. Bush.

When the most powerful political lobby in America exists to serve the state of Israel, you have a tremendous conflict of interest. AIPAC, the Israel advocacy lobby, used their political power to urge on the war in Iraq and even after that failure, now want war with Iran.

Another awful war is not in the interest of Americans, is definitely not in the interest of moderate Israelis, but it's a mouthwatering prospect for the fanatics among us.

These are the fanatics we've ignored for too long. The rightwing fundamentalist Christians and Jews who want to recreate a greater Israel and spark confrontation with the Muslim world in order to herald the coming of the Messiah.

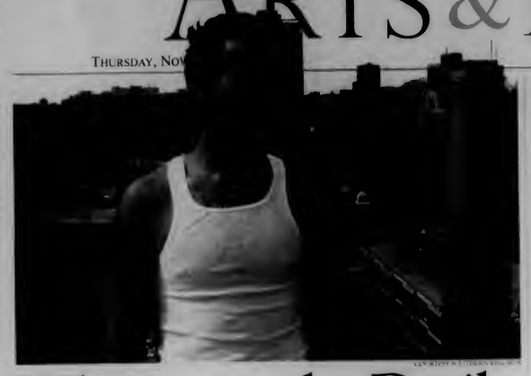
Rabbi Meir Kahane, quoted in the aforementioned editorial, was one of them. I would like to borrow a saying from him too: "I want to scare them [...] I approve of anybody who commits such acts of violence. Really, I don't think that we can sit back and watch Arabs throwing rocks at buses whenever they feel like it. They must understand that a bomb thrown at a Jewish bus is going to mean a bomb thrown at an Arab bus."

This man was the Osama Bin Laden of Zionism. He advocated that all Arabs be forcibly deported out of Israel, and that Israel should invade its neighbors in order to recreate the biblical Israel, stretching into Jordan, Syria, Iraq and Egypt.

His terrorist group Kach was responsible for killing 29 Muslim worshippers at the Cave of Patriarchs – yet he is proudly quoted in the aforementioned editorial.

Or perhaps, it is okay to kill the people of the "sea of unrestrained barbarity," the phrase used in the aforementioned editorial to describe the Muslim world. Where have I heard that kind of language before?

The colonial European empires used to refer to the non-white people of the world as "barbarians." They can find their successor in the state of Israel which continues the tradition of colonization by displacing Palestinians in the West Bank, demolishing Palestinian houses to build Jewish only settlements, thus stealing land and forcing Palestinians to live in refugee camps – making peace impossible.



Colonization is still alive in the 21st century, fueled by an extreme religious ideology that we Americans have funded and supported for decades by refusing to bring Israel to account.

We elected Barack Obama to bring change. Obama once said that "no one has suffered more than the Palestinian people," and we can only hope that despite all his pandering to the Israeli lobby, deep down he realizes that we can't continue to give Israel a blank check to commit whatever human right atrocities it wants – because it is exactly this that has inflamed the worlds

Muslims against the United States and sparked the hostility we suffer from today.

Whitmore, the Devil and Murder by Death

By Brian Wood
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Tonight, the Pearl Street Night Club will play host to more than just a couple of country-inspired musicians, it will serve as a showcase for an Americana revival.

Born the son of a farmer on a small Iowan horse farm, William Elliott Whitmore uses his music to preach a renowned respect and spiritual understanding for the land that surrounds him. Blessed with a voice weathered well beyond his years, Whitmore's insight into the morality and spiritual nature of the world that starkly contrasts his youthful demeanor.

He is a minimalist by extension of his modest upbringing. Utilizing nothing more than a banjo and some foot stomps, he crafts somber tales in the rural folk-blues tradition while delivering thematic lyrics ripe with desperation, redemption, god, the devil, sin and death effortlessly.

In the song "Diggin' My Grave," Whitmore accounts an Iowan farmer digging his own resting place while repenting his sins to god. "And the hole is shallow where I must lay / The hole is shallow / But that's okay / Cause I'll have peace on my final day / Down in this shallow hole where I must lay," Whitmore sings.

Whitmore has released three full lengths on Southern Records, 2003's "Hymn for the Hopeless," 2005's "Ashes to Dust" and 2006's "Song of the Blackbird." Whitmore's latest album, "Animals In The Dark," is scheduled for release in February.

The theme of regret is a constant in Whitmore's work, a surprising subject given he is only 30 years of age. On "Everyday," Whitmore uses a simple acoustic backdrop to express his profound remorse to a past lover. "As the sun goes down over that western field / I still can't help but think of you / Wherever you are I hope your wounds have healed / and you forgive me for the pain I put you through," Whitmore sings.

The Americana revival exemplified by Whitmore is still alive and kicking some seven hours east of Whitmore's heartland farm.

Bloomington, Ind.'s, Murder by Death is cut from the same mold as their banjo playing counterpart. Seemingly obsessed with themes of betrayal, redemption and the eternal struggle between good and evil, the two are ideal tour mates.

With an old western sound that is best suited for an ol' timey saloon, the quartet has shown a willingness to progress musically by becoming more rustic and rural with the passing years.

The band's 2002 debut "Like the Exorcist, But More Breakdancing" highlighted the bands abilities to craft extended and extravagant instrumentals, layering cello, piano and more rock-oriented instrumentation. Sprawling tracks such as the eight-minute opus "Those Who Left," offered glimpses of elaborately abstract songwriting, glimpses that have not been seen since.

Following the success of "Exorcist" the band shifted from the gothic-inspired sounds fans had grown accustomed to, to a more country western sound on the 2003 concept album, "Who Will Survive, and What Will Be Left of Them?" Over the course of the album's 10 tracks, the band unfolds a tale of the devil waging war on a small Mexican town. Heavier implementation of piano drives the album through newer, more western-influenced territories.

Whitmore himself even lends a helping hand on the album, providing supplementary vocals for the song "Until Morale Improves, the Beatings Will Continue."

In similar progressive fashion, the band's latest two albums, 2006's "In Bocca Al Lupo," and this year's "Red Of Tooth And Claw," have demonstrated an even further shift in songwriting philosophy.

Cellist Sarah Balliet adopted keyboard duties following the departure of pianist Vincent Edward in 2004. The new lineup change corresponded with a more direct style of rock 'n' roll. The results has yielded a drastic change.

Vocalist and guitarist Adam Turla added to this transition by altering his vocal delivery to a richer, more country-inspired baritone. The resulting product has drawn comparisons to Johnny Cash, and yes, even Whitmore.

Both Whitmore and Murder by Death are engrained with a distinctive country aesthetic. Listeners should be ready to experience a piece of America's heartland, and the timelessly tragic tales that accompany it.

Going Cupcake crazy

Custom t-shirt tycoon gives sweet tips on buisness success

By Haley Navarro
Collegian Staff

Indie clothing line entrepreneur Johnny Cupcakes spoke to a crowd of about 400 at the University of Massachusetts' Campus Center auditorium yesterday.

Johnny (whose real last name is Earle) lectured students about his business tactics as well as his "secrets" that have made him a successful business owner.

He gave a brief history of the early stages of his entrepreneurial career and presented a slideshow to accompany his lecture. He showed pictures of his metal band from 2002, the making of his clothing line – Johnny Cupcakes, as it is today – and new pictures with his recent ideas for the future of his mega-hit label.

Doors opened at 7:30 p.m., but by 7, a line of students wrapped around the basement of the Campus Center, anxiously waiting to see the 26-year-old businessman who has now opened three bakery-themed shops, all in Massachusetts.

For those who aren't familiar, Johnny Cupcakes makes T-shirts emblazoned with variations of cupcakes screen-printed on them.

Johnny was at UMass well after 11 p.m. to take pictures with the students, sign their T-shirts, and answer their questions.

His brand, which unofficially started in 2001 out of the trunk of his car, could be best described as a Cinderella story.

He attended the Art Institute of Boston for less than half of a semester, when he dropped out after deciding that college life wasn't for him.

Johnny's metal band, "On Broken Wings," was signed to a record label and started touring the nation.

He began making his infamous cupcake-infested shirts, selling them secretly at work and at his band's shows. He quickly noticed they were making more of a ruckus than his band.

Johnny recalled taking all of the money he made from selling these shirts and putting it toward buying even more shirts.

He encouraged the crowd to constantly recycle money into a business in order to be successful.

One of his favorite phrases of the night was, "You have to spend money to make money."

He proposed another business tip to the crowd: not to spend all of your money on alcohol.

"Think about the money you spend every weekend on alcohol. Multiply it by four weeks, and then 12 months. That's how much money you could be putting into a business," he said.

Since he doesn't drink, Johnny Cupcakes made it a point to note that he wasn't trying to judge the students, but was thinking of drinking as a business expense.

The T-shirts, whose designs range from a cupcake and cross bones to a baker slam-dunking a cupcake, cost between $35 to $40. The shirts are on the pricier side because everything is manufactured and printed in the United States and the company is not a big corporation.

Johnny also makes his T-shirts 'limited edition' so customers can feel like they have a unique part of the brand.

As he put it, "People want what they can't have."

He also advised the students not to sell a product to big companies so that its authenticity sticks.

He told personal stories to remind the crowd that just because he has a "multi-million dollar business," doesn't mean he is any different from his audience.

"If I can put a cupcake on a shirt and make money, you can figure something out," he said.

Johnny Cupcakes reported that he creates and perfects about 95 percent of the images seen on the shirts, and that they're mostly collaborations between him and the other members of his staff.

He comes up with the idea for the design and sends it to his employees to be tweaked in Adobe Photoshop or Illustrator.

And since he has no real business experience, Johnny found out about licensing and trademarking from his mother, whom he employs full time.

Though Johnny Cupcakes had a memorable lecture and some catch phrases, nothing stuck with the crowd like his adage to a particularly beloved drinking game: "Every time you play beer pong, you're going to think of me."

Hathaway steals the wedding

Family 'dramedy' scores with strong sense of authenticity

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Staff

Jonathan Demme exposes a hidden talent in "Rachel Getting Married," one that few observers likely knew he possessed.

In addition to being an acclaimed filmmaker (his credits include "Philadelphia" and "Silence of the Lambs"), he's also a pretty good wedding planner.

If you ever find yourself in the market for a Hindu-themed wedding rife with reggae jams and family dysfunction, he's your guy.

Anne Hathaway is cast against type as Kym, the hurricane force coiling at center of "Rachel Getting Married."

Kym swoops in after a nine-month stint in rehab, chain-smoking and threatening to wipe out the wedding's jovial vibe.

"I'm Shiva the Destroyer," she quips during one especially awkward wedding toast.

And the more time passes, the more you may find yourself watching anxiously – along with the rest of her long-suffering family – for what she's about to destroy next.

Kym returns to witness the nuptials of elder sister Rachel (Rosemarie DeWitt) to Sidney (TV on the Radio's Tunde Adebimpe).

It's unclear at first whether the Connecticut-based family misses Kym or can't stand her.

Her father (Bill Irwin) picks her up from rehab and soldiers through the start of many unnecessary demands to follow ("I only drink fountain Pepsi," she insists on the ride home).

But Kym doesn't just attend the wedding – she takes it over.

Screenwriter Jenny Lumet, daughter of director Sidney Lumet, doesn't have much new to say about the rehab experience in "Rachel Getting Married," but she has plenty to explore elsewhere.

Her warm-hearted script is far more concerned with showing the way the family acts – and doesn't interact– together. She digs deeply and hits pay dirt as the wedding edges near.

Most of the pre-wedding dysfunction is on account of Kym, whose attention-grabbing antics quickly overwhelm.

She sleeps with the best man (Mather Zickel) and throws a tantrum when she discovers she's been passed over as maid of honor.

Although years have passed, she's haunted by the memory of a tragedy for which she is responsible. Her presence at the wedding reminds the family of what has been lost.

There's a strong sense of authenticity in this film.

The family feels the most genuine. They squabble and bicker like old rivals, but are also quick to join in a group hug afterward.

Conflict plays out naturally during dishwashing battles and trips to the hair salon, not in explanatory speeches. This realistic touch spills over to the direction.

Like Lumet, Demme takes his time digging into the story. He ambles through "Rachel Getting Married" slowly at first, as if wanting to soak up the festivities for as long as possible. With an attention span of its own, the camera drifts from the musicians, filling the sprawling house with music (watch for Robyn Hitchcock) to the multiethnic faces of the wedding party.

With his hand-held camera, Demme gives "Rachel Getting Married" the intimacy of a home-video recording.

Working alongside cinematographer Declan Quinn ("Monsoon Wedding"), Demme welcomes the audience into the unfolding festivities as if we were all guests at the wedding. The only thing we're not privy to is a bachelorette party.

And even when Demme stays too long at the party, hovering over drunken guests, dancing relatives and an epic cake-cutting ceremony, he doesn't lose sense of the family involved.

Debra Winger co-stars as the absentee mother from whom Kym and Rachel still crave attention. Divorced and subsequently remarried, she holds them at arm's length emotionally.

For Rachel, it's an annoyance – her mother would rather leave the wedding early and stick to arranging the flowers.

For Kym, it's far more toxic. She never says so, but you suspect she's got intense mother-abandonment issues.

Ultimately, it may be Rachel's wedding, but its Kym's movie. Hathaway commands the role with a forcefulness she's never shown before. Her hair is chopped off, as if she took a razor to it herself in a fit of rage.

At some points, when she's off in a corner sulking, you expect to see her raise her hand or jump on top of a chair, like Maggie Gyllenhaal in "Sherrybaby," crying out for more attention.

It wouldn't be hard to hate Kym for what she is – a self-centered, emotional succubus.

But Hathaway, with her natural likeability and charm, keeps her character from becoming truly insufferable. For all Kym's failings, there's still something tender about her.

No wonder the family keeps coming back for more.

MTV, musical stars bid farewell to TRL

Carson Daily served as the host of MTV's "Total Request Live" from 1998 to 2003.

By Chuck Barney
Contra Costa Times

The screaming kids. The red-hot stars. The chart-topping hits. For its devoted viewers, MTV's "Total Request Live" – or "TRL" – was a generational touchstone. For former host Carson Daly it was a lifestyle.

"It became so much more than a TV gig," he recalls. "I spent more time behind that famous glass window than I did in my apartment. I treated it like my living room and that's the way it felt."

He's referring to MTV's second-story Times Square studio where the likes of Britney Spears, the Backstreet Boys, N' Sync, Christina Aguilera and many others routinely dropped by to schmooze with him and peddle their latest wares. From 1998 to 2003, Daly, serving as a much cooler version of Ryan Seacrest, presided over the interactive video countdown show as it grew into a colossal hit.

Alas, Daly left to take command of his own late-night talk show on NBC. In the years since his departure, "TRL," under an ever-changing roster of hosts, gradually lost much of its relevance and its audience. And now MTV is pulling the plug on the show, but not before a glitzy farewell special Sunday night.

Scheduled to perform are Beyonce, 50 Cent, the Backstreet Boys and Fall Out Boy. Other big names have promised to drop by and reminisce. Daly will return to mark the send-off, along with current "TRL" host Damien Fahey.

"I'm expecting a party-like atmosphere," Daly says. "For me, it's going to be like going to my high school reunion."

A party-like atmosphere is what "TRL" was all about during Daly's reign. After modest beginnings, the show blew up big right about the time boy bands and pop princesses became all the rage. And "TRL" became the place where stars were born.

"We had so many lightning bolts going off at the same time," Daly says. "It was the perfect storm."

Never mind that critics often blasted "TRL" for its blatant commercialism, or that the deadpan Daly was skewered on "Saturday Night Live" as being a "tool." For many young Americans, "TRL" was a can't-miss daily dose of madness.

How crazy did it get? Appearances by big acts such as the Backstreet Boys or Eminem would turn Times Square into a giant mosh pit.

"Thousands of kids showed up, and we would literally shut down the crossroads of the world," Daly says. "I'd get calls from angry people because it took them two hours to get home."

Among Daly's most memorable "TRL" moments is the day in 2001 when Mariah Carey burst onto the set unannounced, wearing a baggy T-shirt and pushing an ice cream cart. She began hugging fans and babbling about how this was her "therapy session."

"It was very weird, but I just went with it," Daly says.

A much more somber moment occurred only three days after the terrorist attacks of 9-11, when "TRL" was one of the first television shows to resume production.

"At first we were thinking that we absolutely wouldn't go back that early – that television just isn't important right now," he says. "But we also realized we were a comforting place for young people. There was no screaming and yelling. We became more of a counseling session. We opened the phone lines and talked. It was kind of cathartic."

These days, "TRL" is no longer the mecca of teen coolness, most likely because kids no longer have to rush home from school to catch the premiere of the new Lil' Wayne video when, at any minute, it will be available on YouTube or iTunes. (So did Internet kill the video star?).

Meanwhile, MTV, the so-called music channel, has become more obsessed with reality shows.

"I don't watch it that much anymore. I guess I'm a little old," Daly says. "I'll flip around once in a while and catch a couple minutes of 'The Hills,' but I feel like a pedophile. I feel a little dirty."

Daly is "bummed out" by the demise of "TRL," but takes heart in the fact that producers have claimed the show is only going on hiatus. The plan now is for it to return someday in revamped form.

"Maybe I'll go rogue," he says. "Maybe I'll announce that I'm coming back, and we're not stopping this thing."

Comedy sets a good example

By Justin Gagnon
Collegian Staff

Typecasting has always been prevalent in American film since its origins in the early 20th century.

Over the years, actors such as Adam West, John Wayne, Joe Pesci and Will Smith, just to name a few, have been notorious for playing very similar roles in a variety of films. Some movies have tried to revolve completely around typecast such as the recent box-office bomb "Righteous Kill" starring Robert De Niro and Al Pacino and have failed horribly. Sometimes it works, sometimes it doesn't.

"Role Models," which hit theaters on Nov. 6, works.

Paul Rudd ("Knocked Up," "Anchorman"), this weekend's Saturday Night Live host, stars as Danny Donahue, a pessimist energy drink spokesman with a short temper.

His partner and close friend, Wheeler, played by Seann William Scott ("American Pie," The Dukes of Hazzard"), is a horny meathead who works alongside him wearing the energy drink's mascot costume.

After Danny breaks up with Beth, his beautiful lawyer girlfriend, played by Elizabeth Banks ("Zack and Miri Make a Porno," "W."), he has a few too many energy drinks and makes a scene at a middle school that leads to his and Wheeler's arrest.

Beth arranges with the judge that Wheeler and Danny complete 150 hours of community service at a local Boys and Girls Club look-alike instead of going to prison. With prison seeming more appealing already, the men meet the head of the organization, Gayle Sweeny, a former drug abuser and alcoholic played by Jane Lynch ("Talladega Nights," "The 40 Year Old Virgin"). She matches Danny up with the nerdy Augie Farks, played by Christopher Mintz-Plasse (better know as Fogell/McLovin in "Superbad"), and Wheeler with the obnoxious Ronnie Shields played by Bobb'e J. Thompson.

Each character in this movie is typecast, but they are cast perfectly, each encompassing roles that match their particular acting personality. Scott plays an older version of Stifler, while Mintz-Plasse is a slightly geekier version of Fogell. Even Ken Jeong, the arrogant gynecologist from "Knocked Up," plays a self-consumed, egotistical make-believe king in a medieval role-playing game that Augie is obsessed with.

The trailers and clips available to preview the movie show only some of the least comedic scenes. Without actually seeing "Role Models," it is easy to assume the movie is just another stupid, filthy comedy that will appeal to audiences who actually think Jason Friedberg and Aaron Seltzer are funny (See: "Disaster Movie"/"Meet The Spartans").

Scott and Rudd deliver some of the best roles of their careers, while Mintz-Plasse easily tops his only other large role, his one in "Superbad." They hold the film together, but Bobb'e J. Thompson cannot be overlooked. As intolerable as he is for Wheeler, viewers immediately fall in love with his dirty and quick-witted humor.

Director David Wain ("The Ten"), in conjunction with Rudd and a few others, wrote the screenplay for the film and created some distinct characters that audience members can adore, and some others that they can despise.

The movie is absolutely hilarious. The jokes are original and creative, and the actors deliver them with brilliance. The chemistry between Rudd and Scott and their respective "littles" is truly the core reason of the film's success.

It is a must-see and one of the funniest movies of 2008.

New DVD offers fresh look at the Kennedys

Documentary also included in new release of Stone's 'JFK'

By Doug Nye
McClatchy-Tribune News Service

When filmmaker Robert D. Kline decided to do a piece about the Kennedy family, he set out to make sure it wouldn't be a rehash of previous documentaries.

"I didn't want to see the same old footage of Bobby (Kennedy) on the floor with Rosie Grier bending over him," Kline said during a recent telephone conversation.

That famous horrific scene and many others that have become so familiar to Americans won't be found in Kline's "The Kennedys: America's Emerald Kings," which arrives on DVD this week.

What you will get is an absorbing history of the Kennedys that begins with Patrick Kennedy, an Irish Roman Catholic immigrant, who arrived in the United States in 1849. Using stills of the era and photos borrowed from the Kennedy estate, Kline follows the development of the family in America and chronicles how they rose to positions of power.

The result is a visual poetic tribute to the family and the impact they had on the country and the affection many Americans had for them. It will especially touch those who were around when the White House became Camelot.

Kline's documentary is also included in "JFK: Ultimate Collector's Edition" (Warner, 1991, $39.98) which also is being released this week. The 3-disc DVD set has numerous other extras but the anchors are Oliver Stone's conspiracy-laced feature film and Kline's work.

Kline doesn't buy into Stone's conspiracy theory of the assassination of President Kennedy in Dallas 45 years ago this month.

"We were wedded at the hip on this DVD project but I disagree with him on that," Kline said. "I just don't believe it but I didn't argue with him. But you have to admit that he is a brave filmmaker and sticks with his beliefs."

The differences with Stone had no effect on Kline while he was putting "Emerald Kings" together.

"I had always wanted to make a piece on the Kennedys," Kline said. "You know, I'm one of those who remembers exactly where I was when I heard what had happened in Dallas. I later worked for Robert Kennedy."

Kline purposely refrained from lingering on the assassination of JFK and the murder of Robert. Those events, of course, are mentioned but the focus is on how the family continued to carry on after the tragedies. The early Kennedys were not unlike many other immigrants who came to America's shores.

"As Roman Catholics, they wanted to escape the walls of prejudice," Kline said. "They found that prejudice was also here when John Kennedy ran for president. It wasn't easy for him to overcome that."

America had never had a Catholic in the White House before and, believe it or not, many voters feared JFK would be taking his orders from the Pope. Kline's film excellently deals with this issue, showing how he was able to lay those fears to rest and win the election.

There is, of course, so much more to this film. It is for anyone interested in American history or the Kennedys.

"I just wanted to capture the legacy of JFK and the Kennedy family," Kline said.

He can consider the mission accomplished.

Different year, different team, UMass stronger this season

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

UMass coach Justine Sowry's team has changed a lot in one year.

In 2007, the Massachusetts field hockey team was a one-dimensional, defensive-minded team that toughed its way to the NCAA tournament but lost in the first round. But in 2008, the No. 17 Minutewomen (17-4) enter the tournament boasting a potent offense as well as a suffocating defense as they go into the round of 16 expecting to be there.

UMass has transitioned from a defensive-dependant team to one that can blow past teams with its offense if need be. Now, any unit can step up when another struggles. More importantly, though, is the fact that the Minutewomen were a young team that surpassed all expectations.

"[The team] is younger, definitely," Sowry said. "I thought they'd have difficulty early on, with the growing pains and the young defense. But they're growing and getting better every day."

UMass has three seniors left on its squad and has one returning starter on defense. But the Minutewomen have had little in terms of setbacks this season. In fact, the team improved from its 2007 record of 14-9 to 17-4.

The team has a history of surpassing Sowry's expectations, though. She was not delusional about the team's potential last year, her first at the helm.

"It was a surprise last year when we made it. At the beginning of the season, I stressed to the team that there were going to be no guarantees and that success was going to come years down the track," Sowry said.

"We were the underdog all year long and we had nothing to lose," she said. "Our team absorbed a lot of pressure and didn't put up a lot of goals. But we had a mentally strong group that stayed in every game they played."

Normally, there's a period of adjustment when a new coaching staff enters a program. Players must get used to the new playing style and become comfortable with the coaches. That did not become a factor, though, as UMass went on to win the Atlantic 10 title.

On Saturday, UMass will be in the same position it was a year ago. It will be a low seed in the NCAA tournament, playing the host team at the tournament site and facing a similar foe.

Last year, UMass faced Connecticut, a team they had faced earlier in the year, and both times the Huskies got the better of the Minutewomen. On Saturday, though, the Minutewomen travel to Syracuse to play the Orange in a game that leaves UMass in a familiar position.

However, the Minutewomen aren't the same team.

With its 1-0 shutout against Kent State, UMass now has three consecutive shutouts in postseason play. With their recent success on the defensive side of the ball, the Minutewomen have lowered their goals-against average to a meager 1.00 goal per game, a slight improvement of their mark of 1.08 goals per game last year.

"This year, with such a young team, I had low expectations at first," Sowry said. "But the team came together at the right time and now they believe they can go one [game] better than last year. It's a different team, but skill-wise, we are better."

As good as the team has been on defense, the team's most significant improvement has been on the offensive side of the ball. The offense improved from an average of 1.51 to 2.57 goals per game.

In 2007, the Minutewomen had little in terms of playmakers on offense. But this year, Sowry has witnessed breakout seasons from forwards Katelyn Orlando and Katie Kelly and added junior transfer Jill Powers.

"This year, we have a nice set structure. Last year, we had the talent but we didn't have the structure," Sowry said. "I think we're a better passing team. We've improved our scoring this year and how we execute in that aspect."

Arikian honored as top A-10 midfielder

Sophomore looks to lead offense in tourney

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When Ben Arikian plays well, the Massachusetts men's soccer team doesn't lose.

UMass will defend its 2007 Atlantic 10 Championship this weekend after earning the No. 1 seed last weekend.

Last Friday, the Minutemen defeated No. 10 Saint Louis, 2-1, in double overtime, to secure their spot in the postseason tournament. Two days later, they beat Charlotte, 1-0, to win the regular-season title.

With Arikian at center-midfield, UMass (9-6-3, 7-1-1 A-10) has a good chance at winning a second consecutive title. The A-10 Midfielder of the Year has assisted or scored the game-winning goal in eight of UMass' nine wins this season. He leads the team in points (14), assists (six) and game-winning goals (three). He is tied for second on the team for most goals (four) with junior Mark DeSantis.

"He's a big part of our team. The way he goes, we go," said UMass coach Sam Koch. "He played really well on Friday and really well [on Sunday] and when he does that we're not going to lose."

Arikian has played 93.57 percent of UMass' season — 1,616 out of 1,727 minutes. He has started in 17 out of the Minutemen's 18 games and is typically on the field for the whole game. On Sunday it was the first time since Oct. 24 that Arikian wasn't on the field for the entire matchup — he sat out for two minutes due to an injury.

Arikian's ability to move the ball around the field, make supporting runs and position himself almost perfectly on every play makes him an integral part of the team. He is a key player in UMass' set pieces, taking corner kicks from the left, shooting right. When Mark DeSantis isn't on the field, he takes the kick from the opposite side.

Arikian's talent and game sense, combined with the leadership and experience of senior Mike DeSantis in the center-midfield position are nearly unstoppable.

"[Arikian and Mike DeSantis], the two of them together, when they're clicking, we're a hard team to beat," Koch said.

Last weekend's two home games were the most crucial matches in the Minutemen's season to determine postseason play. And that weekend, Arikian played an important role in all three of UMass' goals.

Against Saint Louis, Arikian served a corner kick to freshman Andrew Henshaw to put UMass on the board first.

With 12 seconds remaining Saint Louis tied the game and sent the game into double overtime. In the 108th minute of the match, Arikian dribbled the ball down the midfield, moving his way through the Billiken defense to find sophomore Stuart Amick on the left side. Amick crossed the ball to Mark DeSantis, who scored.

"It's just a great feeling when you can be a part of both goals, but it's an even better feeling to be a part of that big win," Arikian said.

Sophomore Ben Arikian leads the Minutemen with 16 points on four goals and six assists.

But, little did he know in Sunday's game he would be part of an even bigger win.

In the first half, he went up to head the ball near center field, but a Charlotte player had the same idea, resulting in a nasty collision. He returned for the second half with heavy bandaging around his head, only to head in the lone goal that earned UMass a regular-season championship title — while ending Charlotte's season.

"It was pretty cool to score because after I got hurt I was pretty mad that that kid didn't get a red card," Arikian said. "But when the goal came, I just saw the ball going over the kids head and just took the opportunity to slide right behind him and the goalie was coming out. I saw where he was and I just popped it right over him. It was a pretty cool feeling doing that."

The way Charlotte played against Arikian proved how much of a threat he is at offense and defense. Arikian, who can be seen all over the field supporting his teammates or making plays, spent most of Sunday's game getting fouled.

"Every team we play is going to try and do what they can to stop [Arikian]. They haven't been able to do it yet," Koch said. "But he's definitely getting banged up in the process."

in the first game," Sowry said. "They play fast and aggressively. They take free hits quickly. They disrupt the flow of the game, so we have to be relentless in defending them."

Another area to improve upon for UMass is penalty corners. The Minutewomen allowed 16 penalty corners, two of which were scores. Syracuse gave up six corners in the game.

"We're going to work on our offensive and defensive corner play this week and we're going to do a lot of video work," Sowry said. "But we're not going to have a lot of practice this week, because we're going to have played five games in eight days."

Powers, who scored the first goal in the game when UMass hosted Syracuse, scored the lone goal that put the Minutewomen into the tournament when they defeated Kent State. Powers' nine goals ranks third on the team, with most of her goals coming from the bench.

Both Powers and senior forward Katelyn Orlando scored two goals last time out against SLU. Orlando led the team with three shots on goal and is one of the best offensive players for UMass. She leads the Atlantic 10 Conference with 14 goals.

The defense can score for the Minutewomen as well. While surrendering an average of one goal per game on the season, starting backs Jaime Bourazeris and Jackie Tait have scored a combined four goals and have 10 assists as well.

Behind them, Widdall is statistically one of the best goalies in the country. She's made 68 saves with a 0.95 goals-against-average. In her first season as a collegiate goalie, Widdall already has seven career shutouts.

The Orange are 8-1 at J.S. Coyne Stadium but UMass has lost just twice on the road this year.

Katelyn Orlando started all 21 games for No. 17 UMass and leads the team with 14 goals and 29 points. The senior was named the A-10 Offensive Player of the Year last week.

Maroon and White hope for second-straight College Cup

Dayton No. 3, Saint Louis No. 4, Fordham No. 5 and Rhode Island No. 6. UMass will play whichever team is the lowest remaining seed in the semifinals on Friday – Saint Louis, Fordham or Rhode Island.

The Minutemen have already faced all three of those teams this season. They defeated SLU 2-1 in double overtime and Fordham 2-0 in regulation. However, Rhode Island defeated them 1-0 on Oct. 12. It was the first and only conference loss the Minutemen endured all season.

"Every game is different; no one plays the same as they played the game before. Sometimes it gives you an idea of what they do so that's certainly helpful," Koch said. "But again, it's a new game, a new situation; we have to take care of what we do. That's the most important thing."

The first-round bye gives UMass several advantages – an extra day off, a chance to scout opponents and one less game to win. But it also brings the worry that the Minutemen will come out flat.

"They say that we're all 0-0 [when the playoffs begin], but we will play a team that's 1-0," Koch said. "So they've had a game already, they've had their jitters out, they are confident because they have just won a game, so there are advantages and disadvantages [to the bye]."

If the Minutemen can beat their opponent in the semifinals, they will have the opportunity to play for the championship Sunday. Koch believes his team is suited for a schedule with games that are almost back-to-back and feels his team will be well conditioned for Sunday, provided UMass wins its first game.

The A-10 tournament will be hosted at the Arthur J. Rooney field at Duquesne University. The games will be played on FieldTurf, rather than the natural grass surface that UMass plays on at Rudd Field. Koch has been holding this week's practices at McGuirk Stadium – the UMass football field – to get the Minutemen acclimated to the surface.

"[The turf] will be overall good for the quality of play. But it will make the game quicker, which isn't necessarily good for us," Simmons said. "But we've been practicing all week, and we played well last time we played on turf so I think we're adapting to it well."

Erin Parker has been a dynamic threat on offense for the Minutewomen this season. Through 21 games, the senior has recorded 18 points on five goals and eight assists for UMass.

Prince Ofosu and the Minutemen are the No. 1 seed of the Atlantic 10 tournament and have earned a bye for the first round. On Saturday, UMass will play the lowest remaining seed after Friday's first round games.

UMass seeks revenge against No. 3 Syracuse

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team is in a familiar position in many regards. The Minutewomen will travel to Syracuse, N.Y., to face the Orange in the first round of the NCAA Tournament on Saturday at 11:30 a.m.

UMass (17-4) has already seen what the Orange (20-1) can do on the field. The last time the teams met, Syracuse edged the Minutewomen, 5-4. However, the game was more encouraging for UMass than the final score indicates.

"The first time we faced them, it was fun to play a team that plays where we want to be, consistently in the top 10 every week," said UMass coach Justine Sowry. "To have another shot at an opponent is a great thing. It's our time."

The Maroon and White were down four goals by halftime and the Orange offense pressured goalie Alesha Widdall throughout the entire first frame. The second half was a completely different game.

UMass first got on the board two minutes into the second half by way of a Jill Powers goal. The Minutewomen came within two goals until Martina Loncarica scored the fifth and final goal for SU.

Loncarica has 15 goals and 29 assists this season, which makes her equally as dangerous at finding the open player as she is at scoring. Senior Shannon Taylor joins Loncarica in the midfield to make a potent mid-line for the Orange. Taylor has 29 goals and 16 assists this season.

Five of Taylor's goals have been game-winners, so she is someone UMass will look to pressure heavily late in the game. She's scored at least 25 goals in the last two seasons in a Big East conference that is sending three teams to the NCAA tournament this year.

Forward Lindsey Conrad got three shots against Widdall in the last game and finished the season strong. Conrad has a total of 19 regular-season goals, tying her career high.

In the regular-season matchup between the teams, the Minutewomen did a good job at not letting any one player on the Orange squad score more than one goal.

"We have to be ready to play. They'll jump on you, they'll score quickly, like we found out

Maroon and White looks to defend A-10 tourney title

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's soccer team wore the glass slipper in a classic Cinderella season, coming out of nowhere to win the Atlantic 10 tournament and reaching the College Cup last year. This season, they return to the A-10 tournament wearing a new garment: a crown.

UMass captured its first A-10 regular season title since 2002 Sunday in a 1-0 win over Charlotte, earning the No. 1 seed for this weekend's A-10 Championship in Pittsburgh, Pa. The Minutemen won the title a season ago, but did so as the No. 3 seed.

Because the Minutemen (9-6-2, 7-1-1 A-10) won the A-10, they will receive a first-round bye in the A-10 tournament. They will play in the semifinal game on Friday, and if they win, the championship game on Sunday.

UMass appears to be peaking at the right time. After starting off the season 2-6-2, the Minutemen went on an eight-game unbeaten streak, including six straight conference wins to position themselves for another tournament run.

"It's like anything else – if you're confident, you believe you will come out on top when you're on a winning streak like that," said UMass coach Sam Koch. "It's nothing but a positive, but you also have to realize how we got here and what are the things we did to make sure that we were winning games, and we have to keep focusing on those things."

UMass won three straight games to win the title and claim the automatic berth into the NCAA tournament in 2007. It was the start of a run that ended in the program's first berth to the College Cup. The experience from last year can give the Minutemen a slight edge this weekend.

"I think guys will know not to get their heads too blown up right now," said senior goalkeeper Zack Simmons. "I think we understand that we haven't accomplished anything yet and that is the biggest thing we can gain from last year's experience."

After being the underdog in last year's postseason run, the Minutemen know they cannot afford to take any team for granted, regardless of record or ability.

"[We know] we can get beat by anyone on any day, because we were able to do it to teams last year," Simmons said.

The tournament seeding is UMass No. 1, Temple No. 2,

Minutemen to face Wildcats

Game has important playoff implications for both teams

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Usually when the Massachusetts football team faces New Hampshire, the game means a lot more than it will Saturday when the two teams meet – at least for the Minutemen.

After losing last Saturday to Maine, 21-20, on a missed extra point by kicker Armando Cuko, No. 22 UMass severely hurt its chances at making the playoffs. A win against No. 13 UNH and Hofstra in the season finale likely won't be enough for the Minutemen.

However, Saturday's game won't be just a pushover by any means. The Wildcats (7-2, 4-2 Colonial Athletic Association) have one of the league's most powerful and efficient offenses.

Despite losing last week's game against No. 6 Villanova, 24-13, UNH heads into Saturday's game looking for a win in an effort to better its postseason positioning with one game left.

Heading this endeavor will be Wildcat quarterback R.J. Toman. Toman has amassed 2,188 yards this season, throwing 21 touchdowns and seven interceptions.

Toman's main receiving threat is senior Mike Boyle. The 5-foot-8 wide receiver leads the Wildcats in both receptions (49) and yards (724). He also shares the team lead in touchdowns (seven) with tight end Scott Sicko.

Sicko ranks second on the team in receptions (39) and yards (469). Sicko averages 52.1 yards receiving per game and 12 yards per catch.

Terrance Fox, Travis Negron, Matt O'Brien and Chad Kackert all have over 100 receiving yards, giving the Wildcats an array of receivers that Toman can throw to. The numbers show that UNH spreads the ball around and does not rely on just one receiver.

Although New Hampshire throws more often than it runs (271-101 plays), UNH starting running back Robert Simpson has rushed for 521 yards and six touchdowns. Secondary running back Chad Kackert has amassed 368 yards and two touchdowns, while averaging eight-yards per carry.

UMass coach Don Brown is familiar with the Wildcats, having played them three times in the two previous seasons, and he expects a strong running attack from UNH this weekend.

"They've always come in and try to run the ball on us and then have gone to the air attack," Brown said. "I don't see them doing much different."

But the Wildcat offense isn't the team's only strong point this season.

New Hampshire boasts an impressive running defense that has held opponents to only 3.2 yards per carry and 12 rushing touchdowns. By limiting opponents' ground game, the Wildcats force opponents to become one-dimensional with the passing game.

Throwing on the Wildcats has been troubling for opposing offenses. New Hampshire has intercepted 15 passes this season. Defensive backs Ryan Hinds and Dino Vasso have each picked off four passes. Vasso also leads the team in tackles, with 71.

Despite the amount of passes UNH has intercepted, it still allows a big chunk of passing yards to its opponents. The Wildcats have surrendered 242 passing yards per game and 10.1 yards per catch, while letting the opposition score 14 times through the air.

Either way, the Minutemen will have their hands full defensively, especially with Sean Smalls injured, but cornerback Courtney Robinson welcomes the challenge.

"I'm always looking forward to a passing team, that is the reason why I play corner," Robinson said. "I'm pretty sure the whole secondary is looking forward to the challenge."

Josh Jennings and George Byrd will hope to slow down the CAA's second-best offense this weekend when they travel to No. 13 New Hampshire.

UM falls to Salukis, lose 15-point lead

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE

Chris Lowe fumbled away the Massachusetts men's basketball team's opportunity to play No. 5 Duke at Madison Square Garden next week, turning the ball over 10 times in a 80-73 loss to Southern Illinois in the quarterfinals of the 2K Sports Classic Wednesday night.

The Minutemen (1-1) had a 15-point lead in the first half and an 11-point advantage at halftime, but an 8-0 run to open the second half by the Salukis cut the lead to three. The teams were tied at 67 with three minutes remaining, but two Lowe turnovers and two 3-pointers by SIU resulted in a 10-0 run and the Saluki victory.

The SIU run began right after UMass appeared to re-gain the momentum after a thunderous dunk by Tony Gaffney off of a missed 3-point shot.

"I thought they fought their buts off and competed at a high level," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said after the game. "Southern Illinois made some great runs and I felt like our guys were wearing down a bit."

Kevin Dillard led the charge early in the second stanza for the Salukis, hitting four 3-pointers in the first eight minutes of the half. A 3-pointer by Wesley Clemmons with under five minutes remaining gave SIU its first lead (63-61) since a 2-0 lead less than a minute into the game.

| UMass | 73 |

UMass guard Ricky Harris led all scorers with 24 points – connecting on four 3-pointers. Lowe had 17 points, but had no assists and 10 turnovers. Anthony Gurley had 15 for the Minutemen, while no other player had more than six.

The Salukis (2-0) were more balanced offensively, with four players in double figures and Clemmons with nine. Carlton Fay led SIU with 17.

"The one thing you realize is that it is very, very difficult to win on the road against a team that is a perennial NCAA tournament team," Kellogg said. "They have lost in [SIU] Arena in Carbondale, Ill.] nine times since 2001 and we had them at the half and midway through the second half. We were right there with them."

UMass used Harris' hot first-half shooting and tough defense by Tony Gaffney (seven blocks) and Tyrell Lynch. Gaffney added nine rebounds and two steals.

GAME NOTES

Luke Bonner left the game with a left knee injury midway through the first half. He did not return … Southern Illinois played 11 different players within the first four minutes of the game.

KELLOGG SIGNS RECRUIT

Prior to Wednesday night's game, Kellogg announced the signing of Javorn Farrell to a National Letter of Intent.

Farrell, a 6-foot-5 swingman from Upper Marlboro, Md. just turned 18-years-old on Nov. 11. He is a junior at Riverdale Baptist High School.

"We are excited to get a player and a person with the character of Javorn Farrell to join our program," said Kellogg in a prepared statement. "I love his versatility as a player. He's a tough, physical hard-nosed player and will be physically ready to come in and help us right away."

Farrell was also recruited by Virginia Tech, George Mason, Florida Atlantic, South Florida and A-10 foe George Washington.

Economy hits endowments

By Nirva Hedgkiss
Collegian Staff

Endowments are being hit hard at all Five College schools as the national economic outlook worsens.

UMass' endowment dropped 5.7 percent to $158 million. However, the University's draw from the endowment will not feel a squeeze from the current economic situation until next year, according to University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski.

"For this year's budget (fiscal 2009), the campus will draw $5.8 million from the endowment, based on a formula. That is approximately 0.6 percent of the campus' operating budget."

"The payout is based on the endowment's investment performance for a previous period, so this year's budget will not be affected by current variations in the stock market and other investments. However, that may change next year, depending on the performance of investments at the end of this fiscal year."

UMass is already facing difficult financial decisions because of statewide budget cuts. Chancellor Robert C. Holub said in an e-mail to students and faculty that he wants to make energy conservation a priority as he looks for ways to reduce spending on campus.

Holub said the campus community should look at energy usage and consumption "not only to cut costs, but to do our part to preserve and protect the environment."

Amherst College was hit hardest, with a 25 percent decrease in its endowment. The endowment had an estimated value of $1.7 billion on July 1, which decreased by $425 million.

Despite these losses, college officials remain confident in the college's long-term financial stability.

"The fact that careful investment decisions were made during boom times will help see colleges through the rainy days that appear to have arrived," said Amherst College President Anthony W. Marx in a statement.

In response to the decreased endowment, Amherst College, like the other colleges in the Five College consortium, is evaluating projects on campus and looking for ways to reduce non-essential spending, including hiring freezes.

Amherst College officials have already decided to postpone renovation and expansion of the Lord Jeffrey Inn, which is owned by the college. The project will be re-evaluated in June 2009.

Across the Connecticut River in Northampton, Smith College is seeing similar losses. Its endowment has dropped 20 percent to $280 million. The endowment provides one third of the college's operating budget, according to Smith President Carol Christ.

$46.8 million of Smith College's endowment funds were invested in the CommonFund for Short Term Investments, overseen by Wachovia Bank.

On Sept. 29, the assets in the CommonFund were frozen, affecting the investments of 1000 colleges and universities, Smith and Mount Holyoke Colleges among them. Since mid-October, Smith College has had access to 52 percent of its assets in the CommonFund.

To make up for its reduced endowment, Smith College is tapping into some of its reserves. Christ warned this was only a temporary solution.

"The use of reserves may buy some time, but will not likely allow Smith to avoid difficult decisions about base budget reductions," she said in a statement.

Christ wrote in a letter to the campus community that the college anticipated a $5 million reduction in the operating budget for the next school year, and a $10 million reduction in the operating budget for the 2010-11 school year.

"In the current economy, we must anticipate that endowment income will only be one part of the budgetary challenge," Christ said.

Down the road in South Hadley, Mount Holyoke is also seeing the effects of a weakened economy. Their endowment dropped 11.6 percent to $658 million.

"It hasn't cost us a serious problem. The impact will be felt gradually over a number of years," said Jan Albano, associate treasurer at Mount Holyoke.

Albano explained that although some of the operating budget was invested in the CommonFund, the effect on the college has been minor since only $2 million was invested.

In a statement to the Mount Holyoke campus, President Joanne W. Creighton tried to ease concerns about the college's financial stability.

"Our spending guidelines allow some flexibility that will cushion the effects on our operations," she said.

Hampshire College, which, along with UMass, has significantly smaller endowments than the other colleges in the consortium, also lost money. Hampshire's endowment fell 6.4 percent to $41 million.

All the Five Colleges emphasized the importance of providing enough financial aid for their students. While spending cuts will have to be made, all five schools said that they would do their best to provide students the same financial aid benefits.

"We remain committed to preserving financial aid to our continuing and new students," said Hampshire College president, Ralph Hexter in a statement, "and we recognize and honor the sacrifice many students and families make to meet the costs of a Hampshire education."

Few inaugural tickets in high demand

By Caitlin Quinn
Collegian Staff

The hottest ticket on the market right now gets you a spot to stand outside on a January morning, packed in with millions of strangers.

Thousands of Massachusetts residents are hoping to join the record-sized crowds that will watch Barack Obama give his first speech as president in January.

Tickets to the inaugural address on Jan. 20 are given to each Congressperson to distribute upon request to their constituents. The office of U.S. Rep. Richard Neal of Massachusetts will receive 198 tickets, but won't come close to meeting the demand.

"We've had more than 5,000 requests through e-mail, phone calls, faxes and letters," said Neal's spokesperson, William Tranghese. "Most of the calls came in the day after the election."

Neal's office is still taking requests by e-mail , but according to Tranghese, it's unlikely further requests will be honored at this point, as the number of requests is already far past the limit.

Tickets from Neal's office will be distributed on a first-come first-serve basis.

U.S. Rep. John Olver's office also warns that they've already received 1,000 more requests than available tickets.

"We've received requests for approximately 1,200 tickets," said Olver spokeswoman Sara Merriam. "That number is continuing to grow every day. The volume picked up the morning after the election. The requests have been coming in steadily ever since."

Merriam added that Olver will decide how his office's tickets are distributed.

Tranghese thinks the requests are coming from constituents who supported Obama during the campaign.

"People want to experience the history that's going to be made on inauguration day," he said.

Washington D.C.'s tourism department is expecting 1.5 million people to arrive for the inauguration, making the event three times larger than President Bush's 2005 address, according to the Chicago Tribune.

"There's going to be an unprecedented amount of security in Washington. It's going to be more crowded than ever because of the historic nature of the election," said Tranghese. "People want to witness history."

For Massachusetts residents who manage to obtain the free tickets, costs still remain. Hotels in the D.C. area are already sold out, according to the Associated Press, and rooms in the city have been reserved for over $900, with guests complying with the three and four-night minimums some hotels are requiring.

The majority of the tickets given away by Massachusetts representatives will be standing room only, so people without tickets may be able to stake out spots comparable to the reserved area. Tickets are not needed for standing room on the parade route. Large televisions screens will be put up to broadcast the speech for farther crowds, said Tranghese.

"There are accommodations being made, but with that many people it's going to be difficult," he added.

For those thinking of taking the typical college student's last minute ticket-buying approach, think again. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, who is overseeing the inauguration ceremony, is writing letters to Web sites such as eBay.com, asking them not to allow tickets to be sold.

According to the Associated Press, she's also drafting a bill that would make selling inauguration tickets a federal crime.

"We're against people selling tickets," said Tranghese. "There should be no cost attached. We support Sen. Feinstein."

The offices of U.S. Sen. Edward Kennedy and Sen. John Kerry will also be giving tickets to Massachusetts constituents, and are expected to receive more than the Representative's offices.

In addition to the inaugural address and swearing-in ceremony on the west steps of the Capitol, the festivities surrounding the event will include the traditional parade along Pennsylvania Avenue, a luncheon, balls and galas.

Neal and Olver both plan to attend the ceremony.

"Congressman Olver endorsed Sen. Obama," said Merriam. "He's very excited about the changes an Obama Administration will bring about."

Confusion on Question 2

By Matt Rocheleau
Collegian Staff

State officials say the details on how to implement the passing of ballot Question 2 are still hazy, and they don't expect the new law decriminalizing marijuana to go into effect until late December or early January.

"Until that time, the current law remains in effect, that is, possession of any amount of marijuana is still a criminal offense," said a statement from Attorney General Martha Coakley.

On Election Day, about two-thirds of Massachusetts voters approved Question 2, which states anyone over 18 caught with an ounce or less of marijuana would be issued a civil fine of $100, and would not face criminal charges. However, the citations would likely be recorded in police logs, according to a press release from Coakley.

Violators under 18 would have to complete a drug awareness program and community service within one year of the offense, or pay up to $1,000 in fines.

Officials say the regulation would not change existing laws, practices or policies concerning operating a motor vehicle or taking other actions while under the influence of marijuana, unlawful possession of prescription forms of marijuana or selling, manufacturing or trafficking in marijuana, according to The Springfield Republican.

The new law is also unlikely to alter on-campus policies at the University of Massachusetts, according to spokesman Ed Blaguszewski.

"I don't believe this will change any of the protocols [on campus, including housing]," Blaguszewski said. "Any cases in which police cite students for misconduct will be sent to the Dean of Students as they have in the past."

"Right now, we don't know how we are going to enforce it," UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor told The Daily Hampshire Gazette. "I think the biggest issue is solving the how, and once the how is done, I don't see any big implications beyond that."

For law enforcement, sorting out the specifics of how to handle the new law is becoming a major challenge.

"At this time, we are reviewing all of the implications of the new law and whether further clarification or guidance is needed," said Coakley. "We will work with the district attorneys and others in law enforcement to determine what the new law requires."

"It's up in the air at this point," said Amherst Police Department Detective Brandon Seymour. "There's a billion questions that have been raised... If you see someone smoking a joint, what right do you have to request an ID from them?"

Beyond an officer's right to search and seizures, police say they're also unsure of how the fines will be administered, and how to determine whether someone is carrying over an ounce of marijuana.

However, Seymour said he doesn't feel the law will change his normal practice. The majority of the time, he said, people are arrested and charged for another offense and the marijuana is found when the person is searched.

"We really don't arrest someone just on possession," said Seymour. "In fact, I can't think of a time where I've ever arrested someone on mere possession."

"We weren't wasting a lot of time on it anyway," he continued. "It would probably take more time to write up a ticket than just to summons them to court."

For now the Amherst Police Department will handle marijuana possession the same way they have been until they hear from the attorney general, Seymour said.

"I wasn't in favor or opposed," he said. "I would have liked to see [the law] go into a lot more detail to answer the questions it raises."

Michael O'Keefe, district attorney of the Cape and the Islands, along with other district attorneys and the state's Executive Office of Public Safety and Security, will meet with the attorney general to come up with a uniform decision to sort out these issues.

"It's virtually impossible to effectuate the law as written," O'Keefe said. "It's a law full of inconsistencies."

For example, he said the law states that while possessing marijuana is not criminal, buying or obtaining the substance is.

Beyond clarifying enforcement of marijuana decriminalization, the law must follow a certain procedure before being finalized.

"Under Massachusetts state law, a ballot initiative law becomes effective 30 days after the secretary of state's presentation of the official results to the Governor and the Governor's Council," said Coakley. "This generally occurs in late November or early December. Therefore, the new law would go into effect 30 days following that meeting of the Governor's Council, meaning late December or early January."

In the meantime, Hampden District Attorney William M. Bennett, who serves the Springfield area, including Holyoke, said he plans to dismiss all pending charges of possessing an ounce or less of marijuana and will not pursue new cases, according to reports in The Republican.

Northwestern District Attorney Elizabeth D. Scheibel who serves Amherst, Hadley, Northampton, Sunderland and other towns surrounding UMass, has not dropped any cases and continues to prosecute new ones, said Deputy First Assistant District Attorney Elizabeth Dunphy Farris.

The majority of people arrested for marijuana possession under Scheibel's jurisdiction have their charges dropped after completing substance abuse programs, said Dunphy Farris.

In Franklin and Hampshire counties, from July 1, 2006 to Sept. 23, 2008, only 88 of the more than 1,700 marijuana possession cases, or about 5 percent, have resulted in a guilty finding, she said.

O'Keefe said he too plans to review cases as he has in the past.

"When and if this new statute that was voted on in November becomes law then we will deal with the matter," said O'Keefe.

Though lawmakers could change or abolish the legislature, officials say radical changes are unlikely.

However, some are in favor of the decriminalization of marijuana and are trying to change federal law.

U.S. Rep. Barney Frank initiated a bill which would decriminalize possession of marijuana in amounts of 3.5 ounces or less anywhere in the U.S.

But Frank said he doesn't feel his proposal will be approved anytime in the near future because he feels other legislators have not made their minds up on the issue, according to The Boston Globe.

"I was in favor [of decriminalization]. I felt like the penalties were a little harsh," said junior computer science major Craig Darmetko. "I heard some people are having a countdown until it passes."

"It's really, really amazing that it passed by such a big margin," said senior Katherine Bickering a philosophy and linguistics double major. Bickering is a member of the Cannabis Reform Coalition at UMass, a Registered Student Organization made up of outspoken supporters of Question 2.

"I think it's a disservice to people to not have information on the time lapse [between the passing of the law and when it goes into effect]," she said.

Honorary policy revised

By Ricky Flynn
Collegian Staff

Recent controversy over some honorary degree recipients is causing the University of Massachusetts to change its policy on awarding the degrees.

Most recently, Zimbabwe President Robert Mugabe, and George Bush's former White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card have caused some on campus to question the status of their degrees and how they were awarded.

The policy changes " . . intended to give faculty a greater role in reviewing nominations for honorary degrees was approved Oct. 30 by the Faculty Senate," said a University press release.

Under this revision, "The Rules Committee will vote in executive session on the list of nominations before the chancellor forwards them to the President's Office, which then sends them to the Board of Trustees," continued the press release.

Currently, the University's "Policy on Awarding Honorary Degrees," states that, "Candidates for honorary degrees shall be persons of great accomplishment and high ethical standards, who exemplify the ideals of [UMass]."

This past summer, the UMass Board of Trustees unanimously revoked the honorary law degree given to Mugabe on June 12. To this day, Mugabe is the only person to have their honorary degree revoked from UMass.

Members of the University community complained that Robert Mugabe is a racist president, responsible for hate crimes against people in Zimbabwe. Additionally, many blame Mugabe for the hyperinflation of Zimbabwe's economy.

The controversy surrounding Andrew Card is based on accusations suggesting Card is a war criminal because of his support and involvement in the Iraq War.

Claims have been made against both Mugabe and Card in the above policy, stating they're not "persons of high ethical standards."

In May of 2007, some members of the campus were upset when word that Card would be receiving an honorary degree came about. Some said Card was illegitimately added to the list of recipients without the approval of the faculty.

However, UMass President Jack Wilson and many faculty members were on board with the nomination.

Spokesman to the UMass president William Wright said, "Andrew Card was nominated by a faculty member and vetted through a committee of faculty, students and staff recommended to the Trustees." Wright explained that there was no illegal procedure that led to Card's nomination.

In an online petition, there are 1,750 signatures that, "support graduate students in respectfully requesting that all relevant University administrators... immediately revoke the offer of an honorary degree to Andrew H. Card, Jr

Flywheel moves to new digs

Long road to Old Town Hall for Easthampton arts venue

By Andrea Murray
Collegian Staff

Meag Kennedy, a senior art major at the University of Massachusetts, could be found at Flywheel, a music venue located in Easthampton, Mass., most any Friday or Saturday night when she was in high school.

A native of Agawam, Kennedy went to the Flywheel's dirt cheap punk shows as often as she could. In spring 2007, Flywheel closed its doors to move to a bigger location much closer to downtown, but has not yet been able to reopen.

Flywheel came to be after Cindy Bow and Helen Harrison's grassroots artistic collective, Valley Arts and Music Alliance (VAMA), was founded in 1998. The organization was founded on the purpose of valuing creativity over profit. The members helped one another to arrange free or low-cost, all-ages shows. VAMA held shows in VFW halls, churches and other spaces until a friend found a permanent place for them in a vacant cabinet store in December 1998. Flywheel was born in this location as more members joined the collective.

Flywheel officially opened in 1999. After eight years at 2 Holyoke Street, Flywheel decided to close in order to move to Easthampton's historic Old Town Hall at 43 Main Street.

"I'm really excited [it's reopening]. I didn't know it was happening. I got kind of worried [when they closed]. It was such a haven for me in high school," Kennedy said.

The Old Town Hall building is a more beneficial location for Flywheel. On Holyoke Street, the venue was in a residential neighborhood where it couldn't have shows past 11 p.m. because of Easthampton's noise order. Neighbors of the venue would get nervous when they had bigger shows, Lila Wolan, Flywheel's secretary, said they'll be able to be more flexible with their times by moving into the business district of town.

Flywheel's move hasn't gone as smoothly as they had hoped for. Numerous snags in their renovations to the Old Town Hall, a building constructed in the 1860s, have pushed back their new opening.

Their most recent issue was the discovery of lead paint on the ceilings. The task of properly removing and disposing of the paint will set them back $12,000 to $15,000. Wolan thought Flywheel would transition into its new location almost seamlessly. Between a sprinkler issue and a lead paint problem, renovations have been held up as they secured more and more funding.

Flywheel receives some money from grants, but their real bread and butter are donations ranging from $1 to $1,000 from supporters. A biannual record fair is held at Eastworks in Easthampton to benefit the organization. Concerts, tag sales, car washes and house shows have also been set up to support them, and their café sales provide them with extra funding.

Time donated to Flywheel by volunteers is most essential in keeping it going. Wolan said Thurston Moore of Sonic Youth has been supporting their efforts a bit, also encouraging the community and his friends to support them.

"It's kind of funny. When I mentioned to my lawyer that I was the secretary of Flywheel, his eyes lit up. I know that we have name recognition," Wolan said.

Flywheel is an important asset to the local community as they are the most reasonably priced venue in the area for booking shows. The venue is all ages. The cover charge at Flywheel is never more than $6. Wolan was quick to mention that they use a sliding fee scale and never turn anyone away if they don't have the money.

"You'd go because you loved music and had a good chance of stumbling upon something great, undiscovered and not mainstream," said Scott Brodeur, UMass journalism professor and Northampton resident. "You could feel the energy."

Though Flywheel typically hosts local musicians and artists on occasion, the venue has also hosted some big-name musical acts. Le Tigre and Fugazi both performed there in 2002. Sonic Youth and Bright Eyes have also made use of Flywheel's space in the past.

"I've been so lucky. I book so many shows. I can't pick a favorite anymore. They're all so unique and different," Wolan said.

Wolan's role at Flywheel, in addition to her secretarial duties, is to bring in new bands that people haven't heard of from places such as Boston or Connecticut. She likes to be able to show the community new and different music.

Wolan rattled off the names of her favorite acts that have performed there, including American Business Machine, Man Man, Dennis Mosi and the Instigators and Gone By Daylight.

Kennedy's favorite show was when the band Lightning Bolt played.

"There were easily 100 people waiting to get in outside. They had to turn people away," Kennedy said. "I'd never seen it packed like that."

Flywheel is entirely run by volunteers and nonprofit. It serves the community by providing an inexpensive space for live music, art exhibits, film and video screenings, poetry and spoken word events, theatrical and performance art, a zine library, a cafe and a place for meetings and discussion groups. Flywheel's mission statement says they believe art and information should be equally accessible and affordable to all people.

Anyone can join Flywheel. The collective is governed as a consensus, based on the Quakers, and isn't owned by anyone. Members receive a "myFly" login for Flywheel's Web site, where they can communicate with all the other members.

"Since we're all friends, it's been more laid back lately. There's a time limit on presentations and no one speaks over one another," Wolan said. "One or two people may have an issue and they keep debating until they reach a consensus."

The collective operates like a wheel, hence the name Flywheel. Members of the "hub" are the movers and shakers of the group. They invest a bigger time commitment to the group and are responsible for the activities that

Amy Davis of New Scenic Art and Display in Easthampton, Mass., volunteers her time to help renovate Flywheel's new venue, the historic Old Town Hall building at 43 Main Street.

The arts collective initially anticipated a smooth move, but numerous complications occured during the revamping of the 1860s building.

Flywheel recently discovered lead paint inside the Old Town Hall. The cost to have it professionally removed and disposed of is estimated anywhere between $12-$15,000.

keep Flywheel running on a day-to-day basis. They must invest eight to 12 hours and attend two meetings per month in the collective.

Members who are legally responsible for what happens at Flywheel are on the Flywheel collective board. These members have been involved for three months or more and must be able to serve on the board for at least one year.

Members who deal with booking shows are called the "spokes" of the collective. Spokes can book up to two shows per month. They simply pay the rental fee and are more or less free to promote their show do-it-yourself style.

Flywheel provides artists and show organizers with space, a portion of door money, and some promotional services. These include publicity in Flywheel's monthly calendar, Web site and email list, as well as other local publications. Most importantly, artists have free reign over their shows. They have and will host any kind of show, and very rarely refuse anyone.

"They [bands] are not there to support the local scene if they're going to be negative. We don't like anyone making fun of gay and lesbian groups," Wolan said. "We are communicative to social causes."

In order to become a spoke, one must attend a certain number of meetings throughout the year and become a member of the collective. Before a meeting, they must give notice that they want to become a member. The group collectively interviews and decides acceptance the same day. The collective trains them in lighting and sound, among other duties.

> "You'd go because you loved music and had a good chance of stumbling upon something great, undiscovered and not mainstream," said Scott Brodeur, UMass journalism professor and Northampton resident. "You could feel the energy."

Volunteers earn a free pass to a show after completing two volunteer shifts. Volunteers can pick and choose the shows they volunteer at, but Flywheel will ask volunteers to staff shows that they don't have enough people for.

Flywheel can also provide students with internships, which provide plenty of hands-on experience.

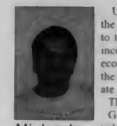
The volunteers at Flywheel are a diverse group of individuals. They range from artists and musicians to parents, videographers and community members. All volunteers in the collective have an equal vote in Flywheel's decisions. There are more than 70 volunteers at any given time.

Wolan is hopeful that once the lead paint problem is taken care of, all the other renovations will fall into place much quicker.

All that's left to do now is to take care of the lead paint, renovate the floors and put up new dry wall. Wolan hoped they'd be open by now.

"I'm crossing my fingers [to open] for early 2009," Wolan said.

The next Flywheel general body meeting is Monday, Nov. 17 at 8 p.m. New volunteers are always welcome – only a few shifts per month could help them out a lot. They'll be discussing updates in fundraising, renovations and most importantly, shows.



One can get more information about joining Flywheel's collective as a volunteer by calling 413-527-9800, or e-mailing volunteer@flywheelarts.org. Answers to questions about volunteering can be found on their Web site, Flywheelarts.org.

A new future

Michael Phillis

Uncommonly large crowds and shouts of joy reached the next President of the United States. The power of the youth vote helped to propel Barack Obama to the most powerful office in the world after the Bush Administration. The incoming President will face a struggling economy. In fact, it was neither the economy nor Iraq that won him the most powerful office in the world. It was the enthusiasm and the happiness of such a grand slice of the American electorate who hoped that an inspirational man would make a great President.

This same scene greeted former President Bill Clinton upon his election. Great enthusiasm has greeted both of the last two Democratic presidential winners. The similarities between the two should be noticed – but more importantly, what happened in the early 1990s should be a cautionary note to anybody who hopes this administration is successful.

Bill Clinton had the worst presidential transition in United States history of any of the 41 presidents before him.

The White House chief of staff largely controls who gets to take up the President's time. With the power to control the President's time, the chief of staff has a huge role in forming an administration's message.

Clinton's worst mistake was his appointment of Thomas McLarty III, who had good intentions, but was too nice and low-key to run an effective White House.

After the appointment of a less-than-aggressive chief of staff, the Clinton Administration was thrown off from its message by a question from Andrea Mitchell of NBC. Mitchell asked Clinton whether or not he'd keep his campaign promises – specifically if he'd allow gays in the military. Clinton acknowledged her question, replying that he would.

Clinton was elected as an inexperienced politician who was intelligent, a good leader and a voice for change. It's not hard to look at Obama and be nervous of a character with similar traits.

This single answer threw his major policy messages askew. The initial spending of political capital was on what many thought was an insignificant issue – one not central to the Clinton Administration's plans.

Problems with a central message – a theme – plagued the first couple of years during Clinton's tenure in office and we should remember his mistakes. Clinton was elected as an inexperienced politician who was intelligent, a good leader and a voice for change. It's not hard to look at Obama and be nervous of a character with similar traits.

Dubbed "Obambi" by The New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd, Barack Obama was not the favorite to win the presidency and was thought of as a candidate without much of a backbone. It's natural to worry about whether or not the next President will do well, and there's hardly a better indicator before Obama even takes office than his White House chief of staff choice.

Obama has chosen Rahm Emanuel to be his chief of staff. For those who don't know, Rahm Emanuel's brother is the model for Ari Gold, the obscene, harsh agent on the HBO show Entourage.

Rahm shares much of his brother's personality as a high-energy, get-things-done kind of character. Emanuel should bring a focus to the Obama Administration and its message. His reputation is one of competence and accomplishment, even if his accomplishments usually follow strict party lines.

It took time before Clinton was able to learn how to be an effective president. Obama, so far, has held a largely successful press conference, hired a potentially effective chief of staff, and seems to be vetting his possible cabinet members with unprecedented vigor. So far, the signs seem to point to a far more focused Obama White House than the nation's last Democratic president had.

During Clinton's two terms, liberal happiness and heavy partisanship shook the core of American politics and swept a heavy Republican majority into Congress. Eventually, famed journalist Bob Woodward would write his book "The Agenda" which exposed Clinton's ineffective first 100 days.

Obama is looking to avoid repeating his predecessor's mistakes. There's good news in the few decisions he's finalized so far. There is hope that Obama's term will be more productive than Clinton's. However, it'll take time and patience before Obama's governing style comes into full focus. Initially, historical indicators seem to be positive for Obama and the Democrats.

Putting the 'War on Drugs' behind bars

Nick Bush

Before this election, I was genuinely concerned that we as a people may have lost control of our very own legal system. That was until I witnessed the democratic and libertarian victory of Question 2 in Massachusetts.

Despite almost every major state politician coming out of the woodwork to stand against the ballot initiative, it remained popular from the outset right through the election, passing with an overwhelming 70 percent to 30 percent. Nearly everyone supposedly representing and protecting us in government and law enforcement wanted the measure dead, including Deval Patrick, John Kerry, Mitt Romney and the district attorney of every state country. But all the king's horses and all the king's men couldn't keep pot from being nearly legal again.

The state actually stands to make millions of dollars each year by ticketing violators, according to those who pushed for the ballot initiative. Apparently, voters are starting to catch on to the fact that it's incredibly expensive and futile to wage war on nouns, such as "drugs" or "terror." I'm sure a little less war and a little more educated democracy might be good for everyone involved.

There's only one little problem. Our cute new state law could possibly be considered unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

The people of California legalized the use of marijuana for medical purposes in 1996. However, Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) officers still continued to arrest those legally smoking and growing in the state. After 10 years of contradictory state and federal law, the Supreme Court ruled two years ago that the DEA indeed has the right to seize pot plants being grown to treat cancer and HIV/AIDS patients, as well as other ailments marijuana can help.

Question 2 in Massachusetts doesn't legalize the drug, but instead requires state and local police to not arrest individuals for possession of small amounts (under an ounce, as I'm sure you've heard).

This is a policy that works well within the confines of state powers (local police duties), so don't expect Question 2 to show up on a Supreme Court docket anytime soon. But the ballot initiative does again point out how horribly deluded our national drug policy is in America.

Ever since President Richard Nixon declared the War on Drugs in 1971 and pushed through the Controlled Substances Act, our country has placed Cheech and Chong under the same legal framework as users of serious drugs, such as heroin and cocaine.

Are we really going to let Nixon – that infamous, slimy crook – shape our modern-day drug policy? Are we really going to continue to disenfranchise millions of voters with racist and authoritarian national drug laws?

Are we really going to let Nixon – that infamous, slimy crook – shape our modern-day drug policy? Are we really going to continue to disenfranchise millions of voters with racist and authoritarian national drug laws? Are we really going to continue to dump billions of dollars each year into arresting our own citizens for a victimless crime?

Marijuana still makes up nearly half of all our drug arrests as a nation. America has more than 1 percent of our population in jail, which is the largest proportion of any civilization's population to ever be incarcerated in the history of the world.

This huge surplus of felons is thanks in large part to our determination to pour money and law enforcement resources into the War on Drugs. Our own government has had plenty of shady connections to drug dealers such as the Contras, yet it has the audacity to say it should put a person behind bars for smoking a joint? Give me a break.

This election, the 1960s and 1970s generations of pot-smoking baby boomers finally showed up to vote in Massachusetts, and across the nation. If this trend continues over the next few decades, we may go from living in a country that talks about "freedom," to one that finally embraces it.

Militant gay-rights activists strike out

Alana Goodman

Fortunately, last week's historic election of the most liberal, inexperienced U.S. president of all time had a silver lining. California, long considered a lost cause for conservatism, passed Proposition 8 to ban same-sex marriage.

But while I was quietly shedding tears into a tall glass of Rubinoff after John McCain's defeat, militant gay rights activists in California weren't accepting their loss as graciously. "No on Prop 8" protests flooded the state's streets last week, occasionally turning violent.

Counter-demonstrator Phyllis Burgess soon learned that the easiest way to shock a bunch of nipple-pierced, leather-clad activists is to bring a religious symbol to their rally. The local Channel 2 affiliate for Palm Springs caught footage of protestors assaulting the elderly, cross-wielding Burgess. They then grabbed the religious effigy out of her hands and stomped on it.

"I don't want to keep it peaceful anymore. We should fight!" yelled one demonstrator, before the mob lashed out at the Channel 2 news crew.

The peace-loving, tolerance-preaching gay activists also took their anti-Christian anger to the blogosphere. Most of their invectives were directed towards Mormons, who are avid supporters of Prop 8.

"Burn their f---ing churches to the ground, and then tax the charred timbers," insisted the popular Web site and blog JoeMyGod. One poster listed the addresses of local Mormon churches, writing, "I do not openly advocate firebombing or vandalism. What you do with the information is your own choice."

While these threats of violence came from extremists and certainly don't represent the views of all pro-gay marriage activists, the movement's behavior toward the Mormon Church has become increasingly hostile.

A commercial paid for by an independent "No on Prop 8" group shows actors dressed as Mormon missionaries storming into the charming home of two beautiful newlywed lesbians.

"Hi, we're here from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. We're here to take away your rights," the Mormons say as Hitchcock-esque music plays. They proceed to rip off the women's wedding rings, pillage their home and destroy their marriage license.

I can't help but picture a wholesome, heterosexual, God-fearing Massachusetts couple sitting down for a family dinner. Suddenly, two badge-brandishing muscle men barge in, sporting short-shorts and Mystic tans.

"Hey, we have rights!" the foxy lesbians pout.

"Not if we can help it," reply the missionaries.

Some gay activists are even attempting to strip the Mormon Church of its status as a religious organization.

"I show the world that gay people know how to hit back. Sign this petition to support the legal effort to strip the Mormon Church of its tax-exempt status," wrote Mario Ruiz in a Huffington Post article.

While it's true that the Mormon Church gave millions of dollars to "Yes on Prop 8" efforts, they had good reason to do so. Despite insistences by gay activists that same-sex marriage promotes inclusiveness, its legalization in Massachusetts has led to an atmosphere of intolerance for religious and moral values.

Millions of taxpayer dollars are being used to teach homosexuality in Massachusetts public schools, often against parents' objections. In 2006, some families filed a Civil Rights lawsuit to force the schools to notify parents before homosexual-related subjects were taught. The judge ruled that because same-sex marriage is legal in Massachusetts, the schools aren't obligated to notify parents or let their opt out their children, even for religious reasons.

Some of the lessons being espoused in public schools are disturbing. During an interview with NPR radio, an eighth-grade Brookline teacher, Deb Allen, recounted her numerous discussions with her class about lesbian sex toys.

In Brockton, a social worker was brought into a third-grade class to teach eight year olds about sex change operations.

Even more shocking was the distribution of a piece of smut literature called "The Little Black Book – Queer in the 21st Century" to underage students at Brookline High School. The book is a poorly disguised pornographic sex manual, featuring sections titled "Lickin' Butt," "Piss Play," "Fisting," "Mutual Jerkin' Off," and gave sex tips that would make Jim McGreevy blush.

Think homosexuality is a sensitive subject that should be discussed with your children in the privacy of your home and in accordance with your values? Not in Massachusetts. In this state, teachers decide how your children should learn about homosexuality. Parents who complain are ignored, labeled intolerant or encouraged to send their children to private school.

In the back of my mind, I can't help but picture a wholesome, heterosexual, God-fearing Massachusetts couple sitting down for a family dinner. Suddenly, two badge-brandishing muscle men barge in, sporting short-shorts and Mystic tans.

"Who are you?" cries the couple as ominous music begins to play.

"We're gay activists," the men say. "We're here to take away your rights."

The activists ransack the family's home, find the couple's seven-year-old daughter and begin lecturing her on the merits of "piss play."

"You can't teach her that! We have rights!" protest the girl's parents.

"Not anymore," cackle the activists as they exit the house.

The militant homosexual movement has proven time and time again it'll use fear and intimidation to intolerantly deny the same rights to the rest of society that it claims for itself. Thankfully, most small voters were able to see through these tactics.

California, you made the right decision.

ARTS & LIVING

Epic brought to life at UMass

By Michelle Friedetti
Collegian Staff

After being read from texts for years, "The Epic of Gilgamesh" will return to its roots in oral tradition tonight at Bowker Auditorium.

The telling of the epic, which will be done by actor-storyteller Margaret Olivia Wolfson, will have musical accompaniment by Simon Shaheen, a Palestinian-American musician and composer, and the Qantara Ensemble.

Myths material is Wolfson's forte. She's the founder of World Myth and Music, which has performed in hundreds of venues, including the Sydney Opera House, the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts and the Bushnell Center for the Performing Arts.

She was also both the founder and director of CalArts in Los Angeles' Myth Project. She worked with MFA students at CalArts, training them in the skill of combining myth with solo performances.

Wolfson has also written four books dealing with mythic material. "Mother of Beauty" was nominated for a Pushcart Editor's Choice Award in 2007, and "Marriage of the Rain Goddess" earned a United Kingdom Reading Association Award. Her books draw on Zulu, Persian and Sufi cultures, among others.

Wolfson specializes dramatic performances like the version of "The Gilgamesh Epic" she will present tonight. Collaborating with musicians, composers and even artists, Wolfson explores ancient epics, legends, myths and fairy tales in an original way.

Prior to her work on "The Epic of Gilgamesh," Wolfson worked with Opera Memphis Director Michael Ching on a piece entitled "Psyche and Eros." The performance combined the telling of the Greek myth of Psyche and Eros by a solo actor accompanied by a string orchestra.

The performance of "The Epic of Gilgamesh" is not the first experience Wolfson has had working with Shaheen. The two also collaborated on "Majnun Layla," an Arabian love story. The show opened to critical acclaim and ran for nearly two years, concluding with a gala performance at the Kennedy Center's Terrace Theater.

Shaheen has also had a prolific career. In the 1990s, he released four albums, "Saltarah," "Turath," "Taqasim" and "Simon Shaheen: The Music of Mohamed Abdel Wahab."

A notable Arab musician, Shaheen uses a multitude of different styles and techniques in his music, and has also contributed to many different projects. Some of his work has been used in the soundtracks of the films "Malcolm X" and "The Sheltering Sky," and he composed the soundtrack for "For Everyone Everywhere," a United Nations-sponsored documentary.

Shaheen has found much recognition from his achievements, and in 1998 was presented with the National Heritage Award at the White House.

In 2001, he released an album with his ensemble Qantara, called "Blue Flame." The album was nominated for 11 Grammy Awards.

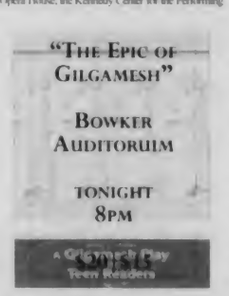
Qantara was formed by Shaheen six years earlier, in 1995, and the group combines Shaheen's traditional Arab music with postmodern jazz, creating a unique cultural fusion.

The son of a musician, Shaheen plays the violin and oud, an Arabian lute, for the group. His father, a professor of music, taught him to play the oud at the age of five.

"Learning to play on the oud from my father was the most powerful influence in my musical life," Shaheen has claimed. At the Conservatory for Western Classical Music in Jerusalem, Shaheen picked up the violin a year after he had started with the oud.

Since graduating from the Academy of Music in Jerusalem in 1978, Shaheen has taught music; given lectures and workshops; performed demonstrations at schools; composed with grants from organizations like the National Endowments for the Arts and the New York State Council on the Arts; and has performed to sold-out venues such as Carnegie Hall and Cairo's Opera House.

The other musicians of Qantara are also world renowned. They will accompany Shaheen's violin and oud with the ney (Arabian flute) and world percussion.



"The Epic of Gilgamesh" is a story of friendship, love, and the search for immortality; it deals with issues such as death, grief, and the consequences of hubris, subjects that are still resonant today.

"The Epic of Gilgamesh" will be performed at UMass' Bowker Auditorium in Southwest Hall at 8 p.m. this Tonight. Tickets are $20 for the general public; $15 for Five College students and youth 17 and under. Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office.

M83 to play Pearl Street, new album sure to please

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

Anthony Gonzalez, like others in the world of music, prides himself on an appreciation for, an understanding of, and an intention to build upon sounds forged decades ago. This distinctly ranges from styles crafted in the late 1970s to the mid 1980s and early 1990s.

Gonzalez will bring his M83 outfit, based in Antibes, France, to Northampton's Pearl Street Nightclub Sunday night. It'll be one stop in the middle of a North American tour with School of Seven Bells before he shoots to the UK for a string of dates with arena-rock mainstays, Kings of Leon.

While their earlier work focused on ambient techniques in the vein of Brian Eno, M83's most recent record, "Saturdays = Youth," strays from longer passages in favor of more concise, synth-driven pop formulas reminiscent of Tears for Fears or Cocteau Twins. The album, released Apr. 14, embraces a certain factor of over-the-top melodrama, producing a stylized cluster of vast, cinematic pop songs.

"Saturdays = Youth" updates earlier works such as their 2003 full-length "Dead Cities, Red Seas, and Lost Ghosts," putting more emphasis on vocals and a verse-chorus-verse structure in place of the gorgeous sonic landscapes found in pieces like "In Church," where huge organ choruses throb, rising higher and higher until accompanied by buzzing synthesizers in the climax.

This may not come as a surprise, as Gonzalez has now separated himself with former collaborator Nicholas Fromageau, who left the duo before their 2005 album "Before the Dawn Heals Us."

The "Dead Cities..." follow-up relies less heavily on huge squalls of electronic noise and more on rhythm, progression and pop sensibilities. It's the product of an increase in Gonzalez' portion of the work.

His next release, last year's "Digital Shades Vol. 1," saw a regression back into nearly strict ambient sounds, notably in the album opener, "Waves, Waves, Waves," where waves splash up on shore as synth tones warmly pulsate.

Much of the record is influenced by German Krautrock progressions, building layers of sensual sound on top of each other until a lush climax is reached before ebbing away. The project's title is appropriate, as Gonzalez essentially used his home studio space to explore various colors and textures all within the confines of electronics.

His new record, however, bursts with color in a different light. "Saturdays = Youth" uses texture and timbre to supplement a modern pop sound, adding more voice to the mix as well as guitars and drum sounds.

The album's opener runs through like an older M83 track. Electronic tones sweep and soar, while highlighted by Morgan Kibby's glass-fragile vocal. The pace is upped moments later, as third single "Kim & Jessie" hops along, glimmering and ornate as any bombastic Tears for Fears hit.

"Graveyard Girl," the record's second single, features synth-pop elements on the

Full-frontal assault at Iron Horse, courtesy 'Amity'

By Peter Rizzo
Collegian Staff

Do you like your rock 'n' roll gritty, rootsy and with a side of Americana? Then Northampton's own The Amity Front asks, "Have you had the full Amity frontal yet?"

Levin Schwartz, who swaps instrumental duties on the guitar with mandolin and vocals, describes the experience as "one that represents the full spectrum of American music."

"We play all types [of music], from roots, to heavy rock 'n' roll, to blue grass and country," said Schwartz. "We also try to incorporate everything from delta blues to jazz standards."

With the exception of singer and guitarist Erik Alan of Michigan, The Amity Front's members hail from the New England area. Schwartz and fellow band member Lyon Graulty are UMass alumni, from a time when "Butterfield was in full force, with tons of bands playing right in the basement."

Schwartz played in a band called Few and Far Between, which played mostly bluegrass in the vein of the current UMass band The Fine and Dandy Trio.

According to the band's MySpace.com profile, it was Alan's arrival that sparked Schwartz's current band, The Amity Front. This chance encounter happened when future band members Levin Schwartz and Max Adam were playing one night at an open mic.

As the legend goes, Alan "floated into the jam session in a whirlwind of cigarette smoke and excitement with a voice straight out of an old 12-inch."

By then, the nameless band lived together in a house on 174 Amity Street, where current members of the group still reside. The band derived its name from the residence as well as its proximity to the street where they found their musical beginnings.

Since then, The Amity Front has toured all across New England and beyond. Tonight the band will have a chance to return to their humble roots in support of their newest album, "Border Towns."

With influences ranging from Ray Charles and Otis Reading to The Band and Bob Dylan, The Amity Front manages to forge an original sound with guitar jams augmented by slow bass lines, harmonica and mandolin.

In spite of their love for the old fashioned, Schwartz says the band also has a taste for newer acts, citing Wilco, Andrew Bird and Widespread Panic as their contemporary influences.

These influences come together in the heads of the four songwriters, which leaves no shortage of creative inspiration. With four members, one might expect some creative differences, but according to Schwartz the band has no internal problems.

"We all knew we wanted to be a song-based band. We all come to the table with solid songs," said Schwartz. "Usually they're pretty structured as far as arrangements. But what comes out isn't always the same thing. Eventually everyone's personality goes into the song and it comes out completely different."

Songs like "Leave it All Behind" showcase how the band brings foot-tapping, beer-chugging ditties into modern territory. The Amity Front creates a feel-good song from tales of today's economic hardships where the rent is overdue and "you can't afford your oil bill and you just lost all your heat."

Elsewhere the band dips through love songs about girls met on the road in "Alena's Eyes."

"The people at our shows are good people," Schwartz said before adding, "Don't miss your chance. Come out, get connected and come and hang with the people."

Tickets for the show can be found online at ihog.com or at the door. Doors open at 10 p.m. and tickets are $10 at the door.

Pete Rizzo can be reached at prizzo@student.umass.edu.

The Amity Front started off in the Butterfield dorm. They are touring to support their latest album "Border Towns."

Develop a palate and tempt your taste buds with wine

By Jennifer Turner
Collegian Correspondent

This weekend, try something new — learn wine-tasting basics and impress your friends.

"Wine makes daily living easier, less hurried, with fewer tensions and more tolerance." — Benjamin Franklin

Wine Basics

There are many different varieties of wines, several of which we will discuss in weeks to come. However, to truly understand and appreciate wine, one must first know the basics. This week, we will explore how to properly taste wine, so that you may begin to develop your palate and start making decisions on what you like and don't like.

For a first tasting, I recommend starting with two whites and two reds. All whites and reds are not the same, so try four different grape varietals. This way, you'll be able to note all the differences. My suggestion for first timers: a Riesling, a Chardonnay, a Pinot Noir and a Merlot.

Also, don't break the bank the first time around. While it's usually true that the price tag matches the wine quality, it's more important that you develop your taste buds first. So try something inexpensive or on sale. Many times, the clerks in the store will be able to help you with your choices.

It's also important to note that a tasting is simply that: a taste. Don't plan on drinking a whole glass of each wine. A small sample of two ounces of each wine will be plenty.

Tasting Techniques

Start with the lighter wines and work your way to the heaviest and driest of the bunch (dry meaning little to no residual sugar). For example, always start with whites before reds, or champagnes before whites. If using the wines recommended above, begin with the Riesling and end with the Merlot.

Pour a taste into your glass and notice the color. Keeping notes on what you observe throughout your tasting will make it easier to remember what you enjoyed — let's face it, after a few tastings things may become a bit fuzzy.

With the glass still planted on the countertop or table, give it a tiny swirl. This helps oxygen mix with the wine, and the flavors should open up and intensify. More specifically, it helps the wine "breathe," a term you may be familiar with.

Now stick your nose into the glass and inhale deeply. What you'll be enjoying is called the "nose" of the wine. Each wine has a different nose, and the smell of the wine is almost, if not just, as important as the taste. Take a minute to appreciate the aroma of the wine, and see what scents you discover.

Now comes the best part: the tasting itself. Take a sip of the wine, but do not swallow immediately. Swish it around in your mouth and let it sit on your tongue for a few seconds. Take a deep breath in while doing this. This allows the fruit to fully open up, and allows you to savour the subtleties of the wine.

After the first taste, take another, but this time swallow normally and notice the finish of the wine. This is the stage where you'll most likely be able to tell what you enjoy or dislike about each wine.

Eat a cracker or some pretzels in between each wine to help cleanse your palate. Also, be sure to rinse your glass or use a new one so that flavors don't mix.

After this initial tasting, you may already be starting to form some opinions about your individual preferences. Perhaps you prefer the whites to the reds. Maybe you enjoy the drier over the sweet.

However, your taste buds will also grow with time and experience, and some of the more complex wines will take some getting used to. Just because you can't handle a bold Cabernet or Chianti now, doesn't mean you'll never be able to.

It's important to start at the beginning and work your way up.

Musician Anthony Gonzalez will try to bring the same atmosphere that is so prevalent on M83's albums to the Pearl Street Nightclub this Sunday night.

order of the Killers, referencing goth gals who like to chill at cemeteries. The song succeeds at an overly-dramatic, teen-diary-caliber monologue, where Kibby recites the lines: "And I'll read poetry to the (grave)stones. Maybe one day I can be one of them, wise and silent, waiting for someone to love me, waiting for someone to kiss me. I'm 15 years old and I feel it's already too late to live. Don't you?"

After the angst, the record's gothic quota is yet again filled, as the album's centerpiece and first single, "Couleurs," provides eight and a half minutes of a killer club track for the kids who dress in black.

The new single, "We Own the Sky," doesn't drop until early 2009, but M83 has just announced a music video contest to accompany its release. Anyone can submit an entry on the contest's YouTube.com page until the deadline, Jan. 20. Gonzalez himself will pick a winner.

The collaborative aspect of the music video doesn't necessarily jive with the whole concept of Gonzalez as a solo musician, though M83 as a solo project surely creates cohesive works as opposed to the sprawling landscapes of his Fromageau days.

M83 will perform in the clubroom at the Pearl Street Nightclub Sunday at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $15 in advance, available through Ibeg.com and the Northampton Box Office, or $18 at the door.

UMass forms a plan

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The dribble-drive offense is when two forwards and two guards form outside the three-point line – two on either side parallel to the sidelines – and the center is inside, either at the foul line or in front of the basket.

The scheme works so that if any of the four exterior players aren't open for a clear outside shot, the center is made for a layup. However, this can't be very effective unless the outside players act as a consistent scoring threat, lessening the pressure inside. If this happens, a player has the option to "drive" inside, penetrate the defense and attack the basket.

Thanks to Vance Walberg, the Massachusetts women's basketball team has a new, quicker style of play to compensate for the loss of graduating senior forward Kate Mills, whom the offense was based around last season.

Walberg comes from perennial powerhouse Memphis as a former assistant coach to former UMass men's basketball coach, John Calipari. He's worked from top to bottom in the sport of basketball, enjoying success at the high school, junior collegiate and collegiate levels.

Walberg is working with UMass coach Marnie Ducko and the rest of the UMass women's basketball staff to implement the new playing style for the Minutewomen.

"We're really incorporating a different look," Walberg said during a teleconference on Atlantic 10 Media Day, on Oct. 28. "We want to get up the floor, we want to hit a lot of threes, and we're going to be a deep team."

The offense is already making undeveloped players play well and established players play better. The Minutewomen first used the offense in an exhibition game against the Bishop's University Gaiters last Friday night at the Mullins Center. UMass scored 38 of its 75 points in the paint in its 31-point win over the Gaiters.

Sophomore center Teya Wright scored 13 points in the middle and kept her head up to grab seven offensive rebounds. But even with Wright's production down low, the new offensive playing style enabled other players to get open for long-range shots.

Cerie Musgrove was often left open to take uncontested three-pointers, six of which she made.

While senior Captain Stefanie Gerardot had multiple scores from beyond the arc as well, she also utilized the other option in the offense. She scored 11 points in the paint when muscling past taller defenders to get to the basket. Ducko admits that there's still work to be done while teaching her players the new offense.

"We're still learning what a good [three-point shot] is and what's a better three," Ducko said of the outside shot selection of her players. "I'd like to utilize our post much more than we have been. So if we have good threes and we've got rebounders, you know what, go up and take it. But if we're struggling a little bit, I'd like to see five or six passes before a shot."

Although some shots were ill-advised, UMass maintained a good position under the basket and grabbed 18 rebounds while making up for those shots with 19 second chance points on the put-back.

Opening weekend starts, Minutewomen set to play

Junior Kim Benton averaged three points per game last season for the Minutewomen. UMass takes on Vermont and Manhattan this weekend.

Defense key in opening weekend

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

It isn't saying much that this will be one of the toughest weekends of the season for the Massachusetts women's basketball team when they've only played one exhibition game so far.

However, the Minutewomen will face a National Invitational Tournament participant in Vermont Friday night before they return to Amherst for their home-opener against Manhattan.

Guard Pam Rosario scored a career-high 25 points to lead UMass to a 69-68 victory last season against the Catamounts. Forward Kate Mills scored 12 points in the game with two blocks and two steals.

Having lost those two players to graduation, UMass coach Marnie Ducko will introduce a different starting-five against UVM, who returns all but three players.

Vermont is led by junior guard Courtnay Pilypaitis, a player who often plays at the power forward position because of her six-foot-one-inch frame. In last year's game against the Minutewomen, Pilypaitis dropped 12 points and seven rebounds.

The Catamounts play a four-out-one-in offense, which focuses on the center position in the paint, while the forwards and guards work the ball around the perimeter.

"It's a great basketball environment," Ducko said of the opportunity to play the Catamounts in Vermont. "It'll be a great test just to see where we're at [in terms of progress]."

Playing a Catamount team that made the National Invitation Tournament last season will bring invaluable experience to a young UMass team looking to improve upon last season's sixth-place finish in the Atlantic 10 Conference. Officials from the A-10 tabbed the Minutewomen to finish 12th in the conference this season.

UMass has a daunting task ahead of it to defeat UVM. Even though the Minutewomen beat the Bishop's Gaiters last week, Ducko hopes the team won't lose focus against Vermont.

"We really have to defend strong on the ball because we don't want to give a lot of help off the ball," Ducko said. "I think that's a concern with all of these players. I think this is a team that executes 100 times better than Bishop's [University]. They're a better team from top to bottom. This is a team that I'd rather we face now so I can see where we're at."

After its stop in Burlington, the Marroon and White return home for its home-opener at the Mullins Center to face the Lady Jaspers.

Manhattan finished last season with a final record of 15-15, 6-7 in road games.

The Lady Jaspers have five freshmen and nine underclassmen on the team overall. They're picked to finish 10th in the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference, a league similar to the A-10 in relation to the rest of the women's basketball conferences in the country.

Manhattan is coming off a win against Saint Rose with a final score of 75-48. Junior guard Michelle Pacheco was the game's high-scorer, finishing with 19 points, seven assists and five steals. Pacheco is one of the only returning top players on the team besides senior guard Annie McIntyre, who had 17 points and three steals in the contest.

Rebounding is equally as suspect for the Lady Jaspers. In their last game, five-foot-eight guard Alyssa Harrington had the most boards, with seven. The Manhattan players over five-foot-11 grabbed a total of five rebounds.

After going 6-12 in the UMass exhibition game against the Gaiters, sophomore guard Cerie Musgrove made a strong case to keep her starting spot for the Minutewomen. Alongside senior Captain Stefanie Gerardot, the UMass backcourt will continue to utilize the new dribble-drive offense that Ducko will use this season with her seemingly speedier team.

The Mullins Center will be a welcomed change from Burlington for the Minutewomen. Last season, UMass had a home record of 11-1 against non-conference teams.

"We like playing at home," said Ducko. "The Mullins Center's been good to us and I think we're going to get more fans to come out and see us."

No. 1 BU and UML bring stiff competition

UMass hosts two games this weekend

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

Any weekend with two Hockey East games is important, but when one of the opponents moves to No. 1 in the nation, the weekend's games evolve from big to huge.

The No. 20 Massachusetts hockey team (4-2-1, 2-1-1 Hockey East) returns home this weekend after playing six of its last seven games on the road. Tonight, UMass will host No. 1 Boston University (6-1-0, 3-1-0 Hockey East) and UMass Lowell (3-4-0, 1-2-0 Hockey East) on Saturday.

"[The Terriers] have some of the best scorers in the league and a whole host of athletes who are capable of being difference makers," UMass Coach Don Cahoon said. "They've improved goaltending, which gives them added confidence in the tight games. Arguably, they have the best defensive corps in all of college hockey."

BU has scored at least six goals in its last three games, including two games against ranked opponents No. 5 Michigan (7-2) and No. 14 Vermont (7-2). The Terriers also beat UMass Lowell, 6-4, on Nov. 7.

Boston University has scored 33 goals by 14 different skaters this season, while only allowing 14. Leading the Terriers in goals is Colin Wilson and Jason Lawrence with five, followed by Nick Bonino and Chris Higgins with four.

The Terriers' defense is led by senior Matt Gilroy, who will see a lot of ice time against UMass' top scoring line of senior Alex Berry, senior Cory Quirk and sophomore James Marcou. Gilroy and his defensive partner junior Brian Strait can shut down any line in the nation.

UMass' top line compliments each other and relies on quick, precise passes to make its way down the ice. Marcou is a natural playmaker, combining his talent with Berry, and Quirk's experience and skill allows the line to be the Minutemen's greatest offensive threat.

Beyond Gilroy and Strait, Boston University is very deep defensively. Colby Cohen and Kevin Shattenkirk play a similar game as Gilroy and Strait. They all position themselves well and play a big role on offense.

The Terriers' goaltenders, freshmen Kieran Millan and Grant Rollheiser, have both seen time in net. Millan has played in four games, allowing nine goals, while Rollheiser has allowed five goals in three games. After struggling with netminders last season, Millan and Rollheiser have stepped up and helped increase the team's confidence in their defensive zone.

On Saturday, UMass Lowell's goaltending situation is undetermined due to the injury of junior Carl Hutton in the third period of the River Hawk's loss to Boston University. Hutton will be out of play for at least a month because of his ankle. The netminder position will be between freshman T.J. Massie and junior Nevin Hamilton.

Going into the third period of the River Hawks game, they were winning 3-2. After Hutton's injury, Massie took the ice and allowed four goals on 12 BU shots to hand the Terriers the win.

Cahoon and the Minutemen are concentrating on Friday's game before thinking about challenging UMass Lowell.

"I know UMass Lowell is not looking beyond New Hampshire [who the River Hawks play tonight] as they have business to take care of [today]. You cannot spend a lot of time on the second game until the first one of the weekend has been played," Cahoon said.

Penalties could bring trouble to UMass

UM penalty killers maintain spark

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

A big reason for the No. 20 Massachusetts hockey team's loss last weekend to Merrimack was their inability to stay out of the penalty box.

The Minutemen (4-2-1, 2-1-1 Hockey East) were guilty of seven penalties, three in the first period and three in the second. While spending so much time in the penalty box, UMass was forced to play on the defensive for a chunk of those two periods, wearing themselves out by the time the third period came around – already down by a goal.

The Minutemen were also handed a 5-on-3 advantage when Merrimack's Brandon Sadlowski and Karl Stollery were called for penalties with 2 minutes, 50 seconds remaining in the game. It was another opportunity the Minutemen failed to cash in on, due to playing strenuously for the past two periods.

UMass can't afford to spend much time in the penalty box when it comes to playing No. 1 Boston University (6-1-0, 3-1-0 Hockey East) and UMass Lowell (3-4-0, 1-2-0 Hockey East) this Friday and Saturday night, respectively.

Despite spending too much time on the penalty kill, UMass Coach Don Cahoon continues to praise the efforts of his special teams.

"I think we have some compliments in both areas with veterans on both sides who have a wealth of experience," Cahoon said. "On the man-down, the speed and experience is a big part, with the addition of willingness to block shots."

Fortunately for the Minutemen, they have an excellent penalty-killing unit. UMass has killed 25 penalties in a row dating back to when the Minutemen played Rensselaer on Oct. 21.

Brett Watson, Martin Nolet and UMass goalkeepers Paul Dainton and Dan Meyers are huge reasons for the unit's success.

"The final part of it has been good goaltending. Dainton was hurt earlier in the year, but Meyers came back and had some great outings," Cahoon said. "The goaltending has been the biggest part of the penalty kill so far."

The Minutemen have held opponents to a .061 power play success rate. The unit is also ranked sixth in the nation.

The Terriers boast one of the nation's most prolific offenses. BU has scored over five goals in their last three games, and has only allowed eight in those games. If UMass wants a chance to beat the No. 1 team in the country, then they have to keep out of the penalty box.

With Massachusetts on the penalty kill so often, Cory Quirk, Brett Watson and other players that are on the two penalty kill units get tired very quickly.

When Quirk and his other two linemates James Marcou and Chris Davis aren't on the ice with a man down, they're causing havoc for opposing defenses. The trio has accumulated 28 points this season, making opposing defenses almost invincible.

The three were especially successful two weeks ago when they played a home-and-home series with Providence College.

Beside BU, the Minutemen can't afford to take penalties against any team in the Hockey East.

The Hockey East is one of the strongest divisions in college hockey, and will make any opponent pay for their mistakes.

Watson and Nolet provide the Minutemen special teams with aggressiveness the team needs to succeed with a man down. Watson plays close to the blueline, forcing opposing attackers into less-than-desirable situations and possibly turning over the puck.

Nolet does much of the same, but has more of a physical presence. Nolet uses his body to create turnovers and to give Minutemen defenders a chance to come to his aid, killing time.

Faceoffs, fortunately for the Minutemen, prove to be a strength. UMass has won 53 percent of their faceoffs, which is essential when a faceoff comes in the Minutemen zone after a penalty.

Two guys, one column

By Eli Rosenswaike and Michael King
Collegian Columnists

Eli Rosenswaike

Michael King

We here at The Massachusetts Daily Collegian – and by we I mean myself and Mr. Editor-in-Chief himself, Michael King – have been covering UMass sports for far too long.

So who better to go to when you want to know the results of Saturday's irrelevant football game – before it even happens?

In every Collegian Weekend Edition throughout the rest of the year, we will be prognosticating every UMass sporting event – no matter how inconsequential.

Just remember, you heard it here first.

Friday, Nov. 14

Men's Soccer vs. TBD (Atlantic 10 Tournament semifinals in Pittsburgh, Pa.): (King) You'd think that I'd learn by now not to underestimate any team coached by Sam Koch – the best coach at the University of Massachusetts. Look for UMass to win its semi-final match 1-0, regardless of who the team plays.

(Rosenswaike) So you don't even have the guts to predict who they'll play, but you feel confident enough to claim Koch is the best coach at UMass – although I can't really argue against you on that one. UMass will win against whichever team it plays (my guess, Rhode Island) by the score of 2-0.

Hockey vs. No. 1 Boston University: (King) Ah yes, my favorite November match-up between Jackie Parker and Jackie Parker, Jr. The Terriers defensive core is playing so well right now. I'll be surprised if the Minutemen get on the scoreboard. But UMass always plays BU tough, so look for a 4-2 Terrier win.

(Rosenswaike) I don't know much about hockey, but I do know that UMass teams playing against top-ranked teams in the country – no matter the sport – just don't win. This doesn't change here although I think UMass will come close. Minutemen lose 3-2.

Women's Basketball @ Vermont (season opener in Burlington, Vt.): (King) Unlike you, who spent a solid season covering this team, my women's basketball knowledge is rather limited. But I still know enough to say that Vermont will exploit the Minutewomen's lack of an interior presence and cruise to a 91-80 victory.

(Rosenswaike) You must know nothing about women's basketball with a predicted score like that. You think there will be 171 points scored? Have you seen a box score before? Each team will turn it over 20 times and shoot 35 percent from the floor. UMass loses, but 72-61.

Saturday, Nov. 15

Field Hockey @ No. 3 Syracuse (NCAA Tournament first round in Syracuse, N.Y.): (King) The first game between these teams was a tale of two halves, right? If UMass proved it can play with the best teams in the country throughout the season, so there's no reason why the Minutewomen can't win this one. UMass wins 3-2.

(Rosenswaike) Since I'll be in New York this weekend covering the game for the Daily Hampshire Gazette, I must refrain from making a prediction. Some people around here have some journalistic integrity, Mike.

Football @ No. 13 New Hampshire (Durham, N.H.): (King) Now that the Minutemen are out of contention for the playoffs, we'll see what the resolve of this team is. Still, UNH is too talented and there's too much at stake for the Wildcats to drop this one at home. UNH wins 49-24.

(Rosenswaike) Wait a second, Mike. Who told the world – and by world I mean those that read The Collegian – that UMass had no shot at the playoffs? That was me a month ago. I was right then and I'll be more right on this prediction. UMass fights hard, but loses 28-23.

Hockey vs. UMass-Lowell (King) Regardless of what happens Friday night for the Minutemen, this is a must-win for UMass. The games between these two schools are always physical and choppy, but UMass still has far greater talent than Lowell. UMass (flagship) 4-0 win.

(Rosenswaike) Must-win this early? The regular season doesn't end until early March. They still have 20 Hockey East games left AFTER the matchup with Lowell. So, nice try. You would rely on cliches in this column. UMass wins 3-2.

Sunday, Nov. 16

Men's Soccer vs. TBD (A-10 Championship if necessary): (King) A second consecutive Atlantic 10 tournament championship would be truly impressive. But I don't care what happens. I'm not going back to Cary, N.C., to cover this team. UMass falls to Saint Louis, 2-0, in the final.

(Rosenswaike) You have one thing right. UMass will play Saint Louis in the finals. But weren't you the one who said Koch is the best coach at UMass? And you still have no confidence in him and his team? Tough crowd. Minutemen defeat the Billikens, 1-0.

Women's Basketball vs. Manhattan (King) Ok, this one will have much lower scoring than the Vermont game. UMass wins 84-48.

(Rosenswaike) See? You're learning already. These games are low-scoring and brutal to watch. Trust me on that one. Minutewomen win, 62-53.

Monday, Nov. 17

Men's Basketball @ No. 11 Memphis (Memphis, Tenn.): (King) This is the big one. It's a lot to ask for the pupil to take his own team on the road and defeat his mentor at his own game. UMass has the talent to beat a lot of teams, but Memphis has too great of a physical presence and mastery of the dribble-drive motion offense to lose this one. Memphis wins, 97-79.

(Rosenswaike) This game is going to be such a blowout, that I'd rather see Derek Kellogg play one-on-one against John Calipari. Now who wouldn't want to see that? In all seriousness, UMass is a talented team but they don't realistically have a chance on the road against one of the country's elite teams – especially since they couldn't even hold a 15-point lead against Southern Illinois Wednesday night. UMass loses, 89-73.

Wednesday, Nov. 19

Women's Basketball vs. New Hampshire (King) New Hampshire sweeps the weekend series against UMass with a 73-56 win.

(Rosenswaike) No faith with these Minutewomen, huh? Kim Benton lights it up from downtown as UMass wins 68-67.

Scores and Smack

Last week: Rosenswaike 7-4, King 5-6. Season: Rosenswaike 7-4, King 5-6.

(Rosenswaike) Well, what do you know? Look who won last week! Not only did I win both disagreements, but on the nine games we agreed – I was closer to predicting the final score on seven of them. OWNED.

(King) Oh, I'm sorry. I'm too busy running a newspaper to follow UMass sports as closely as you.

(Rosenswaike) Well I guess you hired the right man as the Sports Editor, huh? Can I get a raise?

Eli Rosenswaike and Michael King are Collegian columnists. They can be reached at sports@dailycollegian.com.

Bellard highlights awareness week

BY EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Thursday night, speaker Trip Bellard ended the Veterans' Awareness Week sponsored by the Republican Club with a talk by his group, Vets for Freedom, at the University of Massachusetts.

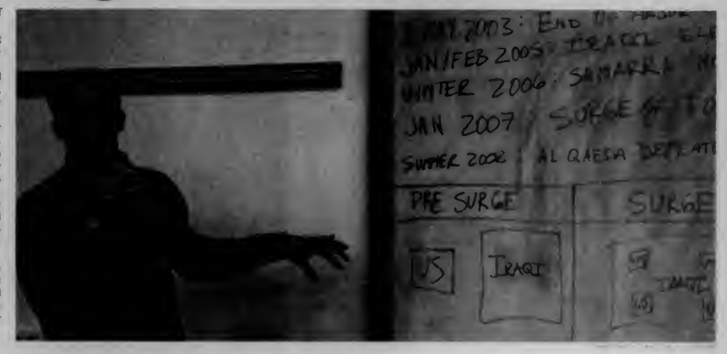
"It's amazing how fast, even in the military, you can get detached from what's going on in the world," said Bellard while opening his talk. "There is real blood being invested in these battles."

Bellard started by asking how many people knew someone or had relatives who were veterans, to get the audience connected to what he was talking about. Nearly everyone in the audience raised a hand.

Bellard's talk focused on the start of the war in Iraq and what the future of the war is.

"We were not properly prepared to fight an insurgency," said Bellard. "We were still getting prepped to serve in corporate military. We were not trained as soldiers on the field for this type of situation."

Bellard compared it to fighting force-on-force against graduate-level military operations.



"Every soldier on the ground had to learn first hand, blood, sweat and tears, how to fight like this," said Bellard.

Bellard is the State Chairman for Massachusetts Vets for Freedom. He gives talks a few times a month to student and civic groups while studying at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

"I'm doing my part to educate the people of the world," said Bellard. "I'm giving them a different perspective than what they get in the media."

The 31-year-old veteran from Texas went to school at West Point from 1995 to 1999 and was deployed to Iraq in 2004. He moved to Massachusetts last year to attend school.

Mass Attack upsets BU, loses to UML

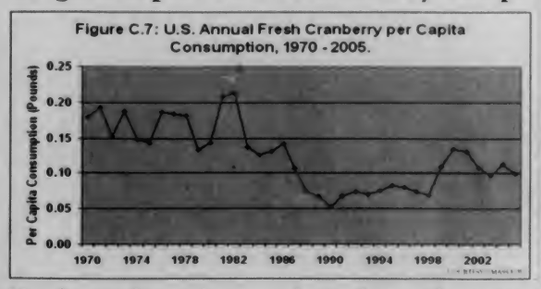
BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Upsets don't exist in Hockey East. Any team can win on any given day, and for the Massachusetts hockey team, that is exactly what happened this weekend.

The No. 20 Minutemen overpowered No. 1 Boston University Friday in a 5-1 win at the Mullins Center in front of 7,212 fans. But the momentum didn't carry over to the next night when UMass lost, 2-0, to unranked UMass Lowell.

Each game started out similarly, as BU and UML dominated play at the start as UMass (5-3-1, 3-2-1 Hockey East) played stale hockey. Against the Terriers (6-2-0, 3-2-0 HE-A), the Minutemen picked up their play and came out with an unexpected win. On Saturday, for the second week in a row, UMass lost to a team that rankings say it should have beaten – the Minutemen lost 3-1 at Merrimack on Nov. 8.



"Real ugly game from our standpoint," UMass coach Don Gibson said after Saturday's loss. "I think we went into the game knowing it was going to be an ugly game, but that doesn't mean it can't be a good hockey game. You just know it's not going to be very pretty – pucks are bouncing all over the place and the conditions weren't great."

High hopes for cranberry crop

Year's good weather results in better harvest

BY JESSICA SACCO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts cranberry growers have something to celebrate this month as they anticipate harvesting a record crop, something they haven't seen in years.

The University of Massachusetts' Cranberry Station in East Wareham, part of the College of Natural Resources and the Environment, has students and faculty researching about how to best produce cranberries safely and effectively.

In recent years, cranberry harvests have collected an average of about 1.5 million barrels, with each barrel equal to about 100 pounds.

This year, however, growers expect to gather over 1.9 million barrels, and possibly set a new record, said Station Director and Plant Nutrition Specialist Carolyn DeMoranville. Prices are also expected to rise to $60 a barrel, which is an increase from years past.

DeMoranville attributes the success to a variety of factors, one being near-perfect weather conditions.

"We had rain at just the right time to size up the fruit," said Frank Caruso, plant pathologist at the station. "We had lots of big berries."

There was good rainfall in the early summer, followed by a dry period, which allowed for good bee pollination. Caruso described how a large amount of rain fell at the end of the season, impacting the amount and size of the crop.

Cranberries are a perennial plant, which means that production varies from year-to-year. Vines that don't generate cranberries one year have an 85 percent chance of producing berries the following year. Those that do produce berries only have a 25 to 30 percent likelihood of production the following year.

Growers are also learning how to manage their water more efficiently. By using a reduced amount of water, the ground becomes less saturated, which cre-

SunEthanol readies plant to prepare microbe for industry

BY GARY TARANTINO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

SunEthanol's first pilot plant is scheduled to start production in 2009. The plant will likely be situated in Springfield and is currently awaiting approval of $2.8 million in federal funding. The company is negotiating with paper and cardboard plants to use their paper remnants, with hope that the ethanol produced at the facility will power factories that currently use coal.

In 1996, University of Massachusetts microbiologist Thomas Warnick made a discovery at Quabbin Reservoir that some hope will revolutionize the world's energy problems. In a local tributary, Warnick sifted through leaves and sediment, and it was within this muck that he found the "Q" microbe.

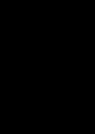
In October 2006, "Q" became the foundation of SunEthanol, which launched with Jef Sharp, an entrepreneur from Northampton, as CEO and Susan Leschine as chief scientist. SunEthanol has already been given four research grants from the Department of Energy.

The ultimate goal of SunEthanol is to produce energy in a manner that is truly carbon-neutral. Cars will burn ethanol, emitting the carbon dioxide that plants absorb through photosynthesis, then "Q" will eat plant waste in order to create more ethanol.

UMass professor Susan Leschine speaks in Washington on Green energy and her "Q" Microbe.

The sample was added to the many other samples gathered from other parts of the world such as Brazil, Mexico, France and Hawaii.

Leschine was researching microbes that break down plant waste at the time of the "Q" discovery. While observing the sample from the Quabbin, professor Susan Leschine was able to isolate an unusual bug located within. By placing it under a microscope she noticed a single-celled microbe that did not have the similar characteristics of those previously observed. Instead of being round and fat, it was slender with a circular spore at one end, resembling a tiny lollipop. Due to its reservoir home, the microbe was given the name "Q."



While performing close observation, professor Leschine noticed that the microbe also acted like no other microbe she had seen before. "Q" has the ability to home-in on many compounds, particularly cellulose, which is the fibrous, insoluble molecule that forms a plant's cell walls. The newly discovered microbe has the ability to turn the cellu-

Hampshire disabled see boundaries aplenty

By Eddie Mathers
Collegian Contributor
(Hampshire College)

Joel Dansky calls the main entrance to the Harold F. Johnson Library the "segregated entrance." It earned that name because the entrance is not accessible to the disabled.

"Students in wheelchairs have to go around the back," said Joel Dansky, Disability Services Coordinator at Hampshire College.

Disabled students can't even get to the Airport Lounge when the library is closed because the library is locked, making the elevator inaccessible.

"There are many areas on campus that aren't accessible [to disabled students]," Dansky said.

Other services that are inaccessible to disabled students include the Quantitative Resource Center, Student Services, the Spiritual Life Center, the Community Health Collaborative and the Women's Center. As for housing, "there are only five rooms that are accessible to disabled students," Dansky noted. "Disabled students should also be able to visit their friends too."

The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) of 1994 states that "essential services" must be provided to the handicapped. Many of the buildings on Hampshire's campus were constructed before the act was passed and therefore do not meet ADA's standards.

To tackle inaccessibility on campus, a student and faculty building survey was conducted this summer. Surveyors measured the hallways, ramps and entrances of every building on campus except the Physical Plant and the Farm Center to determine the improvements necessary to meet ADA standards.

Stephen Demos, an architect at the Institute for Human-Centered Design in Boston, is editing the survey report for errors and compliance with Massachusetts state standards. Dansky will present the results of the survey to the administration on Tuesday. As soon as the report is finalized, Dansky hopes to make it available on the campus intranet.

The efforts of Dansky and the surveyors are considered commendable. However, there is neither a committee to act upon the findings of the survey nor a protocol to confront disability issues on campus. Public meetings and the formation of a committee are forthcoming.

Among the players involved in creating a more accessible Hampshire College is Campus Planner Larry Archey. Archey has produced a draft of the Capital Facilities Plan, which outlines a strategy for development over the next 20 years. Archey's grand scheme encompasses all modernization, construction and renovations.

For Dansky and Archey, the issue of accessibility goes beyond ADA and Massachusetts standards. Archey and Dansky were involved in putting a lift into the new film and photo building. Because it's only a renovation, Archey said, "The code didn't require that we put it in, but it was the right thing to do so that's what we did."

Similarly, the lift in the WLH wasn't required. Rather it was put in so disabled students could be given the opportunity to fully participate in the classroom.

Disability issues are among the many in the Capital Finance plan. The funding for every development is allocated to specific plans, and particular priorities such as accessibility.

"Development in the immediate future is predetermined," but a more permanent budget is to be determined by the Campus Planning Committee. The committee, which Archey calls a "shell of one" at this point, is composed of faculty, students, administrators and representatives of both a living perspective and grounds operations on campus. Plans will be more complete in the next few months. Even temporarily disabled students have been considered in the plan. It includes a proposal to move Health Services closer to the center of campus.

"If a student sprains an ankle then the student has to hobble all the way to Health Services [which isn't close to anything]," Dansky said.

Committee meetings will be open to the public. Archey suggested that those interested should wait until the committee gets its act together. The Web site for The Campus Planning committee is undergoing construction itself, and it will reflect a more concrete plan in the near future.

"We went through Vets for Freedom," said Greg Collins, president of the Republican Club. "We had him speak last year along with another veteran. Because he was so informative, we invited him back."

Bellard described what he believes to be the most important dates of the war and the landmarks over the past five years. He said that May 2005 was when the battle ended between the uniformed soldiers. According to Bellard, it was after that when things became increasingly difficult.

"The enemy changed," said Bellard. "It went from a uniformed soldier that you could recognize to any Plain Jane person who we could not identify."

After major combat ended, it was the insurgents who could not be identified and had to be dealt with. It was a surge of forces that Bellard credits with the more successful aspects of the war.

"We did some things well, we did some things poorly, but we learned from our mistakes," said Bellard.

Following the surge, Bellard said one of the good steps was moving barracks in closer proximity to the Iraqis. According to Bellard, before the surge of U.S. forces, the soldiers would come into the city and leave at the end of the day. Afterwards, the soldiers were more ingrained in the Iraqi society.

"You live with them day in and day out, just like them, so that when the bad guys come, they are more likely to side with us soldiers because we're with them for the long haul," said Bellard. "They loved us, they absolutely adored us. They want the same things we want. There were very few that felt angst towards us."

After talking about the time that he spent in Iraq, Bellard went on to read excerpts from the Obama/Biden campaign Web site and attempted to examine what the future may hold with new leadership.

The most important things to Bellard were Iraq, Afghanistan and Africa.

"Bush meant the best and really had the best intentions going into Iraq," said Bellard. "We, as a country, did not execute it."

Bellard is hopeful that things will improve under president-elect Obama.

"I don't think that Obama will withdraw anywhere near what he said while campaigning," said Bellard. "If we pull out too early, a lot of innocent people will die, and a lot of chaos will ensue. It could lead to destabilization in Iraq."

Instead, he is hoping that there will be a sit-down between leaders in the Middle East and the U.S. to discuss what will happen with Iraq.

In Afghanistan and Africa, Bellard is once again hoping for the best.

"I think that everything Obama is talking about in Afghanistan is correct," said Bellard. "Whether it is feasible, I don't know. We have to adopt the same practices we used in Iraq for Afghanistan. In the long term, I don't know what will happen."

Iraq War veteran Trip Bellard addresses his audience. His speaking tour is a break from study at MIT.

While Africa is not at the top of any list, there are a lot of things going on there as well, though Bellard did not get specific.

"You probably don't know this, but literally, we are doing a lot," said Bellard. "I'm very hopeful about what is going to happen in Africa."

The traditionally conservative Bellard brought both sides to the table during his talk, and some of it went against the usual Republican mantra.

"He had fair criticism of the Bush administration, not just the president, but everyone who works with him," said Collins. "Iraq may have been the right thing, but the strategic implementation was flawed."

As for the students listening, many were pleased with what Bellard had to say.

"I thought it was really informative," said freshman Emmy Brennan. "It gives you a military perspective that you don't usually get."

LaPierre said something similar, agreeing that Bellard was very informative, as did Collins.

"I learn more listening to a presentation like this than reading the newspaper everyday," said Collins.

Veterans' Awareness Week started on Tuesday night with the start of a flag display on the library lawn. During the week, the Republican Club tabled to collect donations for disabled American Veterans. The 4081 flags were taken out of the ground as Taps were played.

'Q' sets to impact

lose into sugars and then could surprisingly transform the sugars into pure ethanol.

This was an immense discovery revealed by Leschine. Currently, plant waste has to be run through machines, which consume energy of their own, in order to make ethanol. This process is one that is exceptionally expensive. Since "Q" can make ethanol on its own, without the help of machinery, it could be nearly as clean a power source as solar or wind power.

"Q" also has received high praise from Massachusetts Governor Deval Patrick. He called SunEthanol a "transformational breakthrough" when speaking to the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce in May of 2008. Governor Patrick is also proposing the state exempt the gas tax on SunEthanol to help the company bring its products to market more quickly. He stated, "If Massachusetts gets clean energy right, the whole world will be our consumer."

The original microbe found at the Quabbin Reservoir produced a yield of just less than one percent ethanol. Six months after the creation of SunEthanol, Leschine and her associates had "Q" tripling the yield. They have continued to do so and preserve only the most potent strains of the microbe so that each successive generation puts out more ethanol than the last.

The tipping point at which distilling becomes commercially viable is five percent.

Leschine in her lab working on the microbe.

SunEthanol says "Q" will eventually reach that point and beyond within the next three fiscal quarters. Due to Leschine and her team, the superbug just keeps getting more super.

Growers expect record yield, experts affirm optimism

ates a better environment for growing cranberries.

During the late 1990s, farmers were turning out more cranberries than could be sold, which lowered the price of the crop. However, through the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the Cranberry Marketing Committee promoted cranberries across the world to increase revenue. Today, about 25 percent of a grower's products are sold off shore.

There has also been a rise in the number of uses for cranberries 15 years ago, they were mostly sold as juice. Today, they're popular in both the dry and powder forms.

Because of the increasing demand for the fruit, the Cranberry Station is constantly working with farmers on ways to efficiently produce more of its crop in relation to water and fertilizer use, as well as pest management.

Hilary Sandler, weed specialist and member of integrated pest management, works to provide reduced risk compounds for the growing of cranberries through the Interregional Research Project Number Four, which makes sure pesticides are registered for use on minor crops.

"Our main goal is to provide growers with knowledge that they can use the lowest effective use [of pesticides], to have them use reduced risk compounds, and to provide them with an integrated approach to manage pests through cultural, biological and chemical strategies," said Sandler.

Caruso, who works to control and manage fruit rot, emphasizes the importance of looking ahead at future problems that may arise in relation to the health of crops.

"It's possible [in the future] that we'll have some new pests that we don't have now, or for minor pests to become major ones," he said.

In years to come, members of the Cranberry Station hope to maintain a strong research program and to continue to lead in their studies.

"As for the industry as a whole, the goal is to build on this year's crop and hopefully exceed in the years ahead," said DeMoranville.

Money over morals

Paul Payer

As the dust of the presidential election settles, changes in electoral trends and political sentiment across the country become increasingly evident. Even on election night these changes became strikingly apparent to the novice observer and political analyst alike.

Large swatches of blue replaced portions of the electoral map which had been perennially colored deep red. Following the election, democratic strategists were giddy with excitement at the prospect of a Democratic reemergence in the South and Republicans frantically scrambled to anount the next leader of a party in peril.

But even as the pundits and talking heads on cable news project the future of American politics, let us not forget 2004. Remember the famed "values voter"?

Four short years after an election dominated by what the media and political establishment framed as "moral values," the American electorate has turned 180 degrees and rejected the notion of voting for a presidential candidate based on abortion, gays and religion.

Americans went to the polls concerned not with what their gay neighbors do in the privacy of their bedroom, or whether the local high school's health office distributes condoms to students, but rather overwhelmingly concerned with an economy bleeding both jobs and Dow points.

Conversely in 2004, a great deal of discussion and political talk show banter was spent on the topic of moral values. Exit polls show from the 2004 election that on Election Day, 22 percent of voters identified "moral values" as the most important issue affecting their vote. George W. Bush received 80 percent of the vote from this voting group and the issue has often been recognized as the deciding factor in the 2004 election.

Republicans had seemingly engineered a dominant electoral strategy – they encouraged a large turnout of religious voters by depicting the opposing side as immoral and out of touch with the values of America.

The American voter cast their ballot overwhelmingly based on a concern of an economy bleeding both jobs and Dow points.

Democrats woke up Nov. 5, 2008 with a conviction to reinvent and retool the Democratic Party to counter the Republicans successful electoral tactics.

Perhaps the Democrats were successful in their efforts to redirect the party and reach out to a broader base of voters, or perhaps they simply benefited as an opposition party during the mismanagement of an unpopular war and the meltdown of Wall Street and global financial markets.

Whatever the case may be, the result of the 2006 midterm elections and 2008 presidential election speaks more of a unified call for a new direction in policy and ideology than a continued endorsement of a national cultural divide.

In contrast to 2004, only 14 percent of voters selected the economy as their most important issue, the 2008 election saw 63 percent of voters identify the economy as the deciding factor in how they marked their ballot. The issue of "moral values" did not even garner enough attention to be included in most exit poll surveys and had been seemingly absent for most of the campaign.

One study released found that only small minorities within the religious community favored a political agenda focused specifically on concerns regarding same-sex marriage and abortion.

The polling data found an overwhelming desire for finding common ground and reaching a consensus on hot button issues, a stark contrast to attitudes found in 2004 when a widening culture war seemed to be on the verge of engulfing the political landscape of the nation.

This is undoubtedly bad news for politicians whom traditionally have derived their support from the politics of morality. They must now either change their approach to voters or face an uncertain political future.

As the Republican Party looks to regroup after consecutive electoral defeats in the House, Senate and governorships across the nation, they must make a decision on how to move forward with their image and their leadership. Some within the party advocate a return to principle. They view the nomination and candidacy of John McCain, a relatively moderate republican, as a rejection and admonishment of conservative principles (i.e. moral values).

But a zealous move farther to the right searching for the elusive and declining value-voter population will only serve to spell further electoral demise in a country seeking consensus.

This is not to say that religion and the divisive politics often associated with it have disappeared from our political culture. It is evident on the posters adorning the Student Union and by the voices of speakers hosted by the Republican Club.

Yes, there can be no doubt that real and clear division still exists across our nation. But this election has shown that the American polity is capable of rejecting attempts by political parties to distract voters by playing on these cultural fears and points of division.

The American voter has instead found merit in directing the political dialogue towards substantive issues which will actually affect their day-to-day lives and future of their country.

Tips for task force

Eric Magazu

On Nov. 4 I was granted the opportunity to spend a few minutes with Chancellor Robert Holub to discuss the future of the University of Massachusetts.

I was most interested in learning about these plans upon which the Chancellor and his team have been working. I was also interested in finding out the impact of budget cuts on these potential plans.

We discussed, and it certainly appears obvious to me, that the three most essential components of making our university great are faculty, capital investments and recruiting the best and brightest students.

These aren't all independent variables, as recruiting the best students is the natural result that follows from investing in faculty and capital investments.

It is essential that UMass recruit and retain the best faculty available in their respective fields of expertise. While our lives on campus might be impacted by day-to-day concerns, ultimately we are here to acquire knowledge, preferably the knowledge of truth, expertise in a certain area of study and what is commonly called 'know-how.'

While here, students may seek out nicer facilities and better food in the dining halls, but these are not the things that endure. We know that in the long term, we want to learn from the best professors in our fields of study.

Towards this end, students should demand that the recruitment of high quality faculty be the highest priority for our University. Student leaders in the Student Government Association, along with other campus groups, ought to insist on this in all of their interactions with administrators.

This does not mean that we have the same priorities as a teachers' union. Recruiting the best professors doesn't necessarily mean that we need to endorse more benefits or a better tenure arrangement for faculty. In some cases, tenure could even be an impediment.

It is my hope that these student leaders will use the opportunity to be supportive of the mission of our institution rather than seek out revolutionary socialist ideals.

With faculty as our first priority, it is important to consider the necessary capital investments needed to maximize our learning opportunities. There are many different avenues in which to expand the infrastructure at UMass. First and foremost, we need to make sure that classrooms and laboratories are maximally equipped.

This does not necessarily mean getting the latest equipment to assist one professor with his research, but retaining the best equipment that will permit the most ease and breadth of learning by students.

Improved comfort and amenities in classrooms and improved facilities, such as the new Recreation Center, have a role as well. That role ought to be secondary to education, but indeed it does play a supporting role when balanced in its proper level of priority.

This is due to the fact that it encourages people to be at ease when on campus, as well as offering support in the recruitment of those who may be deciding between multiple options in their choice of a university.

This leads precisely into the third area that can make the University great; the recruitment of the best and brightest of students. There is often controversy about recruiting the best students since UMass is a land grant institution of higher learning.

The land grant status indicates that UMass ought to be available to all residents of the state. This argument is diminished by the fact that there are many institutions of higher learning available in Massachusetts, as well as by the fact that recruiting the best students benefits everyone all around.

The impact of budget cuts on these priorities have the potential to wreak havoc on pursuing our overall goals as an institution of higher learning, but with the right strategies UMass can easily move forward in the face of these challenges. By maintaining a strategic outlook towards any potential budget cuts, we can ensure that our position as a top-tier university is not altered.

One curious aspect the Chancellor pointed out is that the recruitment of the best students may be enhanced by any negative downturn in the nation's economy.

This is because, due to strained resources, the parents of students that have been accepted into schools with high quality reputations may decide the lower tuition at a state school like UMass is better worth the value.

The Chancellor has recently announced that student leaders will be able to take a role on the Budget Planning Task Force. It is my hope that these student leaders will use the opportunity to be supportive of the mission of our institution rather than seek out revolutionary socialist ideals, which are beyond the scope of the task force, or seek out things with fleeting value.

Student leaders need to represent students in their defense of the mission of our university. Therefore, leaders should be hard on areas where they think other members of the task force are seeking their own agenda and not the mission of the University. This is in addition to subverting their own desire to seek out their own agendas.

This will lead to the best results. The greatest mission of the University is to help each of us find the answer to the most important question of what is truth.

Take the first step towards tolerance

Hannah Nelson

Thomas Beatie has been called an "it," a "monster" and has listened to death threats on his answering machine ever since he became the first pregnant man.

Transgender women have been pregnant in the past, before undergoing the operation to change their gender. Transgender men have gotten women pregnant before they made the switch. But Thomas – formerly Tracy – got pregnant after he made the switch from woman to man, not only medically but legally.

His social security card, passport and birth certificate all have been changed to say male. When he gave birth to his daughter Susan, he was admitted to the hospital as a man and originally listed as the father on her birth certificate.

It is only natural to want to see the world in terms of extremes, black and white, male and female, but that is not the way the world is. To try to make people fit into identities and categorizations that they do not connect with would only be mental and emotional torture.

Likewise, it is wrong to claim that people who are different from what we know shouldn't express themselves because of something they feel.

If someone feels misplaced in the body that they are born in, how is it an evil thing for that person to want to make their skin more comfortable?

Yes, this isn't the same as using hair dye or losing weight, but if you've ever seen a talk show special on makeovers, you know the old song and dance about self-consciousness and personal appearance.

Multiply that a 100-times over and it would be a bit closer to a transgender experience. Many opposed to the choices the Beatties have made claim that, "God doesn't make mistakes."

But nature does, and it's called evolution. If someone wants to try to fix the exterior to match the interior, who are we to judge when we have no idea what that may feel like?

The intolerance that has been shown toward Thomas and his wife Nancy is appalling, but hardly surprising. Gender roles have been in the process of redefinition for generations, and with each step there have been cynics who try to stop the process of another human's journey.

We cannot simply label and mark another human as a monstrosity because they do not fit into our ideal view of how the world should work.

How is what Thomas and Nancy did in order to have a child any worse than using something even less "natural" such as in vitro fertilization? Thomas had not had his female reproductive organs removed because he did not feel that they infringed on his feeling male.

In layman's terms, all that Thomas needed to do was stop taking testosterone and then use donor sperm in order to get pregnant. Because Nancy could not get pregnant due to a prior hysterectomy, the couple made a decision based on a desire that straight, heterosexual couples feel as well – to have a child that is of biological relation.

Thomas still has no desire to be female, and even as a pregnant man did not feel maternal despite sexually falling into a female role.

The Beaties originally had no intention of going public with their story, but intended on keeping house blinds closed to their neighbors and prying eyes, and still do.

The couple lives with a certain amount fear of what could happen to them and their daughter Susan, with another child on the way, carried and conceived the same way as the first pregnancy.

Many people on both sides of the argument actually agree that the couple should have kept quiet and not gone to the media with their story. But the follow up to that is, wouldn't the media have found the story anyway? The tabloids aside, it seems like the story would have been bound to come up eventually as the Beaties began to let people into their lives.

People have to stop using selective vision on their fellow human beings. We cannot simply label and mark another human as a monstrosity because they do not fit into our ideal view of how the world should work.

When something comes into society that challenges the social norm it has been shown through history just how hurtful and destructive humans can be to each other.

It's just as evident when the morals, values and standards of an individual person or of a collective group are put into question that as humans, we most commonly react with fear.

On the other side, there are groups and individuals who like to say that tolerance isn't enough when it comes to such issues, and that it is not the same as social acceptance and immersion. But that belief is flawed, tolerance exists as the first step to understanding others; the trick is not getting stuck on the first step and to make it to the top of the stairs.

Opting out of sticky politics

Nicholas O'Malley

I got me a glue stick – his name's Angelo.

Angelo's got a frog head and a backwards purple cap, which would have made him pretty much the coolest thing ever in the mid '90s. This has lead to his other moniker – '90s Frog.

Other than being pretty much the coolest school supply ever, Angelo has another unique quality – he doesn't complain about politics. This may have something to do with being an inanimate object, but it's an endearing quality all the same.

More importantly though, is what Angelo represents, both as a glue stick and '90s icon. With the election's recent conclusion, there's somewhat of a hang-over effect from the debate over the presidency. So right now, Angelo's glue stick mantra of not talking about politics sounds pretty good.

Almost every student on a college campus has gotten into a political argument of some sort. But the problem is, not many people care about politics that much. So why are we arguing?

Think back to a time when politics didn't matter. Remember when the president was the guy they made fun of on SNL and who made boring speeches? Yes, it was the '90s; the time of Angelo.

It was a beautiful time when nobody you knew cared about politics. Recess dominated the social sphere and nobody was trying to get laid yet. Hopefully.

It was a time when the students on this campus didn't have to debate the qualifications of senators from Arizona and Illinois or the ramifications of proposition one. Remembering yet? Yeah, the '90s were awesome.

The words "hope" and "change" should be discontinued in favor of better words like "hopscotch" and "cheese."

Let's face it, this stuff has gotten really old, and is showing no signs of letting up.

This campaign was the longest of its kind and whether we like or not, we're getting another one in a couple of years. Okay, Barack won. Can we just, maybe for a little bit, go talk about something else for a while?

We currently have an economy that resembles a smoldering crater and we may or may not be at war with a dozen countries in the Middle East – I have to check the Internet again. Regardless, there's plenty of genuinely interesting things to talk about.

Did you know there may be a long-lost Beatles track being released? That's mildly intriguing and only took four seconds to find on CNN's Web site. Plus, it has nothing to do with politics.

These issues, which were really meaningless in the first place, need to go away. Now.

I only want to hear about an acorn if it has to do with squirrels – because they're adorable. The only plumber that should be relevant now is named Mario. We should never have to talk about Alaska ever again. And the words "hope" and "change" should be discontinued in favor of better words like "hopscotch" and "cheese."

Some people may not like the tax plan, health care plan, war plan, abortion plan or education plan, which is understandable. But in the context of the last eight years, it's going to be really hard to look bad in the first term in office.

This brings me back to Angelo. He's not wrapped up in political debate, discussing the morality of stem cell research or illegal immigration. You see, Angelo's a glue stick frog. He's part of the pro-smearing adhesive on paper party.

If only it could be so simple.

Partisan politics may be inevitable. They may be the only way that current American politics is going to function. But it's really annoying.

John McCain and Barack Obama are both cool guys. Either one would have made a quality president and would have made at least some improvements from the last eight years.

Even though McCain lost, do we really have to be angry about it? If Obama's really as bad as some people make him out to be, it'll only be four years of Obamanation. Democrats, on the other hand, got eight years in the Bush. Ok? We're even now.

However, even looking at Obama's win as a reaction to the Bush campaign won't be enough for a lot of people. That is unfortunate since the whole point of the election is to select someone that the majority of people believe should lead the country.

So you guys can keep tabling and debating and yelling at each other. I'll go take my glue stick frog and go home.

Common is one of a handful of hip-hop acts that has drawn praise from President-elect Barack Obama.

Will Obama change hip-hop's tune?

BY GREG KOT
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Barack Obama was in his last year of high school in 1979 when hip-hop broke out of the ghettos of New York on its way to becoming a national phenomenon.

He is in many ways a child of hip-hop, but sometimes a reluctant one. Even as the president-elect claims to "love hip-hop" he has spoken out against its more explicit lyrics. When Ludacris released "Obama's Here" a few months ago, the Southern rapper extolled the future president's credentials while viciously putting down Obama's rivals. An Obama spokesman issued a stinging rebuke. "While Ludacris is a talented rapper he should be ashamed of these lyrics."

Yet Obama has been embraced by the hip-hop community like no presidential candidate in history. Bill Clinton was the first president to forge a bond with the '60s and '70s classic-rock generation (even persuading Fleetwood Mac to reunite and perform at his inaugural ball in 1993). Obama now commands the respect of the voters who came of age when hip-hop transformed pop culture.

The non-partisan group Hip-Hop Caucus and rappers T.I., Jay-Z, T Pain and others spearheaded the "Respect My Vote" campaign, which registered voters between the ages of 18 and 29, most of whom voted for Obama. Will.i.am wrote and produced no fewer than three songs in recent months extolling the Obama campaign, including the YouTube hit video "Yes We Can." Rappers such as Common, a native of Chicago's South Side, and New York's Talib Kweli were dropping Obama references into their songs as early as 2007. The video for Common's "Hi" hit "The People" flashed on an "Obama '08" bumper sticker.

At the time, it seemed like wishful thinking: A black man in the White House?

But hip-hop, at its best, has always functioned on two levels: as a reflection of what's happening now ("the black CNN," as Public Enemy's Chuck D once called it) and as a window into the future (rap songs by Ice Cube and Ice-T, among others, presaged the riots that broke out after the 1992 verdict in the Rodney King beating).

Though hip-hop initially emerged as an art form primarily developed by African-Americans, it soon became a shared language for youth that cut across racial lines.

Just as rock 'n' roll galvanized teenagers in the '50s, hip-hop in the '80s and '90s linked inner-city hipsters with listeners living in soccer-mom households in the suburbs. By the end of the last decade, together with contemporary R&B, hip-hop had become the biggest selling genre in the $14 billion-a-year music industry.

Obama has embraced hip-hop whenever he has been asked about the subject in interviews, specifically citing Jay-Z, Kanye West and Common as personal favorites. But he also has been outspoken in his disgust for rap lyrics that go too far.

"There are times, even on the artists I've named,

Lerche keeps it simple & imaginative

BY IAN NELSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's easy to brush off quaint, guitar pop as typical and generic, at times even a prospect to avoid, but some musicians just do it so well it's hard to ignore.

Sondre Lerche is one of those promising musicians, weaving light-hearted lyrics with simple arrangements, producing some of the sweetest, most elegant pop of the 21st century. Lerche will show off his gems tonight at the Iron Horse in Northampton with opener Sylvie Lewis.

Lerche got his start in his native Bergen, Norway, playing original acoustic numbers at the club his sister worked at. After being discovered at age 19 by Norwegian producer H.P. Gundersen, Lerche recorded and released his debut record "Faces Down" (2001), influenced by the psychedelia and Brazilian pop his producer exposed him to.

The album received praise in 2002 when it was released in the U.S., after Lerche won Best New Act at the Norwegian Grammys, but was called out on lyrical flaws due to his lack of dexterity with the English language.

In 2003, Lerche was given the opportunity to tour with his musical idol Elvis Costello, after the release of his "Don't Be Shallow" EP, a collection of B-sides, home recordings and live takes.

His sophomore full-length, "Two Way Monologue" (2004), was released to critical acclaim. Lerche cleaned up his lyrical blunders in favor of more delicate prose equal to the charm of his acoustic guitars and breezy, tropical influences.

Lerche crafts some of the most harmless, universally pleasant songs imaginable. Subtle horns, sweeping strings, and quiet harmonies complimenting his everyman falsetto. He keeps it simple, staying away from specifics and complexities while still passing for a dreamy, imaginative songwriter.

In 2006, Lerche released the "Duper Sessions," recorded with his Faces Down Quartet. The record reads like a throwaway jazz record, essentially straying from his golden pop roots in order to explore more distant territory.

Critical boredom plagued the album's mainstream success, though the record entered the Billboard Top Contemporary Jazz Albums Chart at No. 5. The record features covers of show tune legend Cole Porter's "Night and Day" as well as Costello's "Human Hands."

Lerche's fourth album, 2007's "Phantom Punch," continued to have worldly influence, but for the most part canned the calm balladry for more upbeat rock songs, including the title track, which was the first single. Other up-tempo songs include "The Tape" and "Face the Blood," which could easily find their place on a Phantom Planet record.

Most recently, Lerche helped score the Steve Carrell film "Dan in Sondre Lerche has shown the ability to transcend multiple genres during his relatively brief recording career.

'Gilgamesh' lacks accessibility

Bowker performance suffers from lack of musical implementation

BY MICHELLE FREDETTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Friday's performance of "Gilgamesh" at Bowker Auditorium entwined Arabian music with the ancient Mesopotamian tale of the hero Gilgamesh and his quest for immortality.

The performance was divided into two sections. First, Margaret Olivia Wolfson told Gilgamesh's story with accompaniment from Simon Shaheen and other members of the Qantara Ensemble on the oud and the nay, instruments of Middle Eastern origin, as well as percussion. The full Qantara Ensemble followed after a brief intermission, performing five songs.

While "Gilgamesh" tackles themes that are still relevant today, there is a reason storytelling is not as prevalent as it once was: there is not enough action.

Wolfson's performance strove to make the tale accessible for a modern audience with the addition of other media. The musical aspect was one such addition, adding depth to the story.

Moments where Gilgamesh was running or fighting were quickened and intensified by the rapid drumbeats and notes from the oud and nay, while moments of deep emotion, such as Enkidu's death, became more resonant with the mournful tones that supported the storytelling.
